Balmer, a regular contributor to Christian and secular publications, sets out to "trace the transition" between 1960, when Kennedy made an obviously convincing plea for voters to disregard his faith affiliation, to 2004, when candidates for the highest office in the country were called upon by voters to "fully disclose their religious views."

The author makes it clear that his writings are not intended as a "comprehensive history" or directed toward a political science perspective.

Instead he launches a president-by-president examination of how personal faith and organized religious groups intersected, sometimes collided, inside the Oval Office over four decades.

Balmer theorizes that "voices of faith" should be involved in the political process, but "faith loses its prophetic voice" if aligned too closely with a particular movement or party.

The reader will find a winner in this text—it is organized, well written, carefully researched and meticulously documented.

The sign of a seasoned academic, Balmer remains just on the fringe of the discourse, mostly refraining from personal asides and resisting opinion and judgment. The development of the "religious right" and its powerful influence in Washington, the number of professed born-again Christians who sat behind the desk in the Oval Office, those presidents who considered themselves evangelicals and those who were mostly indifferent to religious affiliation are detailed in this book.

The most influential religious leader who was most welcomed and embraced by the majority of these presidents and their families was the Rev. Billy Graham, according to the author's research.

Balmer draws an interesting parallel between Carter and George W. Bush, writing that both men seized the opportunity to be portrayed as "redemptive" to a population morally wounded by the negative effects of their predecessors—Richard M. Nixon and Clinton.

Rhetoric aside, the revelations that flowed from the presidents' speeches printed in the appendix are at best a glimpse, a hint of the direction in which their moral compasses were pointed.

However, Balmer cautions: "A candidate's faith (or lack of same)" is a legitimate concern for voters and "an insight into his (or her) character, but it should be only one of many considerations." He continues, warning that faith is at risk of being "prostituted" when used "in pursuit of political power."

Eucharist is true
'friendship bread' that unites us with God

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

A few years ago I received a plastic bag with a lump of unbaked dough—a "starter" for what an acquaintance called "friendship bread."

The idea was to incorporate the lump into a new batch of bread dough so that the entire mass would rise. At least this was the theory; in reality, the contents of the bag went sour, smelled rotten, and turned the whole batch into a gray, watery mess.

I had no choice but to throw it in the garbage and give up on the bread, if not the friendship.

In Matthew's Gospel, written for a Jewish-Christian community, the evangelist is careful to note certain important details connected with Jesus' suffering and death that escape most of us contemporary Christians.

The seven-day Feast of Unleavened Bread, which coincided with the annual Jewish feast of Passover, began with the avid search for and ceremonial removal of every trace of leavened bread from the home. This action symbolized that the "leaven"—which in Jewish tradition stood for the contaminating effects of sin, decay and death—would be purged anew from the community to make way for the unleavened bread of holiness and purity of heart.

It was this kind of bread—not ordinary leavened bread—that Jesus identified at the Last Supper with his body, given as the beginning of a new covenantal relationship between us and God.

The entire season of Lent has been a preparation for this most holy of weeks that culminates in the great feast of Easter. Through the spiritual disciplines of prayer, fasting and almsgiving, we have been encouraged anew to seek out and remove the contaminating "leaven" of sin from our lives.

As we meditate upon the sacrifice of Jesus our paschal lamb in the days ahead, we prepare to celebrate the freedom from sin and death that he brings, in the same way that Israel celebrated their liberation from Egypt the night of their first Passover.

It is no accident then that we use pure, unleavened bread in our celebration of the Eucharist. It is the bread of a renewed relationship—the true "friendship bread" that unites us with the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Questions:

What sorts of "leaven" have you needed to sweep from your life this Lent? How do you anticipate renewing your friendship with God this Holy Week? Is participation in the Eucharist a part of this renewal?

THE CATHOLIC

'Concerns of human dignity'

Bishops say show exploits, degrades those whose bodies are on display

BY JACK SMITH
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Two Catholic prelates said they regard the exhibit "Bodies Revealed" that opened Feb. 29 in Kansas City as "an unfortunate exploitation of that which is 'real' to teach something that could be accomplished by use of models."

"As such it represents a kind of 'human taxidermy' that degrades the actual people who, through their bodies, once lived, loved, prayed and died," said Archbishop Joseph F. Naumann of Kansas City in Kansas and Bishop Robert W. Finn of Kansas City-St. Joseph.

"For these reasons, we do not believe that this exhibit is an appropriate destination for field trips by our Catholic schools," they added.

The exhibit features an array of human bodies in various poses, all preserved through a process of polymer preservation. Various preserved organs are also in the exhibit, which will be at Kansas City's Union Station through Sept. 1.

The bishops explained that "Catholic moral teaching regards the human person as a unity of soul and body, spirit and matter — beings capable of freedom and love in communion with other persons and with God."

"As such, the body is more than just a vessel for the soul. The church's concern for human dignity extends to the body even after the soul is no longer present," they said.

The two church leaders said that "the bodies of the dead deserve respect and charity, preserving the God-given dignity of the human person."

They acknowledged the church "does allow for — and in some cases commends — the conscientious free choice of persons to 'donate' their bodies for legitimate scientific research and educational purposes. In these instances, the deceased body and its parts deserve respectful interment."

Atlanta-based Premier Exhibitions is the organizer of the Kansas City show; it also produces a show titled "Bodies: The Exhibition," which just opened at the Cincinnati Museum Center. Both shows, say their promoter, are aimed at educating people about the human body and how to take better care of their health.

A competing show called "Body Worlds" also has been on tour in the United States and other countries. It was put together by Gunther von Hagens, a German anatomist who invented a plastination process for preserving bodies. "Body Worlds" recently came to Discovery Place in Charlotte.

Questions have been raised about the source of some of the cadavers, namely for "Bodies: The Exhibition," considered to have the higher profile of Premier's two shows.

On Feb. 15, following a three-month investigation, ABC's "20/20" aired a story about the Chinese sources of the specimens. Human rights groups have alleged some of them are executed prisoners.

In a statement released before the "20/20" show, Union Station's president and CEO, Andi Udris, acknowledged the exhibit would raise questions.

But he said Premier Exhibitions "assured us that all of the bodies and organ specimens on display in 'Bodies Revealed' were procured from individuals who willingly and knowingly chose to donate their bodies to science."

"Those individuals made their anatomical gifts to accredited medical universities in the People's Republic of China, and all specimens were then received by the Nanjing Suyi Plastination Laboratories in China," Udris said.

However, "Premier Exhibitions has never made (it a) secret that specimens used in 'Bodies: The Exhibition' may be unclaimed or unidentified specimens," Udris added.

Reporter Brian Ross found that contrary to Premier's earlier assertions that specimens for its "Bodies: The Exhibition" show were procured from Dalian Medical University, they had in fact come from Dr. Hong Jin Sui's Dalian Medical University Plastination Co., a for-profit, private company 30 miles from Dalian Medical University.

"20/20" visited the facility and found technicians working on the bodies of both animals and humans. When reporter Ross asked the company manager where the bodies come from and whether they were executed, the manager said he didn't know.

The show also found that Premier Exhibitions avoids laws pertaining to shipping human remains by labeling them "plastic models" on shipping documents.

Congressman Chris Smith, R-N.J., who has played a key role in promoting human rights reforms in China and elsewhere, told ABC the collection of "unclaimed" bodies in China for plastination shows "has every mark of executions and abuse."

Smith's spokesman is preparing a number of responses, including asking the House Foreign Affairs Committee to hold a hearing on the issue. Smith is a member of the committee. He also is drafting legislation to require independent certification that specimens in "Bodies" shows come from donors who have given consent.

In California, Democratic Assemblywoman Fiona Ma from San Francisco is sponsoring legislation in California demanding documentation of consent from donors before "Bodies" exhibitions can be shown in the state. Similar legislation is being considered in Washington and Pennsylvania.

N.Y. Attorney General Andrew Cuomo has launched his own investigation of Premier to determine the methods used to obtain the bodies exhibited in the United States. Premier says it will cooperate with the investigation.

School celebrates custodian of 35 years

Bobcats apparel in honor of Tindal's favorite basketball team. The kind-hearted custodian looked on from an honorary seat at the center of the stage as students from each grade sang songs and presented him with tokens of their appreciation.

"Gabe is a free-flowing spirit. His generosity, thoughtfulness and his love of life are quite evident in his everyday work," said Sister of St. Joseph Judy Monahan, pastoral associate at St. Ann Church.

Just days before the celebration, Tindal spent the morning cleaning storm drains in the middle of a downpour. Concerned the drains might overflow, he decided the job couldn't wait until after the storm.

It wasn't something he had to do, said Sister of St. Joseph Helene Nagle, principal. But going above and beyond the call of duty is something Tindal is known for.

Over the years, he has taken courses at Central Piedmont Community College in plumbing and electricity to become more proficient at his job.

"We do not need to call in extra help until we have exhausted Gabe," said Sister Nagle.

For Tindal, the best part of the job is making people happy. "I am thankful to God for giving me the strength to do these things I do," he said.

Tindal started the custodial job at St. Ann School on Feb. 28, 1973, just days after returning from military service in Vietnam. His mother was at the church for bingo one night when she heard an announcement saying the school was in need of a maintenance man.

Sister Nagle said, "She stood up and said 'My son will be here in the morning.'"

Tindal said he remembers showing up for his interview wearing bell bottom pants and sporting a medium-sized afro.

"I just got out of the military and I thought that was the way everybody dressed," he said.

To Tindal's surprise, he was hired on the spot and he has been there ever since. He has since become a permanent fixture at St. Ann School.

"He knows all the children; they're fascinated with him," said Sister Nagle.

Maybe it's because he's so tall; at 6-feet-7-inches, Tindal had a full basketball scholarship to Maryland State University before he was drafted for service in Vietnam. But more than likely it's because of his kind disposition.

"Everybody loves Gabe," said Sister Nagle.

Tindal, a member at Shiloh Baptist Church, said he has great respect for the Catholic faith. It is not uncommon to find him visiting the Blessed Sacrament in church two or three times a day, said Sister Nagle.

He jokingly admits he's outnumbered as a Baptist working at a Catholic school, but, he said, "We all love each other and that's what is so special about St. Ann's."

Tindal has certainly seen changes over the past 35 years. During his tenure, seven pastors, four principals, 112 staff and faculty members, and more than 9,000 students have passed through the halls of the school.

But the biggest change, he said, is that the kids are getting smarter.

"Not smart-mouthed," he clarified, "but 'education-wise,' kids are smarter and more creative."

However, one thing remains the same he said, and that's appreciation.

"Everybody shows their appreciation every day. That's where my energy and love come in."

As far as the future is concerned, Tindal said, "I'm going to hang in here as long as I can."

He says he doesn't foresee retirement until "I'm wore out and wore down and I don't feel that coming on too soon," he said. "I love these kids too much."

the International Eucharistic Congress, held in the beautiful North American city of Quebec - June 15th-22nd, 2008

Dear Friend in Christ,

This coming June of 2008, the Church in North America will celebrate a great event for the Faith, an event that is being watched with great anticipation.

The Holy Father has given me the privilege of leading this event, the International Eucharistic Congress, in Quebec City.

And I, in turn, have invited the Holy Father to celebrate our final Mass of the Congress.

Would there be a possibility that you and your family and friends might be able to join us in Quebec in June, and even to send us your support today?

The International Eucharistic Congress is a great opportunity for the new evangelization of North America. It is an occasion to rekindle the flame of the Catholic faith in our countries, where in the past there was a deep unity between the culture and the Faith.

Now, the urgency of Faith is obvious for an increasingly secular and materialistic world. It is not too late to regenerate Christian culture.

Each day, catechesis and testimonies will be offered to the thousands of participants—the present and the future leaders of the Church—and a solemn Eucharistic liturgy will be celebrated. There will also be processions of the Blessed Sacrament, as well as special religious events for young adults and families, and activities to promote brotherhood.

We hope that the International Eucharistic Congress will bring about a greater emphasis on the sacred character of the Eucharistic celebration, a deepened understanding of its sacrificial dimension, and a renewal of Eucharistic adoration, prayer, and good works.

This theme, the Eucharist as “Gift of God for the life of the world,” will begin with Sunday’s invocation of the Holy Spirit, who reminds the Church of all that Jesus did and then left in our care.

Monday will focus on Jesus’ institution of the New Covenant, completed by the offering of His own blood, while the following day concentrates on the sacrificial dimension of the Eucharist. Wednesday invites us to explore the first result of this gift of God; in giving Himself and in being received in the faith of the Church, the Eucharistic Christ founds the Church and opens up the communion of divine persons for the communion of human persons.

The Eucharist gives life to worship, which embraces all of life, prayers and ritual gestures, but also gives life to human relationships, work, joys and sorrows, sufferings and hopes. Thus, Thursday focuses on adoration, as the evening concludes with a public procession with the Blessed Sacrament in the heart of the city.

The theme of Friday is the Eucharist and mission: it emphasizes charity and engagement for peace and justice.

Finally, the week concludes with teaching on “ordinary” holiness at the heart of the world, inspired and nourished by the Eucharist.

At this great gathering, which will be closely watched and reported by the news media around the world, public testimonies for the essential role of the Faith and witness to the centrality of Jesus in our lives will give us an unparalleled opportunity to evangelize millions upon millions of people, and especially those in our troubled countries—for example, perhaps your own neighbors, family and friends!

First, by your fervent prayers to Almighty God that the Congress will reawaken the faith and ecclesial life of the people of Canada, especially the people of Quebec. For many dioceses throughout North America, there is a direct link to Quebec, which gave birth to the Church on our continent.

Second, the Eucharist is the source and summit of the Christian life, as Pope John Paul II, and now Pope Benedict XVI, have repeated so often in their magnificent teachings. We are invited to celebrate this Congress together.

Third, I invite you to help me to make this Eucharistic Congress a possibility, a reality, and a blessing for many people in Latin America and in the Third World who might never have the opportunity to experience the graces and blessings of the International Catholic gathering without your generosity and financial assistance.

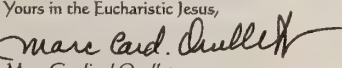

There will also be a myriad of other costs associated with an event of this magnitude – yet our budget is modest, and we seek only to cover what is necessary.

Without the support of our brothers and sisters in the Faith from the United States, our effort cannot be called a complete success.

We must not fail, with the eyes of a skeptical secular world and the media upon us. On the contrary, together, united with the Holy Father himself, we must show even the doubters the way to Christ!

I need your assistance, and I thank you in advance for your generosity in helping to make the International Eucharistic Congress accessible to many people.

Yours in the Eucharistic Jesus,

Marc Cardinal Ouellet
Archbishop of Quebec
Primate of Canada

A long overdue conversation

Leadership, action needed to eliminate poverty, racism

I think it is a "must read." I am referring to the eye-opening 22-page document on connections between racism and poverty released in January by Catholic Charities USA entitled "Poverty and Racism: Overlapping Threats to the Common Good."

The statement — available at www.catholiccharitiesusa.org/povertyandracismpaper, under "Poverty in America" — calls for a "long overdue conversation" about how racism contributes to poverty.

Catholic Charities USA wants to cut poverty in America in half by the year 2020 — a pretty ambitious goal it says cannot be addressed responsibly without considering the impact of racism.

Many believe racism, with some isolated and tragic exceptions, "is a matter of the past," the document says, adding, "at best, this thinking is naive. At worst, it is a delusion and an evasion of reality," for "racism has never been solely or principally about insults, slurs or exclusions. ... Racism today remains what it has always been: a defense of racial privilege" which operates outside of conscious awareness.

The document uses the term "white privilege" to describe "the network of racially conferred advantages" that benefit white Americans.

It also points out that "white privilege shifts the focus from how people of color are harmed by racism to how white Americans derive advantages because of it," even if those advantages are undesired by individual white Americans, legions of whom are at the forefront of calls for racial justice.

Yet the document doesn't just flaunt "white privilege" accusatorily; it gives audacious court rulings and shameful congressional legislation down through the ages that favored whites economically, leading to a "disproportionate impact of poverty upon groups of color today."

The document also gives several remedial public policy proposals advocated in Catholic Charities' 2006 policy paper "Poverty in America: A Threat to the Common Good."

Over the years the U.S. bishops collectively and individually have issued pastoral letters that are timeless in their articulation of the sin of racism and call to repentance.

What is needed now is implementation of measures that begin with changing public policy and praying for God to speak to hearts and transform shattered lives.

There is a rightness to Catholic Charities USA taking the lead on this one.

Like those first deacons who assisted with the charitable work of the early church, the mega-charity has stepped forward along with hundreds of thousands of supporters and some heavyweight partners — Bread for the World, the Catholic Health Association of the United States and the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, to name a few — to heed the bishops' call.

With over 1,700 local agencies and institutions across America that deal with the poor daily, Catholic Charities USA, based in Alexandria, Va., is uniquely positioned to begin a national dialogue on racism and poverty, according to its president, Father Larry Snyder.

He credits Father Bryan Massingale, an associate professor of theology at Marquette University, for drafting the core of the document.

"Poverty and Racism" acknowledges that its material and any ensuing discussion "is not an easy conversation, one that many of us might like to avoid" precisely because it "may evoke a range of emotions in us that may cause us to be very uncomfortable," to experience "anger, sadness, guilt or denial."

But talk, we must, it adamantly contends, "because the privileges of some are obtained at the expense of others. ... Because the prophets of the Gospels remind us that we are given to each other's care, and the measure of our response to the least among us is the measure of our response to God."

"People said cutting poverty in half by 2020 can't be done," explained Precious Blood Father Clarence Williams, Catholic Charities USA's senior director of racial equality and diversity initiatives.

"But then different groups decided that they would become involved. Where there is leadership, people will act," he said.

Mission discipleship brings core values to politics

It's a word they may not choose to use, but nonetheless many bishops of the Americas — the United States, Canada and Latin America — who met last month on Long Island, N.Y., were involved with "branding." Branding is a marketing term used to describe a core set of values that allow a product to be identified in the marketplace.

It was the 35th meeting of this hemisphere's bishops. Although it was not a decision-making session, there was agreement among the participants that bishops must lead "pastoral conversion" to help people live a life of discipleship and mission — to form missionary discipleship.

Pastoral conversion "is a very serious matter that calls for a fundamental re-examination of one's heart and the faith, and we don't do that easily," said Archbishop James Weisgerber, Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops president.

The core values — common good, subsidiarity, dignity of the human person, reverence for human life — by which Catholics should be identified in the public arena are increasingly important as the silly season of this interminable presidential election campaign is upon us.

Mission discipleship means becoming involved, knowing well what the faith teaches. This presumes knowledge by Catholics. This was the subject of a February seminar at Fairfield University dealing with how issues, values and media affect elections.

"All Catholics have a responsibility to vote and engage in the political process," said Jesuit Father Richard Ryscavage, director of Center for Faith and Public Life. "You cannot separate private spirituality from public responsibility for the common good of society. The role of the church is to teach the fundamental moral principals that apply."

As the field of political candidates narrows, the stage of attracting "the Catholic vote" begins. Catholics are not an affinity group to be wooed by visuals of politicians touring parochial schools or dining with prelates at banquets. Candidates must impress Catholics by their adherence to the moral principles we hold.

The bishops' responsibility is to teach, following Christ's dictate to teach, Father Ryscavage said, while the laity's role is to become involved in politics.

Kentucky's bishops described this role well in a recent pastoral: Bishops are "to provide the moral analysis of the major issues confronting society." Given those tools, the responsibility is to measure candidates against those standards.

Bishops are similar to coaches as they teach, guide and encourage, and then stay on the sidelines as the missionary disciples, armed with a deep understanding of core values, take to the field.

Holy Thursday: A memory lane to remember, inspire

The Last Supper connects us with our past and future

The Eucharist is a like a memorial or "memory lane banquet." We remember and re-enact what happened 21 centuries ago during the Last Supper.

The Eucharist makes sense when it becomes part of our lives and our history; the history of the past becomes the story of the present. The Eucharist must also be understood in terms of humility and service, which becomes action. The difficulty in this century is not in understanding Jesus' teaching, but in following Jesus. There is a world of difference between talking about love and putting love into action, between making an efficient plan of service and actually serving others.

The primitive church linked baptism with the Eucharist through the washing of the feet — as the water cleanses our feet from dust and sweat, so in baptism it cleanses our soul from the original sin.

Just as Christ broke the bread that night, the Eucharist shows us that we are all broken bread; yet we are valuable bread crumbs because together we form the Body of Christ.

During that Last Supper, Christ performed the greatest miracle by changing the bread into his body, the wine into his blood. This miracle happened for the first time 21 centuries ago, and it continues to happen every day, every time the priest celebrates Mass.

And every Holy Thursday, we hold in our hands our past, our present and our future.

We know that the Eucharist does not complete the work of redemption without the cross on Good Friday and the empty tomb on Easter Sunday. Even the resurrection does not end the work of our redemption — it simply begins the process. Our redemption is "unfinished business."

Our redemption is our challenge — to continue what Christ began. It's time for us to get to work. Happy Easter!

A happy death

It is comforting to be recognized as a person when dying

My Aunt Pat died recently. She was a few days short of her 91st birthday.

A lot can be said about her long and satisfying life, but it is her dying that I want to focus on. Her death reminds us of how important a presence the church can be in our living and dying.

The first thing to note about her death is that she was fortunate to be visited by a priest. I anointed her twice. It helps to have a priest in the family.

Two days before Aunt Pat died I got a call from my cousin Mike. He asked me to go anoint his mother and pray with her. In the phrase of my generation, he asked me to "give her the last rites."

Today it is nearly impossible to be sure that every Catholic is seen by a priest. There just aren't enough priests.

In some dioceses in the Midwest more than half of the parishes have no resident priest. In my own experience, I probably anoint three or four people per week, sometimes more.

I have a nursing home and a hospital in the boundaries of the parish. I have 3,000 parishioners. I can't be present to every person.

The second thing to note is that people wait too long to call the priest. Often they wait until the person is unconscious or even dead.

Sacraments are for the living, not the dead.

The "last rites" include confession, communion and the anointing of the sick. Two of these "rites" require consciousness.

I was glad that my aunt was still able to appreciate what we were doing. While she could not swallow, at least we could touch the Eucharist to her tongue.

She was also able to pray along with us. When we made the sign of the cross, she followed. She joined hands and said the Lord's Prayer with us.

She held out her hands for the sacrament of the sick. She knew she was dying. She accepted it stoically, but she wanted the sacraments.

The third thing about my aunt's death is that she was surrounded by those who love her as she went to God. Often this is not the case.

I was also glad that we had enough notice to allow me time to pick up Aunt Pat's sister, my mother. Mom is nearly 88. These two old women needed to see each other before death separated them.

After all, they had nine decades of shared life. Only they could bring and receive the comfort of a lifetime to each other.

Catholics pray to St. Joseph for a happy death. By that we mean that we should die in a state of grace surrounded by those who love us.

My aunt had a happy death.

But many do not.

Often people die alone. Recently I was called to the bed of a woman in a nursing home. She was alone. No family members visited her. She spoke only Polish.

The staff told me that she was noncommunicative. But I suspected that she was dehydrated. So I took a straw and put a few drops on her tongue.

She moved. I put more drops on her tongue. She swallowed. Then she spoke weakly.

I started the prayers. She made the sign of the cross. She was not noncommunicative. She was ignored.

It is a great comfort to be recognized as a person when we are dying. We have a history. We have a faith.

It should be honored, so as many as possible can die a happy death.

Pope discusses important papal legacy of St. Leo the Great

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The pope's roles as a teacher and preacher, as a promoter of peace and as the chief servant of Christian unity are seen clearly in the life and work of St. Leo the Great, Pope Benedict XVI said.

The saint, who served as Pope Leo I from 440 to 461, was "one of the greatest popes that ever honored the Roman see, contributing much to reinforcing its authority and prestige," Pope Benedict said.

The pope spoke about St. Leo during his March 5 general audience at the Vatican.

He said that the earliest examples of papal homilies and preaching that exist today are from St. Leo, and they give a picture of a pope "who gathered the people around him."

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

Continuing our catechesis on the Fathers of the Church, we turn to St. Leo the Great, one of the most influential popes in history.

He was born in Tuscany and became bishop of Rome in 440 during times of severe social unrest. Since the Roman emperor's authority had practically disappeared in the West, and Italy was suffering from frequent barbarian incursions, Pope Leo took it upon himself to protect Rome.

His courageous meeting in Mantua with Attila the Hun, whom he convinced to desist from his plans to devastate the city, is the most well known, but not the only event of its kind.

Pope Leo promoted the primacy of the bishop of Rome as the successor of the Apostle Peter, and exercised this ministry in the East and the West with great prudence, pastoral sensitivity and wisdom.

The bishops attending the important Council of Chalcedon in 451 acclaimed the text he sent concerning faith in Jesus, true God and true man, with the words: "Peter has spoken through the mouth of Leo."

Thanks to Pope Leo's sermons and letters, we can still appreciate his zeal and charity as pastor of the church, and his theological depth and clarity.

He also shares with us his profound understanding of the liturgy, where he sees the mysteries of salvation as present to our time and influential in our everyday realities.

May the life and example of Pope St. Leo always remind us that the encounter with God in Christ is the source of our joy and our salvation!

The line between trust and neglect

When parents, teens work together, good things happen

Several Saturdays ago I spent a few hours with about 60 high school boys and girls and their parents listening to them talk about better parent-teen communication regarding sex, alcohol and drugs.

The question for parents that kept popping into my mind was: "Where does trust end and neglect begin?"

The teenagers want to be trusted. The parents want to trust. But parental unease surfaces as the potential for parental neglect in the face of possibly unwise and risky teenage behavior rises.

Where do you draw the line between trust and neglect? Surely, no parent wants to be guilty of neglect, just as all parents want to trust their offspring.

The question provides a nice framework for great conversations if both parents and teenagers are willing to talk. Doing it in groups with other parents and teens seems to improve the acoustics for the desired exchange.

The conversation, as I heard it, turned on issues of (1) curfew, (2) driving — who's in the car? who's at the wheel? where are you going?, (3) friends — who do you hang out with?, (4) honesty, (5) pregnancy, (6) the Internet and (7) trust.

In families, the participants seemed to agree, there is a need for "consistency" and there has to be agreement on the "irreversibles" in the ongoing discussions about "boundaries."

Communication is, of course, at the heart of dealing with these issues. The teens have to be permitted to speak up openly about what they perceive to be double standards (e.g., some parents drink and drive).

Parents have to explain their "need to verify" (e.g., call the parents of a teen who is hosting the party).

Expert facilitators were on hand to provide technical information on drugs and alcohol. It was helpful to dig a bit for answers to the question of why kids drink: To have fun? Try to cope? Or just see what it's like? Similarly with drugs.

Notably absent from the conversation was any reference to religion, although all four of the schools represented were Catholic. Nor was much said about the need to establish baseline respect for human dignity.

That would cover respect for self as well as others as a bedrock principle of right, fair and just behavior.

I also noticed that no one suggested the value of service projects in getting teens "out of themselves" and into growth-producing character development. Not that the participants were unaware of this; they just didn't bring it up.

No mention was made of shared work, parents and teens working together on meaningful projects. That used to happen a generation or two ago when it was not uncommon for a small-scale family business to provide Saturday and summer employment for the kids.

Those opportunities produced for the young a lot more than spending money.

And it is worth noting that the school that hosted the gathering and the other three that participated had very little to do with the design, promotion and provision of the program.

This was the work of one mother whose children are all grown with families of their own. She decided that it would be useful and just went ahead and put it all together.

It would be too facile to say that anyone could do it.

But it is not wide of the mark to suggest that this intergenerational exchange of experience and information could be happening on a much larger scale if more good people step up and decide to make it happen.

"In some parts, people are afraid ... of reprisals."

Conflict in Colombia

Archbishop says Chavez boosts tensions with Colombia by moving troops

BY MIKE CEASER
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

BOGOTA, Colombia — A Venezuelan archbishop criticized Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez for escalating tensions after Colombian soldiers killed guerrillas on Ecuadorean soil.

Chavez "cannot carry the country into an armed conflict just because he feels like it," said Archbishop Roberto Luckert Leon of Coro, whose remarks were reported by Colombian media.

"He has to consult with the country," said the archbishop.

Archbishop Luckert, vice president of the Venezuelan bishops' conference, criticized Chavez for moving troops to the border of Colombia after the March 1 incident.

He said Chavez, who has clashed repeatedly with the Catholic Church leadership, was "exacerbating Venezuelan nationalism over a confrontation which is not our own."

The Colombian military killed Luis Devia Silva, known as Raul Reyes, the second in command of Colombia's largest guerrilla group, together with 16 other guerrillas.

It was the Colombian military's hardest blow against the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, which has fought for more than four decades to overthrow Colombia's elected governments.

The Colombian military said it attacked the guerrilla camp with missiles launched from Colombian airspace, and that afterward soldiers crossed the border to retrieve some of the bodies, as well as computers and other evidence.

The Colombians' entry into Ecuadorean territory triggered angry responses from Ecuador and Venezuela; both ordered troops to the border and withdrew their ambassadors from Colombia.

Reached by telephone in the Colombian province of Putumayo, near the border with Ecuador, Father Julio Cesar Urbano said things were calm, but tense.

"In some parts, people are afraid ... of reprisals from one side or the other," he said.

A spokeswoman for the Colombian bishops' conference said she expected a statement on the situation March 5, when a regional meeting of the presidents of the bishops' conferences was to begin.

Political observers speculated that the guerrilla leader's killing could complicate efforts to negotiate the freedom of some of the hundreds of hostages held by the guerrillas.

The Catholic Church had acted as a mediator between the government and guerrillas, until being marginalized by the involvement of Chavez, who is widely seen as sympathetic to the guerrillas' cause.

Others suggested that the guerrillas were near defeat.

Retired Bishop Fabian Marulanda Lopez of Florencia, secretary-general of the Colombian bishops' conference, called Reyes' death "a hard blow" for the guerrillas and said he hoped the FARC would have "a sensible reaction" and not carry out reprisals against the hostages, but instead return to negotiations.

Colombian officials said that in the computers retrieved from the guerrilla camp they discovered documents linking the Ecuadorean and Venezuelan governments with the guerrillas, as well as reports of a $300,000 payment by the Venezuelan government to the guerrillas.

Some analysts suggested that Chavez was exploiting the episode to distract attention from domestic problems, including high inflation and the scarcity of some food staples.

Analysts also predicted that the episode would wind down, because the neighboring countries are highly dependent on each other economically.

For example, Archbishop Luckert pointed out that most agricultural workers in Venezuela's Zulia state are Colombians, and that if they returned home farming "would become paralyzed."

A LITTLE MISTAKE

Uriel Little, a former member of St. Louise de Marillac Parish in Arabi, La., stands next to a Katrina memorial in Shell Beach, La., dedicated to the 137 residents of St. Bernard Parish, a civil entity, who perished during the 2005 storm. Little, who was evacuated to Texas two days before the storm, was presumed dead and his name is inscribed on the memorial.

Man thought to have perished in Katrina is alive and kicking

NEW ORLEANS (CNS) — First, the good news. Uriel Little, 76, is alive and kicking.

What has Little scratching his head these days — two and a half years after he was evacuated from St. Bernard Manor before Hurricane Katrina hit — is a stately stone monument erected Aug. 29, 2007, by St. Bernard Parish, a civil entity, to honor the 137 St. Bernard residents who perished during the storm.

The name "URIEL LITTLE" is chiseled into the stone.

Displaying his wry sense of humor, Little said it just isn't so.

Little, a former member of St. Louise de Marillac Church in Arabi, was evacuated to Texas two days before the storm.

He spent many months at apartments operated by Christopher Homes, the New Orleans archdiocesan housing agency, and is now living in an assisted living apartment at St. Margaret's Daughters Nursing Home in New Orleans.

How did Little feel when relatives told him about his being memorialized on the stone monument on the banks of the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet at Shell Beach?

"I didn't think it was too good — but as long as it wasn't true, that's the main thing," Little said, smiling.

Little's sister, Sylvia Little Costanza, said she knew something was amiss many months after the storm when her brother's name continued to show up in local newspaper stories chronicling who had died during the storm.

She called the newspaper and even the St. Bernard Parish coroner's office to make sure they knew her brother was still alive.

"Then lo and behold, we got a call from someone that his name was on the monument," she said.

Ricky Melerine, St. Bernard councilman at large, was the councilman for the district that pushed for the erection of the monument along with a striking 13-foot-by-7-foot stainless steel cross set into the waters of the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet.

Melerine said he was "pretty sure" the list of the deceased came from the coroner's office, and he was surprised the mistake is only now coming to light.

"As far as taking his name off, it won't be hard. I think we can go in there — with filler material — and polish it up," said Melerine.

Costanza drove Little to the monument for the first time recently, and he kept his spirits high.

"I guess I'm going to get arrested for false advertising," he said.

"You look pretty good," Costanza told her brother.

Britain repeals act criminalizing blasphemy against Christianity

LONDON (CNS) — The criminal offense of blasphemy against Christianity has been abolished in England and Wales.

The House of Lords voted to support a government amendment to the Criminal Justice and Immigration Bill to scrap the act, which dates back more than 300 years.

Baroness Andrews, communities minister, told Britain's House of Lords, where the bill is in its final stages, that the 1697 Blasphemy Act was anachronistic and had "fallen into disuse."

She said legal protections guaranteed to religious believers by the Racial and Religious Hatred Act 2006 meant that the law could be "safely repealed."

"As long as this law remains on the statute book, it hinders the U.K.'s ability to challenge oppressive blasphemy laws in other jurisdictions, including those used to persecute vulnerable Christian minorities," she said during the March 5 debate. "It is not an attack on the sacred in our society."

However, Baroness O'Cathain, a Conservative Party member, said that "abolishing the blasphemy law does not demonstrate neutrality; rather it contributes to a wider campaign for the adoption of a secular constitution, which ... would actually be hostile to religion."

She said the amendment "proposes to legalize the most intense and abusive attacks on Christ."

The Church of England announced earlier this year that it was not opposed to repeal of the blasphemy laws.

But in a Feb. 29 letter to Hazel Blears, secretary of state for communities and local government, the two most senior Anglican prelates, Archbishops Rowan Williams of Canterbury and John Sentamu of York, sought assurances that the amendment "should not be capable of interpretation as a secularizing move, or as a general license to attack or insult religious beliefs and believers."

Vatican official: Social effects of sin greater than ever

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — In today's globalized culture, the social effects of sin are greater than ever before and deserve the church's urgent attention, a Vatican official said.

New forms of sin have arisen in the area of biotechnology, economics and ecology, and many involve questions of individual rights and wider social effects, said Bishop Gianfranco Girotti.

Bishop Girotti is an official of the Apostolic Penitentiary, an office that deals with questions relating to penance and indulgences. He made the comments in an interview March 8.

Bishop Girotti said the sense of sin in today's world should be even more acute than before, since the effects of sin are often widespread.

"If yesterday's sin had a rather individualistic dimension, today it has an impact and resonance that is above all social, because of the great phenomenon of globalization," he said. "In effect, attention to sin is a more urgent task today, precisely because its consequences are more abundant and more destructive."

Among the "new sins" he said were genetic experiments and manipulation that violate fundamental human rights and produce effects difficult to foresee and control.

Other areas where sin has a social impact include drug abuse; economic injustice, which has left the poor even poorer and the rich richer; and environmental irresponsibility.

Bishop Girotti was asked about sin among the church's own members, a reference to priestly sex abuse.

"One cannot underrate the objective seriousness of a series of acts that have recently been reported and that carry with them the signs of the church's human and institutional fragility," he said. But he said it should also be recognized that the church reacted to these reports and is continuing to do so, with "rigorous interventions and initiatives" aimed at protecting the church's good name and the people of God.

Vatican official concerned about Catholic-Orthodox document on church

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The secretary of the Vatican Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith said he had concerns about a recent Catholic-Orthodox document on the nature of the church.

Archbishop Angelo Amato said the document of the international Catholic-Orthodox dialogue commission appeared to rely too heavily on Orthodox terminology and did not give enough emphasis to the Catholic position that the jurisdictional primacy of the pope is an essential part of the structure and nature of the church.

"One cannot give a precise theological identity of the universal church without referring to the pope's primacy of jurisdiction," the archbishop said March 8. "Primacy is not an optional addition, but is an essential element."

The document, "Ecclesiological and Canonical Consequences of the Sacramental Nature of the Church: Ecclesial Communion, Conciliarity and Authority," was finalized by the dialogue commission when it met in October in Ravenna, Italy.

When it was published, the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity, coordinator of the Catholic side of the dialogue, said, "The document represents the outcome of the work of a commission and should not be understood as an official declaration of the church's teaching."

Joint statements from the ecumenical dialogues in which the Catholic Church engages routinely are sent to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith for review and comment.

Addressing the statements made by Archbishop Amato, Msgr. Eleuterio Fortino, undersecretary of the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity, said the document itself explained that it was just "the first document on the subject" and that the question of papal primacy would be studied in the next round of Catholic-Orthodox talks.

And, the monsignor said, the archbishop's assertion that the language used in the document was "closer to the Orthodox ecclesiological tradition than to the Catholic" was "not exact."

Archbishop Amato said he saw an overreliance on Orthodox terms "where, for example, it speaks of synodality instead of collegiality." But, Msgr. Fortino said the document begins by explaining that "the two terms are synonymous."

Seeking agreement that would lead to full unity between Catholics and Orthodox, the dialogue commission's document tried to explain how communion and authority are expressed and exercised on local, regional and universal levels within the one church of Christ.

Pope establishes new diocese in Puerto Rico

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI has established the Diocese of Fajardo-Humacao, Puerto Rico, and named Father Eusebio Ramos Morales to be its first bishop.

The new diocese, the sixth in Puerto Rico, was announced March 11 with territory taken from the Archdiocese of San Juan and the Diocese of Caguas.

Bishop-designate Ramos was born in Maunabo Dec. 15, 1952. He studied philosophy and theology at Bayamon Central University in Puerto Rico and at St. Vincent de Paul Regional Seminary in Boynton Beach, Fla. He also earned a degree in theology from the Pontifical Gregorian University in Rome.

According to the Vatican, 293,000 people live in the new diocese and almost 98,000 of them are Catholic. There are 21 parishes in the diocese, served by 17 diocesan priests and five priests belonging to religious orders. There are three seminarians, 21 permanent deacons and religious women from five different orders working in the new diocese.

'Becoming disciples'

Catechists explore new curriculum for youths

HICKORY — Parish catechetical leaders recently learned about nurturing disciples during a curriculum development workshop.

Approximately 35 people attended "Becoming Disciples: A Curriculum for Elementary and Middle School Catechesis" at the Catholic Conference Center in Hickory March 6.

The workshop was sponsored by the diocesan Office of Faith Formation.

"The idea behind the workshop was to present and explain a curriculum for kindergarten through eighth grade based on the six tasks of catechesis contained in the General Directory for Catechesis issued by the Vatican," said Dr. Cris Villapando, director of diocesan faith formation programs.

The six tasks are knowledge of the faith, liturgical education, moral formation, teaching to pray, education for community life and missionary initiation.

Attendees reviewed information from "Becoming Disciples," a curriculum utilized for elementary and middle school catechesis in the Diocese of Wilmington, Del.

The presenters were Sister Sally Russell, a Sister of St. Joseph, and Sister Elaine McCarron, a Sister of Charity of Nazareth.

Sister Russell is assistant director of religious education for the Diocese of Wilmington. Sister McCarron has served as a representative for catechesis and multicultural concerns in the U.S. Catholic Conference's Department of Education.

"In this current presentation of our ancient, ever-new faith, Sister Sally and Sister Elaine reinforced the words of the General Directory of Catechesis," said Villapando.

The faith formation office is a ministry supported by contributions to the Diocesan Support Appeal.

Keeping the cold at bay

New furnace warms Our Lady of Guadalupe Mission for winter Masses

BY JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
CORRESPONDENT

CHEROKEE — For the first time in some 20 winters, parishioners and visitors to Our Lady of Guadalupe Mission in Cherokee are enjoying Sunday Mass — in the church.

Thanks to benefactors' generosity that resulted in a new furnace, Mass can be celebrated in the church year-round instead of just during warm weather.

Parishioners and visitors watched as Father Shawn O'Neal, pastor, stood in the doorway of the furnace room and blessed the new heating system March 9. Then everyone marched into the church to begin Mass in the pleasantly warm building.

If not for the new furnace, they would have been gathering in the parish's Kateri Center, named for Blessed Kateri Tekakwitha, a Mohawk Indian who is the first Native American to be considered for sainthood.

Our Lady of Guadalupe Mission seats 200, but cold weather froze people out.

Parishioner Jane Powers recalled that if more than 35 people were present for

"It's wonderful. I've been coming here for 27 years and have been a parishioner for six years. I've been waiting for this."

— Jane Powell

Mass in the winter, the crowd overflowed the Kateri Center, with worshipers standing in the narrow hall that separates the center from the church.

"It's wonderful," Powers said of the new heating system.

"I've been coming here for 27 years and have been a parishioner for six years. I've been waiting for this," she said.

"We tried to have a Christmas vigil Mass here four years ago and it was just too cold. It was Christmas Eve and people were huddled in the hallway," Powell said.

Our Lady of Guadalupe Mission is built in the shape of a seven-sided Cherokee council house, such as were common in Cherokee villages prior to the forced removal of the Cherokee people in 1838.

The ceiling slopes down from a height of 40 feet at its center to 15-18 feet around the church's sides.

The church's previous inefficient system couldn't produce enough heat to warm the church, even after ceiling fans were installed a few years ago to pull heat back down from the ceiling in winter and to cool the church in the summer.

During summers, the church is often packed with parishioners and tourists. In earlier years, the Kateri Center could hold the small number of people who attended Sunday Mass in winter.

Altar server Harmer Weichel and Father Shawn O'Neal process out at the end of the first wintertime Mass in Our Lady of Guadalupe Mission March 9, the first in more than 20 years.

"We have only about 30 families who are parishioners, and 10 of them are seasonal," Father O'Neal said. "This is fewer than 15 to 20 years ago when more parishioners worked for the Bureau of Indian Affairs."

However, with the casino and with more tourists visiting Cherokee in cold weather, the Kateri Center's capacity couldn't always handle increased Mass attendance.

Our Lady of Guadalupe Mission's parish council decided it was time for better heating.

"We started getting bids from different companies," Father O'Neal said. "I just happened to mention to a friend of mine (Janet Coffey) in Mint Hill that we were looking for a new heating system. She said, 'Oh, you ought to talk to my stepdad; he's involved with that.'"

Coffey's stepdad, Frank Ciucevich, a parishioner at St. Luke Church in Mint Hill, has considerable experience in analyzing bids in his work with a general and mechanical contractor company.

Ciucevich recommended several firms in the Cherokee area that would give the parish what it needed and at the best price.

Ciucevich "looked at the bids and talked to the companies involved, and parishioners did too, so that everyone stayed involved and informed," Father O'Neal said.

As the March 9 Mass concluded, Father O'Neal gave thanks for everyone's generosity — parishioners, other members of the local community and seasonal visitors.

Many of the benefactors were relatives of one parishioner, 88-year-old Myrtle LaShomb, a member of the Eastern Band of Cherokee who died last December.

Contributions totaled about $7,300, of which $6,500 paid for the furnace, installation, electrical work and modifications to the propane system.

Cries of hunger

In the steep, remote mountains of Guatemala, hunger is all too common.

Subsistence farmers have been devastated by drought, poor harvests and other factors beyond their control. Sadly, the widespread hunger's greatest toll is on children.

For many little ones, malnutrition has become a chilling adversary that threatens their young lives. They currently exist on a meager diet consisting mainly of corn, but this is not enough to sustain their frail bodies. Many of these young ones are in danger of starvation.

Guatemala has the highest child malnutrition rate in Latin America. Almost half of the children under age 5 are chronically malnourished, and many young ones in remote areas have died from starvation. Local doctors in the region worry that even more children will die if they don't receive food.

"I'm frustrated because I want to help, but I have no food to give them. We don't have the resources," said Dr. Marco Gutiérrez, director of a Guatemalan health program.

"...the children beg for bread, but no one gives it to them."
(Lamentations 4:4b, NIV)

Throughout Guatemala, starvation threatens the lives of thousands of innocent children. These children are in critical need of your help.

Even though the situation is grim, one mother's steadfast faith sustains her — even after she helplessly watched her son perish from starvation. Santos Gutiérrez' 6-year-old son died from malnutrition. Guillermo fought bravely until the very end and kept saying that he did not want to leave his little brother. As they buried the young boy, his mother begged her pastor, "Please help us; we do not want this to happen to our other children."

Despite such a tragedy, Guillermo's mother still has hope in God's goodness. Santos has faith that Guillermo's siblings — Carmen, 4, and Edelce, 3 — will live.

If she finds food, Santos gives it to her children and goes hungry herself. "But there are times when there is no food for anyone," she says. "We know God is the one who leads us, and this is why we're still alive. I ask God to give me patience and to give me something for the children."

Santos Gutiérrez clutches her son weeks before his death, caused by complications of chronic malnutrition.

At Food For The Poor, we reach out to help desperate mothers like Santos by sending food to feed their hungry little ones. We are an interdenominational ministry that works in Guatemala and other countries to provide desperately needed food and other lifesaving aid to poverty-stricken families. But we rely on the compassion and generosity of people like you to make this possible.

Founded in 1982, Food For The Poor works to end the suffering of the poor in the Caribbean and Latin America. Not only do we provide food for the starving, but we also build small houses for the destitute, dig water wells for parched villagers, provide medicine and medical equipment for the sick and elderly, support orphanages and education for children, and much more. Fundraising and other administrative costs comprise less than 4% of our expenses; more than 96% of all donations go directly to programs that help the poor.

We partner with local churches, missionaries and other ministries to serve our poorest brothers and sisters efficiently and effectively. Our mission is to connect the church of the First World with the church of the Third World in a manner that benefits both. We invite and encourage you to partner with us in this mission.

You can help ease the pain and suffering of innocent, hungry children in Guatemala and elsewhere. Today, you can help feed hungry little ones and calm their mothers' fears.

No child should have to suffer from starvation. No mother should have to watch her children slowly starve to death. You have the power to bring a grateful smile to a mother's face and save a precious life through your gift for food today.

Please remember to pray for all innocent children who face the agony of constant hunger. They desperately need our prayers and support.

Your gift of just $45 will feed 15 children for a month

At Food For The Poor, we believe that by serving our hungry brothers and sisters we serve our Lord. But we need your help in feeding the poor.

Because we acquire and ship food items in bulk, we are able to feed a child for an entire month for only $3. Your gift of just $45 will feed 15 children, and $81 will feed 27 children who are on the brink of starvation.

Please, be as generous as you possibly can and help Food For The Poor feed precious children. Use the postage-paid envelope in the brochure located in this publication to send your gift today. May God bless you for your compassion.

Catholic Daughters court celebrates 75 years

in Durham, Jacksonville, Greensboro and Statesville attended the event.

Essie Walker, Court Charlotte regent, said one of the best parts of being a Catholic Daughter is the camaraderie with other members.

"I've learned from the older members in the court. I've become more spiritual and I've learned more about my Catholic faith by being a Catholic Daughter," said Walker.

The organization is open to Catholic lay and religious women, 18 years or older, who love and support the church.

Ruth Carlisle, longtime member and past national director, was presented with an apostolic blessing in honor of her commitment to the Catholic Daughters.

Carlisle spoke fondly of her years as a Catholic Daughter, and credited unity and charity as the values that bond the group.

"We reach out to one another," she said.

They also reach out to the community. Court Charlotte's most significant charitable contribution is their support of A Child's Place, a collaborative effort between the Charlotte community and Charlotte-Mecklenburg Schools that aims to provide stable and appropriate education to homeless students.

The Catholic Daughters donate food and school supplies to the organization.

They also contribute to national Catholic Daughter charities.

"I've become more spiritual ... by being a Catholic Daughter."

— Essie Walker

"We're a very giving group," said Walker.

Founded in 1903 by the Knights of Columbus in Utica, N.Y., the Catholic Daughters of the Americas is one of the largest organizations of Catholic women in the world. It is made up of Catholic lay and religious women who show their love and support of the church through participation in social and charitable activities.

Court Charlotte was instituted on March 29, 1933. Over the past 75 years, they have been instrumental in supporting the church. Some of their most notable efforts include hosting ordination receptions; contributing to the seminarian fund; supporting Holy Angels, a facility for adults and children with mental retardation in Belmont; and assisting the Knights of Columbus in their various ministries.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis, who attended the event, thanked them for their years of service and called the organization "a witness to Christ and to the faith."

"As the current bishop of Charlotte, I am very grateful for the long history that you've had in helping the church to grow in North Carolina," he told them.

and monks from Belmont Abbey.

"The world of today teaches us to adore ourselves, our own egos, what we want to be fulfilled," said Bishop Jugis.

"But we know by faith that we are to adore Jesus. In eucharistic adoration, we are adoring Jesus, and adoration of Jesus is healthy for the soul," he said.

"Humility is essential for adoration. To adore Jesus properly, it must come from a humble heart," said the bishop.

The pilgrimage, a day of prayer and reflection, was part of the diocese's preparation for the fourth diocesan Eucharistic Congress, themed "It Is Jesus Whom We Proclaim," to be held at the Charlotte Convention Center Oct. 3-4.

The theme, said Bishop Jugis, was inspired by St. Paul, as the fourth Eucharistic Congress will fall during a special Pauline year convoked by Pope Benedict XVI to celebrate the 2,000th year of St. Paul's birth.

"We picked a theme that relates to St. Paul and what he lived and stood for — to proclaim Christ," said Bishop Jugis.

"You, as Catholic Christians, also should proclaim Christ in your lives. Everything we do should be permeated by Christ — our actions, behavior, speech," the bishop told the youths.

But the only way to truly proclaim Christ is to know and love him, said Bishop Jugis.

"You have to open your heart to Jesus and let him guide you. Then all you do will proclaim Christ," he said.

Bishop Jugis said the pilgrimage should be seen as an opportunity to spend personal time with Jesus.

With a young person's commitments of school, homework and after-school activities, "it's a privilege you don't often get. Today is Jesus' time," said Bishop Jugis.

"In today's busy world, it (the pilgrimage) is a moment for young people to reflect on what Lent is really about," said Dr. William Thierfelder, president of Belmont Abbey College.

"It's a time to reflect on, 'Are we doing as much as we're capable of doing?'" he said.

Thierfelder challenged the youths to recommit themselves during Lent to bring Christ's Word to others.

Adam Trufant, a Belmont Abbey College sophomore who recently spent a month in China, told the youths that their ability to openly practice their religion and adore Jesus is a blessing.

"The Catholics in China don't have the grace of adoration chapels ... their religion is regulated by the government," he said.

"I heard about villagers sneaking out in the middle of the night to visit adoration chapels ... and when they did, it was their time with Jesus, regardless of the law," said Trufant. "I realized how blessed we are to have adoration in our churches. We are so, so blessed."

Carlos Lopez, 18, and Steven Suarez, 15, both parishioners of St. Dorothy Church in Lincolnton, said they attended the pilgrimage to deepen their faith.

"In school, my (non-Catholic) friends have questions about the rosary, priests, confession," said Steven. "I want to be able to stand up and explain it."

"This is the most influential time for young people, when they will be making choices that will direct their lives," said Jenny Ryan, director of Catholic campus ministry at Belmont Abbey College.

"This is a time to praise God, and events like this give them a good foundation for the future," she said.

"They need proper balance in their lives, between school, work and prayer," said Thierfelder. "This helps give them some of the balance they need."

"There are times when we don't always understand the miracle of Jesus before us," said Trufant to his peers. "Don't doubt in darkness. Ask Jesus for confidence in the Eucharist to bring about a more beautiful world."

Irish church officials step up campaign against abuse of Mass cards

BY MICHAEL KELLY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

DUBLIN, Ireland — Catholic Church officials in Ireland are stepping up the campaign against so-called "Mass traffickers," people who make money from the commercial abuse of the Mass.

Bishop Colm O'Reilly of Ardagh said church officials are "extremely concerned about the sale of presigned Mass cards in shops for commercial gain."

"It's an enormous industry and there's a huge amount of money to be made out of it; it's deplorable," he said.

The Mass cards in question are on sale in hundreds of newsstands around Ireland and have a preprinted signature purporting to be that of a missionary priest. The cost is supposed to be the offering for the Mass.

However, church authorities believe that as much as 70 percent of the offering stays with the local shop while the remaining 30 percent is pocketed by the distributor, who makes unspecified contributions — if any — to the priest.

Missionary orders are concerned that unsuspecting members of the public may be buying these Mass cards in the hope that they are contributing to the missions.

"The public are being duped into believing that they are supporting charitable work in the Third World," said Father Fachtna O'Driscoll, Irish provincial of the Society of African Missions.

"There is no transparency or accountability in this trade, and it diminishes the trust and confidence of the public in charities," he said.

Father Patrick Courtney, provincial of the Missionaries of the Sacred Heart, warned that "a new feature of the trade

"It's an enormous industry and there's a huge amount of money to be made out of it."

— Bishop Colm O'Reilly

is the printing of signatures ... that are illegible, and therefore cannot be traced by the church authorities."

"The kernel of the problem is that commercial interests — who are not charities, nor do they state that they are charities — are mimicking the normal administration of Mass cards," he said.

The missionary orders are calling on the government to tackle the problem in the Charities Bill, which currently is going through the legislature.

Pat Carey, the minister of state responsible for the legislation, has told church officials that when the bill is enacted the "purchase of signed Mass cards would be regarded as making a charitable gift for the advancement of religion and would necessitate registration of the beneficiary."

"In the future, if Mass cards sold in such a manner did not have a statement that the beneficiary is registered as a charity in Ireland, the public would be right to have concerns about the organization producing them," he said.

However, Carey refused to say whether the government intended to make this a criminal offense. The minister said he was seeking the advice of the attorney general before bringing the legislation back to the committee stage in the legislature.

Our focus should be on Jesus, not material things

BY JEFF HEDGLEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

I walked into the house to a familiar sight, the light blinking on the answering machine.

Who could it be this time? Maybe it's another recorded message from Senator McCain asking for my support in the upcoming election, or a friend who I haven't heard from in a while, or maybe some well-deserving cause asking for support?

As it turns out, it was a "Happy Anniversary" message from the dealership where I purchased my truck.

Needless to say, I was a bit surprised. It sent my mind back two years to when, at the age of 40, I purchased my first brand new vehicle.

I remember being so proud and joyous at finally owning the truck I had been dreaming about since I first moved to Texas 25 years earlier.

My happy trip down memory lane came to an abrupt halt when I sat down to prepare this column.

I ran smack dab into St. Paul saying, "If then you were raised with Christ, seek what is above, where Christ is seated at the right hand of God. Think of what is above, not of what is on earth."

Paul's words brought back another memory from two years ago: I remember driving home from the truck dealership with mixed feelings. Sure, I was very happy, but in the back of my mind, I wondered if I was a bit too happy with my new toy.

All of us can fall under the spell of materialism. I suppose the first-century Christians may have been having similar problems that prompted Paul to challenge them to seek what is above, not what is on the earth.

The resurrection of Jesus is the single most important event in human history. Without it our faith is useless and our hope is for naught. It redefines everything for us.

Yes, the things of this earth can tempt us to focus on the here and now, but Easter is the great day that shifts our gaze from here to the hereafter.

Questions:

What are the things of earth that hold your attention? What are some things you can do to refocus on what is above?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"If then you were raised with Christ, seek what is above, where Christ is seated at the right hand of God. Think of what is above, not of what is on earth" (Colossians 3:1-2).

Martin Sheen named recipient of Notre Dame's Laetare Medal

Catholic actor, activist honored for illustrating 'ideals of the church'

NOTRE DAME, Ind. (CNS) — Actor Martin Sheen, whose human rights activism may be as well known these days as his acting credits, has been named the 2008 recipient of the University of Notre Dame's Laetare Medal, the school's oldest and most prestigious honor.

The award was established in 1883 as an annual honor for a Catholic "whose genius has ennobled the arts and sciences, illustrated the ideals of the church and enriched the heritage of humanity."

The award will be presented to Sheen during the university's 163rd commencement exercises May 18.

"As one of our nation's most recognizable and accomplished screen actors, Martin Sheen has achieved a level of celebrity that few Americans enjoy," said Holy Cross Father John Jenkins, Notre Dame's president.

"He has used that celebrity to draw the attention of his fellow citizens to issues that cry out for redress, such as the plight of immigrant workers and homeless people, the waging of unjust war, the killing of the unborn and capital punishment," the priest said in a statement.

"We welcome the opportunity to lift up his example for our church, our country and our students," Father Jenkins said.

A native of Dayton, Ohio, Sheen was born Aug. 3, 1940, one of 10 children of a Spanish-born father and an Irish-born mother.

His legal and baptismal name is Ramon Gerardo Antonio Estevez, but he later took his stage surname from Archbishop Fulton J. Sheen, whose style on his popular national television broadcasts the actor really admired.

Sheen once said he considers the archbishop "the first televangelist."

After his graduation from Marianist-run Chaminade High School in Dayton, Sheen claims to have intentionally failed his entrance examination for the University of Dayton, also a Marianist school, so he could pursue an acting career of which his father disapproved.

Borrowing money from a priest friend, he went to New York City, where he worked with Julian Beck's Living Theatre and eventually landed a widely acclaimed role in the 1964 Broadway play "The Subject Was Roses."

During this period, he learned about Dorothy Day and the Catholic Worker Movement, visiting and volunteering at the Catholic Worker's houses on Manhattan's Lower East Side.

Sheen has played numerous award-winning television and film roles, most notably an amoral young murderer in the 1973 film "Badlands," a disillusioned Army captain in the 1979 film "Apocalypse Now," a bemused journalist in the 1982 biopic "Gandhi," and the itinerant French co-founder of the Catholic Worker movement, Peter Maurin, in the 1996 film "Entertaining Angels."

From 1999 to 2006, on NBC's widely acclaimed television series "The West Wing," he played U.S. President Josiah Bartlet, who was a Notre Dame graduate.

A self-described Catholic peace activist, opponent of abortion and student of Catholic social teaching, Sheen often says he owes a spiritual debt to Day, St. Francis of Assisi, Blessed Mother Teresa of Calcutta, Jesuit Father Daniel Berrigan and the late labor leader Cesar Chavez.

He often has been arrested as a participant in nonviolent demonstrations against various U.S. military policies, including protests at Fort Benning, Ga., where the Western Hemisphere Institute for Security Cooperation is located.

He also donates money, time and his celebrity to help alleviate poverty and homelessness, and to promote human rights for migrant workers and environmental protection.

In a 1999 interview with Catholic News Service, he credited his activism to the Holy Spirit.

"I didn't start being active until I was in my 40s," Sheen said. "I came back to Catholicism when I was 41. I had abandoned it for many years."

He returned to his Catholic faith and put his activism in high gear, he said, after recovering from an emotional breakdown following what had been a grueling production schedule for "Apocalypse Now," Francis Ford Coppola's epic about the Vietnam War.

That activism "comes from my faith and my humanity," Sheen told CNS. "I believe that Jesus was nonviolent and he calls us to a nonviolent discipleship. And I think we are either going to embrace nonviolence or nonexistence. Those are the rules. Sorry, I didn't make them up."

The Laetare Medal is so named because its recipient is announced each year in celebration of Laetare Sunday, the fourth Sunday of Lent on the church calendar.

FROM THE COVER

National abuse audit: Soaring costs, fewer allegations

abuse cases by U.S. dioceses and religious orders.

The 2007 Survey of Allegations and Costs released by the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops March 7 also reported a continued decrease in the number of new credible allegations of abuse: 599 new allegations were made in 2007, compared with 635 in 2006, 695 in 2005 and 898 in 2004, the first year of the survey.

Only five of the new allegations involved abuse that occurred in 2007. As in past years, most allegations involved abuse that took place before 1985.

According to the survey conducted by the Center for Applied Research in the Apostolate at Georgetown University, dioceses and religious institutes paid $615 million for legal settlements, therapy, support for offenders, attorneys' fees and other costs. In the four previous years of the survey, the highest amount paid out was $466 million in 2005. Of the $615 million, dioceses spent $499 million and religious orders paid $116 million.

Figures for the Diocese of Charlotte were reported in the diocesan annual report, released in October 2007. During the 2007 fiscal year, which ended on June 30, 2007, the diocese paid $13,650 for victims' counseling. None of the funds used came from either the Diocesan Support Appeal or from church savings.

Teresa Kettelkamp, executive director of the U.S. bishops' Office of Child and Youth Protection, said the annual costs may continue to be high in coming years, as dioceses pay off settlements to victims of abuse.

In 2007 several dioceses and religious orders announced large settlements, including $660 million for the Los Angeles Archdiocese, covering more than 500 claimants, and a settlement of $50 million for more than 100 claimants by the Oregon-based Jesuit province whose members served in Alaska.

A portion of those settlements is being paid by insurers and is not included in the figures for what dioceses and religious orders have spent.

Kettelkamp said it's difficult to predict whether the number of allegations of abuse will continue to decrease, partly because victims of sexual abuse often wait decades to report what happened to them.

Meanwhile, U.S. schools, parishes and dioceses have put nearly all of the targeted 8.5 million children and adults through training programs meant to teach people at all levels of the church how to prevent abuse from occurring, to spot the signs of abuse and to ensure that it is reported.

An annual audit of compliance with the bishops' "Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People" released at the same time as the CARA survey found that more than 99 percent of the 37,000 U.S. priests have participated in what is called "safe environment" training.

The training had also been completed by more than 99 percent of deacons and educators, more than 98 percent of 4,918 candidates for ordination, 98 percent of 229,000 church employees, 98 percent of 1.4 million volunteers, and more than 96 percent of the 5.9 million children involved in church programs.

In the Diocese of Charlotte, 2,600 church workers and volunteers attended "Protecting God's Children" workshops in 2007. To date, 15,700 employees and volunteers have attended the training.

The cost for the 2007 workshops and 2,400 background checks was $63,537.

The audit found 178 of the 190 dioceses that participated to be in full compliance with every article of the charter. The Diocese of Charlotte was found in full compliance.

Twelve others were in compliance except for one or two of its 17 articles. Nearly all those fell short on Article 12, the one requiring "safe environment" programs, and almost all gaps were in getting all children through the programs, it said.

"The difficulty has to do with a number of factors," said the audit report, "the sheer number of individuals in each category ...; the fluctuation of those numbers; the need to develop and maintain concise record keeping ... and the time-consuming process of selecting safe environment programs that are age-appropriate and in accord with Catholic moral principles."

Kettelkamp said it has proven especially difficult to track one category of people designated in the charter for the training — parents — so it's unclear how many have participated. Many parents have received training because they are volunteers or employees of the church, and so are counted in those numbers. Others are encouraged to participate in sessions offered for various groups.

Five of the new reports received in 2007 related to abuse involving a minor that occurred that same year. Of the 599 new credible reports, only five cases among religious orders and 38 involving diocesan clergy were reported to have occurred since 1990.

Five of the 491 church employees implicated in new reports of abuse were deacons and the rest were priests; 374 of these men had already died, been removed from ministry or been laicized, or were missing. Previous allegations had been made against 287 of the men accused.

In October 2007, an allegation of sexual abuse was made against Oblate Father Albert Gondek, pastor of Our Lady of the Rosary Church in Lexington, N.C., involving an incident that allegedly took place in Maryland nearly 50 years ago.

After an investigation by the diocesan review board and Father Gondek's order, the Oblates of St. Francis de Sales, the allegation was found not credible.

Father Gondek was returned to pastoral ministry by Bishop Peter J. Jugis Dec. 23. The allegation was made after the 2007 audit was conducted.

In June 2002, the U.S. bishops adopted the charter and its mandates for an annual audit and survey and also adopted the "Essential Norms" to assure that all dioceses adhere to the charter.

Sacrifices to the gun, our leading idol

Today's violence raises questions about needs, uses of guns

The five little crosses placed in the snow outside Northern Illinois University recently stirred thoughts contrasting sacrifice and crucifixion, a Lenten meditation so to speak.

On Valentine's Day, a man with three pistols and a shotgun walked into a lecture hall, killed five students and wounded 16 others.

It seemed a modern-day crucifixion, but I rejected it on second thought. The paradigm, set by the crucifixion of Christ, requires a victim obedient to God's will dying for the redemption of others.

The death of the students here was more akin to the sacrifice of a primitive civilization to an idol: tragic and senseless. The idol here is the insistence on the dubious Second Amendment right to own and carry arms.

Seeing the bright, intelligent faces and reading the capsule biographies of the four young women and young man whose dreams were cut short made me grieve for them and for their families.

I was especially struck by that of the youngest one, 20-year-old Catalina Garcia, from Cicero, Ill., who wanted to become a teacher. "She wanted to become somebody in life; that is why she was going to school," her father told a Spanish-language radio station.

Perhaps her story was the most touching because my own granddaughter, Kathryn Sandoval, begins college next fall, and she, too, wants to become a teacher. I pray that God will protect her, for schools and colleges are not the havens they once were.

Last year there were shootings at Virginia Tech, a few years earlier at Columbine High School in a Denver suburb, more recently at Louisiana Technical College, and an Oxnard junior high school in California. There have been many others.

Half a century ago when I was in college, I had only one searing experience involving guns, when as a member of the Reserve Officers Training Corps I was handed my Army rifle. I shrank from the thought that I might someday have to use it to kill other human beings.

That Rubicon has long been crossed; today it is thought we cannot be secure unless we have guns at hand and the disposition to use them. Then we would have never imagined that going to class could be a life-threatening experience.

Reports of people who die needlessly from gunfire gain my attention because several members of my extended family have died that way.

One was my cousin Danny Suazo, 37, killed on April 28, 1995, at the large supermarket he managed in the Denver suburb of Littleton, Colo.

A 36-year-old auto mechanic armed with a .50-caliber rifle, a second rifle with a detachable 30-round magazine and a 9mm pistol similar to those issued to the police, burst into the store in pursuit of his wife, Terry, the deli manager.

He had already wounded the woman who drove her to work.

As Suazo tried to help Terry hide behind the service counter, the gunman shot him three times. He then killed the woman and Sheriff Sgt. Timothy Mossbrucker, 36, whose wife was expecting their sixth child.

Suazo left four children, all under the age of 14. The gunman told police he went crazy for a while.

In the Illinois shootings, everyone was shocked upon learning the assailant, who committed suicide, was an outstanding 27-year-old graduate student, "engaging, polite and industrious," with a bright future.

He had a firearms owner's identification card issued by the state police after he passed a criminal background check.

But the problem is no one can tell when a gun owner will go crazy enough to kill.

Vatican statement on baptism underscores need for caution

Sacred language cannot be changed, negotiated

Not to worry. If you were married on February 28, you were still married on February 29.

That disclaimer comes in the wake of a Vatican statement regarding the validity of baptisms.

The statement issued by the Congregation for the Doctrine of Faith underscores the need for caution in two areas: knee-jerk reaction over statements from the Vatican and the danger of arbitrarily changing sacred language — despite good intentions.

The brief statement from the congregation — simply one-word answers to questions posed — said a baptism administered "in the name of the Creator, and of the Redeemer and of the Sanctifier" is not a valid baptism.

Neither is one administered in the name of the "Creator, Liberator and Sustainer."

And, yes, the congregation said, persons who underwent that rite would need to be baptized correctly "in the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit."

There they go again, was the reaction of some who visualize the congregation as a group of theological nitpickers who randomly issue rules and regulations for no other reason than taking some perverse pleasure in rulemaking.

The Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith in matters such as this acts somewhat like a civil court when asked to render a summary judgment. In some instances, a judge will agree to issue a clarifying opinion on a point of law.

Such was the case here as the congregation was asked three specific questions by bishops about the practice recently initiated in North America.

The alternate wording was intended to avoid referring to the Trinity with masculine names.

Creator, Redeemer, Sanctifier; Father, Son and Holy Spirit, what's the difference, especially if it was done with a good intention of not giving offense?

The problem, as noted by Msgr. Antonio Miralles in a commentary commissioned by the congregation, is that it "subverts faith in the Trinity."

The substituted words dilute the distinction among the three persons of the Trinity, all of whom are involved together in the divine action of creation, redemption and sanctification, he said.

These are not the "what happens if I don't say my penance before leaving the church and I'm struck and killed by a car on the way home?" questions so familiar from the fourth-grade moral theologians of days of yore.

The words —the nouns for each person of the Trinity —are foundational to our faith. There is no little irony in the invalidating of a rite that is meant to be the profession of faith.

One aspect of the congregation's answer did cause some concern. In another commentary commissioned by the congregation, Cardinal Urbano Navarrete said the most serious practical consequence would be in the case of marriage where there would not be a sacrament if both spouses had been baptized with an invalid formula.

Few Americans should have much concern.

"If you are not validly baptized, a person needs to get rebaptized and remarried," said Father Tom Weinandy, executive director of the U.S. bishops' Secretariat of Doctrine.

But the assumption is that all is well unless there was a witness to the baptism who knew the incorrect formula was used.

"The presumption is the obvious truth that the baptism is valid," said Father Weinandy.

Persons over the age of 50 should have little concern, he said, and those younger shouldn't either.

Lesson learned? The risk of treading into dangerous theological ground in a well-meaning, if ill-advised attempt at popularizing language to meet a social trend.

And on a positive note, this demonstrates the importance of baptism. It is not an enlistment oath or contract where words can be negotiated.

It is, after all, not a club we join, but a fundamental action incorporating us into Christ's life, death and resurrection.

Are children punished for parents' wickedness?

Q. I am a teacher in our parish religious education program. My subject is not the Bible, but I receive many questions about the Scriptures.

One of my students pointed out the passage in the Book of Exodus, "I the Lord your God am a jealous God, inflicting punishment for their father's wickedness on the children of those who hate me down to the third and fourth generation."

Does this mean our children will be punished for what we do? (Ohio)

A. No, it doesn't mean that. Obviously, what our parents and others close to us do in their lives significantly influences our attitudes, values and character. But God does not hold us guilty for the sins of others.

One fascinating phenomenon in the Bible, particularly as we go through the Old Testament, is the gradual development and purification of humanity's understanding of and relationship to God.

This is true among the Jewish people from Abraham to Jesus Christ. More than once, for example, we read how Hebrew armies at times annihilated their enemies — men, women and children, even animals. This was said to be done with the blessing, even the command, of God himself.

Today every Christian and probably most of the rest of the world would find such slaughter appalling, at odds with every principle of human and Christian morality.

Even in later centuries during the period before the coming of Christ this attitude toward one's enemies was increasingly recognized as incompatible with a proper understanding of God and his love for all people.

A similar development happened in the subject you mention. In many cultures, including that of ancient Jews, a theory prevailed that guilt and innocence, holiness and sin were connected to the entire tribe or community.

If the patriarch sins, all the tribe are considered enemies of God or the gods. If the patriarch is good and just, the entire tribe shares his holiness.

More and more frequently as time went on in Hebrew culture, we find this understanding of vicarious guilt and holiness rejected by God. Perhaps the most dramatic instance is in Ezekiel, whose awareness and reverence before the majesty and infinite holiness of God is surpassed by no other prophet.

At one point (Chapter 18) he rejects an erroneous understanding of God expressed in a popular adage, "Fathers have eaten green grapes, thus their children's teeth are on edge."

So ingrained was the tribal concept of inherited guilt that Ezekiel had to defend himself and God against the accusation that judging people individually on their own merits was unfair.

The Lord is forced to say, "Is it my way that is not fair, or rather is it not that your ways are unfair." Each person is responsible for his or her own actions; he or she cannot lay the blame or credit on someone else.

Before we too quickly judge these ancient beliefs harshly, we might ask how often we have heard others or perhaps ourselves remark in the face of tragedy, "What have I done to deserve this? Why am I being punished for something I didn't do?"

Unfortunately, we still tend to make God in our own image and likeness, assuming that our understanding, our vision of reality must be God's vision, our sense of justice his sense.

Pope: Even in facing torture, happiness is possible with hope in God

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Even in the face of terrible misfortune and suffering, true happiness is possible as long as one continues to have hope in God, Pope Benedict XVI said.

When personal disaster strikes, only true friends stick around, and one of those true friends is God, he said.

At his March 12 general audience at the Vatican, Pope Benedict discussed two early Christian writers, Boethius and Cassiodorus.

The pope called Boethius, who was imprisoned, tortured and executed, a "symbol of a huge number of detainees unjustly" imprisoned throughout history and the world today. The pope said Cassiodorus promoted the monastic movement and believed monks were the best people to salvage, preserve and pass down the cultural heritage of classical Christian culture.

Here is the Vatican text of the pope's remarks in English:

The multi-faceted challenges of poverty

Realizing its causes and fighting them are essential

They came out in droves to hear and award a simple Dominican pastor and theologian who has helped change the way Catholic theology views the poor.

In November 2007, Peruvian Father Gustavo Gutierrez received the prestigious Sophia Award at Washington Theological Union in Washington, which educates seminarians and lay people for leadership.

Father Gutierrez was born June 8, 1928, in Lima. He is regarded as the founder of liberation theology, which holds that Christian poverty is an act of loving solidarity with the poor as well as a protest against poverty.

Like many before him who have championed the liberation of the poor, Father Gutierrez was criticized and even questioned by Rome about his orthodoxy. Like a true champion, he was exonerated and continues his mission.

"Poverty is very complex," Father Gutierrez told his audience. Usually it is envisioned in economic terms. It is not only about people deprived of material goods; it is also about people living in cultures other than their own and not being accepted.

It is about being a female living in a culture that degrades females. It is about lacking an education. It is about being on the margins of society, experiencing sadness and death.

Interestingly, Father Gutierrez pointed out that even tax collectors during Christ's time can be considered poor because they were outcasts. He also pointed out that poverty doesn't exist only in poor ghettos or barrios; a rich person afflicted with depression ranks among the poor.

Poverty is universal. It is found everywhere. It is sadness, the direct antithesis of joy.

Father Gutierrez considered people who see poverty as their fate. He spoke of a woman who felt women were born into suffering. She accepted this as natural and felt it to be the will of God.

To this he said, "Poverty has causes.

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

We make poverty, and that which we make we can unmake."

It is our God-given duty to stand against philosophies and theologies that accept poverty without raising essential and ultimate questions about its causes.

Fighting poverty isn't only about donations; it involves speaking out against its causes.

"Poverty ultimately means death," Gutierrez said. "Too many poor people are dying before their time. Just look at Africa! As Christians it is our duty to always champion life over death."

How do we best fight poverty?

One way is to read the Bible and the life of Christ from the viewpoint of the poor — to cultivate a biblical spirituality of the poor. A great power of the prophets in the Old Testament was their ability to read the times and speak to the people in down-to-earth terms through the eyes of God.

Father Gustavo Gutierrez did this the night of his award at Washington Theological Union.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

Today I wish to speak to you about two great Christian writers from the Italian peninsula during the period after the fall of the Roman Empire in the West: Boethius and Cassiodorus.

Both were anxious to preserve the heritage of Greek and Roman learning, handed down through generations of Christian believers, in the context of the Gothic culture that dominated Italy at the time. Boethius, born in Rome in 480, entered public life and became a senator, though he continued his philosophical and religious studies alongside his public responsibilities.

Unjustly imprisoned and later executed by King Theodoric, he wrote his greatest philosophical work in prison. Reflecting on the injustice of his situation, in the light of biblical wisdom literature and Classical authors, he concluded that true happiness lies in continuing to hope in God, despite adversity.

Indeed, harsh fortune helps us to distinguish true friends from false ones, and there can be few greater consolations than that of true friendship.

His contemporary, Cassiodorus, devoted much time and energy to promoting the monastic movement in the belief that monks were the people best placed to preserve and hand on the heritage of classical Christian culture.

We would do well to take note of his advice to them: "Meditate day and night on the law of the Lord and always focus your attention upon Christ."

Little girl gives big gift

Generosity benefits ministry for women, children in need

BY KATIE MOORE

BELMONT — It is not often an 8-year-old forgoes an opportunity to receive presents. However, this year on her birthday, that is exactly what Jackie Flynn did.

In lieu of presents, Jackie, asked family and friends to buy gift cards for Catherine's House, a ministry sponsored by the Sisters of Mercy that provides transitional housing for women and children who are homeless.

Jackie learned about Catherine's House from her mother, Carolanne Flynn, who took a tour of the facility last December.

When the Flynn's, who attend Mass at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte, began making preparations for Jackie's Feb. 9 birthday, they decided the party itself was a big enough gift. Jackie's mom suggested that, instead of presents, she consider collecting donations for a charity.

"I planted the seed, but ultimately it was her choice," said Carolanne Flynn.

She said Jackie, a second-grader at Charlotte Preparatory School, was touched by the fact that Catherine's House was helping homeless children.

Located on the grounds of the former Sacred Heart College in Belmont, Catherine's House provides a safe and caring environment as well as supportive programs and services for women and children in need.

"I wanted to do something to help the homeless people so they could buy something for their children and for themselves," Jackie said.

The response from friends and family was overwhelming. On Feb. 27,

Jackie presented Catherine's House with a donation of gift cards totaling $345.

Karen Andrews, president and CEO of Catherine's House, attributes the contribution to Jackie's "giving heart."

"I think it is unique to have that level of social awareness at her age," she said.

Sister of Mercy Carmelita Hagan, volunteer coordinator at Catherine's House, was also impressed by Jackie's kindness.

"She is setting a wonderful example for other young people," she said.

Sister Hagan also commended Jackie's parents for instilling the value of generosity in their child.

"They helped her to grow as a young person and to understand a little bit about helping other people at such a young age," she said.

Catherine's House is designed to help women and families overcome homelessness and return to a self-sufficient lifestyle in the community.

The organization relies heavily on in-kind donations and volunteer support. "Volunteers are invaluable to our program," said Sister Hagan.

Last year, more than 3,400 hours of assistance came from volunteers, according to Andrews.

Gift cards are especially appreciated because they allow the facilitators to go out and buy the things the residents need.

Women and families admitted to Catherine's House are typically required to stay a minimum of 90 days. During that time a case manager sets goals according to the individual's needs.

"We try to help them help themselves. To make them aware of their own power, to return to the community in a dignified way so they can contribute back to that community," said Andrews.

Sixty years later and 600 families greater, the parish of St. Joseph Church is still growing and steadily moving forward.

Parishioners and clergy gathered March 15 to celebrate the 60th anniversary of the church's dedication. The bilingual Mass was celebrated by Father Christopher Davis, pastor, and Oblate Father Joseph Tustin, a former pastor.

The parish today is a mixture of many cultures, including German, Polish, Jakubowski, who is from Jarrettsville, Md., will be one of the St. Joseph's Hawks playing against George Washington University March 22, Holy Saturday, at Nationals Park, the new home of the National League's Washington Nationals. Pope Benedict XVI will celebrate a Mass at the stadium April 17.

Catholic college to be first to set foot in new major league stadium

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The baseball team from Jesuit-run St. Joseph's University in Philadelphia will get to do something not even Pope Benedict XVI will be able to do: break in a major league baseball stadium.

When the pope celebrates Mass in Nationals Park April 17, it will be the first nonbaseball event to take place at the new home of the National League's Washington Nationals.

But the St. Joseph's Hawks will get to play a game there — against the George Washington University Colonials March 22, Holy Saturday.

It will be the closing game of a three-game series between St. Joseph's and George Washington that kicks off the Atlantic-10 season for both squads.

"Our coaching staff alerted me to that possibility" probably at the beginning of the new year, said Joe Greenwich, assistant director of athletic communication at St. Joseph's.

"I know the coaches were pretty excited about the prospect, especially (playing there) before the major leaguers have played," he said.

The Nationals' opening day is March 30, but to work out whatever transportation and stadium bugs may arise before the season starts, the Nats also have scheduled some dress rehearsals, including a March 29 exhibition game with the Baltimore Orioles.

It's an invitation-only affair for workers involved in the ballpark's construction and other select individuals.

The invite list for the St. Joseph's-George Washington game is even smaller: 2,000 maximum, with 1,500 tickets going to the home team and 500 to St. Joe's. Distribution of those tickets, Greenwich said, would be "private" and include the families of players.

The Hawks were 2-10 in preseason play as of March 11.

"We've lost a lot of close games," Greenwich said, including a series of losses at the Rollins College Baseball Tournament in Winter Park, Fla., as part of the team's annual spring break trip.

St. Joseph's and George Washington, like all Atlantic-10 teams, play a Friday-Sunday series each weekend. But on Easter weekend, all teams play a Good Friday doubleheader to avoid playing on Easter.

The Good Friday games are scheduled for George Washington's usual home field, Barcroft Park in Arlington, Va., across the Potomac River from the university's home in Washington.

Bishops hope to work with new governor for 'common good' of New York

ALBANY, N.Y. (CNS) — The head of the New York State Catholic Conference in Albany, on behalf of the conference and the state's Catholic bishops, assured New York's new governor of prayers as he "assumes his awesome responsibilities under extraordinarily difficult circumstances."

"I look forward to working closely with Gov. (David) Paterson and the Legislature on behalf of the common good" of the state, said Richard Barnes, the conference's executive director, March 12.

Paterson, the state's lieutenant governor, was sworn in as governor March 17 to succeed Gov. Eliot Spitzer, who announced his resignation March 12 in the wake of a prostitution-ringing scandal.

Barnes said he and Paterson have not always agreed, but said that Paterson has been respectful of the state's Catholic conference "in our role as advocates for the most vulnerable members of society."

The Catholic conference represents New York state's bishops in matters of public policy.

Barnes also said Paterson has "an appreciation for the role of the Catholic Church, which is the largest nongovernmental provider of health care, human services and education in New York state, and for the perspective we bring to the public policy arena."

On March 10, the day news reports broke the Spitzer scandal, the governor was scheduled to meet privately with N.Y. Cardinal Edward M. Egan and other N.Y. Catholic bishops to discuss abortion legislation, education tax credits and other issues.

N.Y. Catholic officials have been especially outspoken against legislation Spitzer was proposing that would legalize partial-birth abortion. News reports indicate Paterson, who is considered more liberal than Spitzer, supports the bill.

FROM THE VATICAN

Vatican official calls for protection of unborn, seriously ill

GENEVA (CNS) — A Vatican official urged government delegates to help protect the lives of the unborn and those suffering from serious and deadly illnesses.

Archbishop Silvano Tomasi, Vatican representative to U.N. agencies in Geneva, said "no compromise can be made with a person's right to life itself, from conception to natural death, nor with that person's ability to enjoy the dignity which flows from that right."

He spoke during a March 11 session on the protection of human rights by the U.N. Human Rights Council in Geneva. He focused on the U.N. council's Jan. 31 report on the right of all people to "the highest attainable standard of physical and mental health."

He said people "who require special protection" should never be overlooked or denied the right to life, particularly "children in the womb and those suffering from grave and life-threatening illnesses."

He said the Vatican "urgently hopes that references (in the report) to 'emergency obstetric care' will never be misconstrued to justify the forced ending of human life before birth."

He said it was also important that other terminology, such as a nation being obliged to "identify a minimum 'basket' of health services and 'striking balances'" in the health care system "will not be interpreted in a manner that denies essential services to the seriously ill."

He also asked that religious organizations — which provide a significant portion of health care services around the world — be allowed "a place at the table during the formulation of health care plans on national or local levels."

Vatican's official program for papal trip to U.S. shares more details

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Published just a month before Pope Benedict XVI's scheduled arrival in the United States, the Vatican's official program for the April 15-20 papal trip to Washington and New York was all that had been promised and a tiny bit more.

In addition to the previously announced meetings, Pope Benedict will hold a brief meeting April 16 with representatives of Catholic charitable foundations.

The papal itinerary, published March 17 by the Vatican, also includes a lunch April 16 and a dinner April 18 with the U.S. cardinals, the officers of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops and members of the papal entourage.

In addition, the Vatican said the pope and his entourage would have a luncheon April 19 with Cardinal Edward M. Egan of New York and the New York auxiliary bishops at Cardinal Egan's residence.

The Vatican itinerary also contained some indications of how people who did not get tickets to either the April 17 Mass at Nationals Park in Washington or the April 20 Mass in New York's Yankee Stadium could see the pope.

In Washington April 16, the pope is planning to go by popemobile from the White House to the apostolic nunciature on Massachusetts Avenue. The same evening, he will switch from a car to the popemobile on his way from the nunciature to the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception.

After meeting representatives of Catholic universities and diocesan education offices April 17 at The Catholic University of America, he will use the popemobile to cover the short distance to the Pope John Paul II Cultural Center.

In New York, the pope is scheduled to use the popemobile only once, April 19, to go from Cardinal Egan's residence to the residence of the Vatican's permanent observer to the United Nations.

Sunday at St. Matthew Church, 8015 Ballantyne Commons Pkwy. There will be a traditional solemn Benediction and recitation of the Divine Mercy Chaplet March 30, at 3 p.m. For more information, contact the church office at (704) 543-7677.

Minding their money

Fair offers tips, advice on financial literacy

BY JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
CORRESPONDENT

HAYESVILLE — Elsewhere on March 17 the "wearin' of the green" celebrated St. Patrick. In the Moss Memorial Library in Hayesville, "green" was all about financial literacy.

The day's financial fitness fair was a collaborative effort of Catholic Social Services' Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO), the N.C. Cooperative Extension Service, Internal Revenue Service, several financial institutions and nonprofits such as the Hinton Rural Life Center.

"Last year was the year of financial fitness for Cooperative Extension, which has the most fantastic programs for families and individuals," said Claudie Burchfield, OEO's director. "We really wanted to partner with them on financial fitness."

"We had a financial fitness fair in Robbinsville at the Graham County Public Library, and it was well received," she said, adding another will be planned in Murphy for April or May.

The fairs' main goal, Burchfield said, "is to get the word out about our lab, (and for people to) learn about financial services, how to save money, that there's help available to clear up bad debt, to start saving."

She added that help with bad debt doesn't mean lending money; rather, it involves things like budgeting and saving money.

The "lab" she mentioned is OEO's financial literacy lab, open Tuesdays and Thursdays at the OEO office in Murphy. There, people can use laptop computers to access their credit reports, learn budgeting and ways to clear up bad debt, and other information that could help improve their financial situations.

Visitors to the fair, including a civics class from Hayesville High School, saw ways to improve and restore credit and clear up bad debt; they got savvy budgeting ideas and information about wise tax-refund use, timely tax filing, identity theft, banking services and affordable housing opportunities.

Pam Staton, family and consumer education agent with the N.C. Cooperative Extension, offered materials on budgeting, debt reduction and starting savings programs.

Many people, she said, "just live for today. They don't think to pay themselves first, which is what a savings account is."

Clyde McCoy, a nutrition education program assistant with the N.C. Cooperative Extension, offered tips on saving money in other ways, like smart grocery shopping.

McCoy's materials included how to budget for food purchases and ways to buy more economically.

"It's basic to people of my generation, but the younger generation doesn't know how to do that," McCoy said. "Their moms and dads were too busy to teach them, and then fast food came along."

Yet another way to save is through energy efficiency. Jason Smith of Blue Ridge Mountain Electrical Membership Corp. brightened things up as he showed how compact fluorescent bulbs use less than one-quarter the energy of 60-watt standard bulbs. A compact fluorescent bulb costs $3 to $5 each but lasts about nine years with normal use.

Penny Hane of the Hinton Rural Life Center near Hayesville had plenty of information on affordable housing opportunities through the center's "Mutual Self-Help Housing," similar to Habitat for Humanity.

Vicki Hamond, of the IRS's Stakeholder Partnerships, Education and Communication Office in Charlotte, told visitors about some IRS assistance.

Members of the State Employees Credit Union and area banks were on hand to explain programs and services.

The fair also had an exhibit from Samaritan's Promise, which provides emergency assistance such as personal hygiene items. OEO conceived the idea of Samaritan's Promise and serves on its steering committee.

Knights program honors Our Lady of Charity

Icon to travel throughout North Carolina

BY KATIE MOORE
STAFF WRITER

KANNAPOLIS — An icon of Our Lady of Charity that was blessed by Pope Benedict XVI is currently on display at St. Joseph Church.

The framed print is one of three icons currently traveling throughout North Carolina as part of the yearlong Marian Hour of Prayer program sponsored by the Knights of Columbus.

In a letter to fellow Knights, Supreme Knight Carl A. Anderson reminded his brothers that charity is the first principle of their organization.

"This Marian prayer program with an image of Our Lady of Charity, is a graced opportunity to reflect on the virtue of charity and to make more widely known the beautiful teaching of 'Deus Caritas Est' ('God is Love'), in which Pope Benedict XVI explores the true nature of charity, based on love of God and love of neighbor," he said.

Since its arrival at St. Joseph Church Feb. 18, the image of Our Lady of Charity has been part of nearly 20 different prayer services and has been visited by more than 2,000 people.

Typically, each council hosts the icon for a couple of weeks before passing it on to the next parish. The icon's stay at St. Joseph Church was longer than usual because of Lent.

As part of the Marian Hour of Prayer program, special prayers for Pope Benedict will be offered during services throughout the year.

"At the conclusion of the yearlong prayer program, a 'spiritual bouquet' will be presented to the pope, including a report on the total number of prayer services that were held and the approximate number of participants," Anderson said.

A Mass will be celebrated in honor of Our Lady of Charity at St. Joseph Church on Saturday, April 5, at 4 p.m. Following the Mass, the icon will be moved to St. Matthew Church in Charlotte.

Our Lady of Charity

The apparition of Our Lady of Charity took place in Cuba around the year 1600. Three boys from the area now known as El Cobre, were sent to gather salt to preserve the town's meat supply.

As the boys made their way across the bay, they encountered a violent storm. When the storm calmed they saw something floating in the water, a wooden board carrying a statue of Mary holding the baby Jesus.

On the board was an inscription, "Yo soy la Virgen de la Caridad" ("I am the Virgin of Charity"). After that, a shrine was erected in her honor and devotion to Our Lady of Charity spread throughout Cuba.

WHAT IS AN ICON?

Icons are sacred images signifying Christ who is glorified in them. They typically represent Jesus, but also may depict images of Mary, the mother of God; or saints. Icons express the same Gospel message in images that Scripture communicates by words.

Oils consecrated, priests renew vows at chrism Mass

attended the chrism Mass, during which priests recommit themselves to their vocational ministry.

Bishop Jugis spoke on the three offices of the priesthood — governing, sanctifying and teaching — and encouraged the priests to approach each office with a “spirit of self-renunciation.”

“Self-renunciation is the way of Jesus, and it was in that spirit of sacrifice joyfully accepted that we first promised to serve, and in that same spirit that we promise again today,” he said.

He called on the priests to deny their own wills and become slaves for the Lord.

“A slave has no will of his own, but only does the will of his master,” said Bishop Jugis.

“Perhaps we know people in ministry who have great ambition; but are they ambitious for themselves or are they ambitious for Christ?” he asked.

The chrism Mass is one of the Catholic Church's most solemn Masses, celebrated in every Catholic diocese on Holy Thursday. If celebration of the Mass is not possible on Holy Thursday, it may be celebrated earlier in the week, as it is in the Diocese of Charlotte.

During the Mass, the bishop blesses the oils to be used in administering the sacraments of baptism, confirmation and anointing of the sick throughout the diocese in the upcoming year.

Bishop Jugis, along with concelebrants Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin; Benedictine Abbot Placid Solari of Belmont Abbey; Msgr. Mauricio W. West, vicar general and chancellor; Father John Putnam, judicial vicar; Father Paul Gary, rector of St. Patrick Cathedral; and other clergy of the diocese, gathered with about 90 priests, permanent deacons and seminarians of the diocese to celebrate the liturgy with the people of faith whom they serve.

The recommitment ceremony, which followed the Liturgy of the Word, included the priests' renewal of their dedication as ministers of Christ, striving to be more like Christ and being faithful to their sacred ministry.

Later in the Mass, Bishop Jugis blessed the three oils used in sacramental and liturgical practices.

Vials of the oils are dispensed to every parish and mission church in the diocese. With the sacred oils — and having recommitted themselves to the mission they share with their bishop — the priests returned to their parishes, rededicated in spiritual union with the diocesan faithful.

St. Matthew Catholic Church presents A Symposium on St. Paul

Pope Benedict XVI has declared June 2008-June 2009 the Year of St. Paul. In preparation for this anniversary year we will be presenting the following talks:

Apr. 3: “The Pope Speaks... ‘Honoring Paul’” - Msgr. John McSweeney, pastor, will focus on Pope Benedict's encyclical “Spe Salvi” (Saved by Hope) and its connection to St. Paul's thought.

Apr. 24: “A Church Built on Gifts and Propelled by the Spirit” - Susan Brady, MA, Biblical Studies, Providence College. For over 35 years she has taught high school youth and adults, lectured in churches of many denominations, given retreats, and taught week-long summer seminars on some aspect of the Bible.

May 15: “Greeting the Greeks; Hailing the Hellenists” - Watching Paul as he engaged ecumenical and interfaith dialogue. Fr. Christopher Schreck, S.T.B., Pontifical Gregorian University, Rome; S.S.I. (Licentiate in Sacred Scripture), Pontifical Biblical Institute; Ph.D. S.T.D., Catholic University of Leuven; past Chair, Dept. of Sacred Scripture, St. Charles Borromeo Seminary; author of many articles published in academic journals. Fr. Schreck brings great insight into the New Testament and, specifically, St. Paul.

All programs are 7-8:30pm in the Banquet Room of the New Life Center.

Parishioners celebrate church's 60th anniversary

Asian and Hispanic and others. But it all began with four Europeans.

"In the 1880s, three Englishmen and one Irish woman came to town and started the first Catholic church," said Father Davis.

The three English officers — Cpt. Charles St. Clair Winn, Cpt. Slingsby Wainman and Cpt. Basil John Fisher — came to Asheboro seeking their fortunes in gold mining. Winn and Wainman were Catholics and wanted to have Mass celebrated in Asheboro. Mrs. Barton, an Irish immigrant, offered a former law office for use as a chapel.

By 1888, visiting priests were celebrating Mass for the small community. But when the two officers died and Mrs. Barton left town, the Catholic community in Asheboro temporarily dissolved.

Resurgence in the Catholic community began in the 1930s as Yankees started migrating south. Parishioner Virginia King said it was 1943 when she and 12 other Catholics "started to revitalize the community."

But they still did not have a permanent location for Mass.

"We had to go to High Point for Mass," she said. "We even had Mass at the city hall for a while."

Other locations included a roving railroad car and private homes. Before he became the first bishop of Charlotte, then-Father Michael J. Begley was among the priests from High Point celebrating Mass around Asheboro.

Then in 1947, Bishop Vincent S. Waters of Raleigh purchased land in Asheboro with a large house on the property — the downstairs was used for the church, the upstairs for the rectory. The first Mass was celebrated at midnight on Christmas Day, 1947.

St. Joseph Church was established March 15, 1948, and formally dedicated by Bishop Vincent S. Waters of Raleigh four days later.

In 1954, a brick structure was built next door. A new rectory and second-floor addition were added in 1978.

Father Tustin was serving in Canada in 1982 when he asked St. Joseph for intercessory prayers to help with his severe arthritis. Immediately healed, as a response Father Tustin made a private prayer to God: "If you want me to be assigned to any parish named St. Joseph, I'm willing to do that."

A year later, in the summer of 1983, Father Tustin found himself as pastor at St. Joseph Church in Asheboro, where he remained until the summer of 1993.

"Asheboro was a much smaller town back then," he said. "The parish consisted of about 150 families and many bills. Little by little, we were able to gather enough funds to build an addition, which gave the church more room."

The construction took place in the early 1990s, when the church and rectory were connected.

"Today we have 44 acres of land," said Father Davis.

The new property, in the northern section of the city, is ideal for "the construction of our facilities and the expansion of our parish and its programs," said Father Davis, in a 2007 letter to parishioners.

"We're getting ready to build, and all because of those (original) four people who wanted a place to worship their God," said Father Davis.

The parish now has a Knights of Columbus council, a Ladies Guild and numerous ministries. The parish includes a growing Hispanic population, with a Spanish-language youth group and choir.

Despite the parish's growth, some parishioners still like the church's small community feel.

"I just love St. Joseph Church," said Arlene Hayler, a parishioner of 32 years. "It is a small parish, which reminds me of the small parish we came from in Iowa."

Parishioner Bob O'Brien, who remembers Father Tustin's expansion efforts, credits the priest and his successors.

"Father Joseph Mack, who followed Father Tustin, was a good pastor, as is Father Davis. They have all worked to bring the Anglo and Hispanic communities together," said O'Brien.

"We look back to the past, which was wonderful, even as we look forward to a bright new future filled with first Communion, confirmations and marriages of parishioners who will celebrate the next 60 years," said Father Davis.

Participants of the 2008 Pilgrimage for Justice and Peace march in front of a Case Farms poultry processing plant in Morganton March 17. A prayer service was held outside the plant to raise awareness of unjust working conditions in the poultry industry.

Pilgrims hope to better conditions for immigrants

CITCA is a faith-based movement dedicated to changing U.S. government policies that contribute to poverty and oppression in Latin America and the Caribbean. The Carolina-based organization focuses on issues connecting the Southeast with Latin America.

Each year during Holy Week, members of CITCA travel throughout North Carolina, raising awareness of social justice issues. The event was first organized 22 years ago in response to the injustices of the Contra War in Nicaragua. This year, the themes of the pilgrimage were immigration, trade policies and family unity.

Francisco Risso, a St. Charles Borromeo Church parishioner and one of the organizers of the walk in Morganton, said the goal is to change the industry to make it more just.

"There is a lot of injustice that happens at Case Farms and a lot of other work places in the county. In a spiritual sense, what we are calling for is a conversion — a conversion of the workplace and a conversion of ourselves," he said.

Gail Phares, a founding member of CITCA and parishioner of St. Frances of Assisi Church in Raleigh, said improving immigrant worker conditions is "one of the most urgent justice issues of our time."

She said she is inspired by the description of the last judgment in Matthew 26: 31-46 and the concept that we will be judged by how we treat the poorest of the poor.

"As people of faith, as you see this, how can you not take action?" asked Phares.

Deacon Edward Konarski of St. Charles Borromeo Church said the issue concerning unjust worker conditions is particularly visible in Morganton.

"In a small town like this, you hear it more and see it more. It's easier to raise awareness of the issue because people see it in their daily lives," he said.

Among the parishioners from St. Charles Borromeo Church who participated in the walk were several former poultry plant workers.

The group from CITCA, led by Phares and consisting of 10 core walkers, started their pilgrimage at St. Eugene Church in Asheville, where more than 300 people participated in a walk on Palm Sunday, March 16.

From there, the core group traveled across the state to Morganton, Hickory, Winston-Salem, Burlington, Durham and ended in Raleigh.

The final prayer service took place in front of the state capital on Good Friday, March 21, where Bishop Emeritus F. Joseph Gossman of Raleigh led the participants in the Stations of the Cross.

"We can't remain ignorant of these important social and human rights issues," said Deacon Konarski. "As the Body of Christ, we need to work to bring about peace and justice. This is one way that we can give witness to that teaching."

Training course tackles immigrant abuses, legal issues

BY JOANITA M. NELLENBACH

ASHEVILLE — The young mother of two had been abused. An undocumented immigrant from Mexico, she was afraid to report the abuse to police.

Had she done so, her abuser might have been arrested and prosecuted; rather, he remained free to abuse again. The woman could have been eligible for a U visa, allowing her and her children to remain in this country.

Jesuit Brother Ricardo Greeley, Hispanic ministry coordinator for the diocese's Albemarle Vicariate, felt frustrated that he didn't know how to help the woman and her children.

He was one of about 40 people who attended the "VAWA/U Immigration Law Training: ICE Raids and Immigrants' Rights" training held at the Basilica of St. Lawrence in Asheville March 12-13.

"I need some knowledge, some options for people's rights," Brother Greeley said. "I need the basics so that I can tell people where to get the help they need, where to find legal aid, particularly women and children."

Kristen Lambertin, immigration specialist with the Asheville Legal Migration Assistance Program of Catholic Social Service's Western Regional Office, also wanted more information about the Violence Against Woman Act (VAWA) and U visas.

"We do family-based immigration, but we don't do VAWA- and U-based immigration," she said. "We're looking at expanding our services."

The Catholic Legal Immigration Network (CLINIC) and CSS's Western Regional Office sponsored the workshop for Catholic Charities staff and others from community-based organizations with IRS 501(c)(3) (tax-exempt) status. Attorneys and legal worker staff of private law offices also attended.

CLINIC attorney Peggy Gleason and Catholic Charities attorney Caitlin Brazill presented the two-day course, which focused on the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA), concerns about Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) raids, and rights and defenses available to immigrants, including T and U visas.

T and U visas were created by the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Prevention Act of October 2000. T visas are to protect women, children and men who are the victims of human trafficking. Examples of this are "forced labor, domestic servitude, debt bondage, and forced commercial sexual exploitation."

U visas are available for immigrants who have been victims of crime and are willing to help with the prosecution of those crimes. They grant the applicant and his or her family temporary nonimmigrant status for up to four years, which allows the person to work.

There is the possibility that, after three years, the person could apply for permanent residency, although no regulations are currently in place for this. The Department of Homeland Security has yet to promulgate the regulations.

for information that could lead to someone obtaining a U visa. The cases he's responded to have involved domestic violence.

"Our belief is that everyone should be afforded protection under the law, whether they're here legally or not," Splain said. "We don't want to alienate a population that has great value."

"For us, somebody's ethnicity, where they're from, is not our business. What we don't want to happen is what we hear from other jurisdictions — stopping people because of what they look like," he said. "If they're on U.S. soil, they're protected by the U.S. Constitution."

Jesuit Father Francis Reese and Mercy Sister Peggy Verstege work with the Mexican community at Sacred Heart Church in Burnsville. Like Brother Greeley, they wanted to know more about legal resources that could help immigrants.

"By learning more about what we can do and can't do, we know where to get information," Sister Verstege said.

Sister Verstege teaches reading and religious education to Hispanic children during the summer. She and two volunteers, Maggie Peacock and Sandy List, work with 11 immigrant women who meet three days a week.

Sister Verstege and Peacock teach English. List, a nurse practitioner, offers health and hygiene education and helps the women seeking medical needs.

There's also a weekly cooking class, in which Sister Verstege teaches the women how to prepare American foods.

Both Sister Verstege and Father Reese visit the local jail to meet with immigrants who've been arrested.

"You try to visit them in jail and then be the liaison with the families," Father Reese said.

He recalled Scripture, especially Matthew 25:31-46, which addresses works of mercy, such as visiting those in prison. "We want them to know the church is walking with them," Father Reese said.

"What our role is, is to support, to be liaison," Sister Verstege said.

"(The workshop) has piqued my interest," she added. "We have a growing population of immigrant children in schools, whether born in Mexico or elsewhere. What's going to happen to them? I need to know more about that."

Story of American nun killed in Brazil kept alive by biographers

REVIEWED BY REGINA LINSKEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

In their biographies of Ohio native Sister Dorothy Stang, Sister Roseanne Murphy ("Martyr of the Amazon") and Binka Le Breton ("The Greatest Gift") tell the story of a modern-day missionary who spent most of her life protecting poor farmers and working for justice in the Wild West of Brazil's Amazon, where money and guns often prevailed.

Both authors paid attention to their description of the early days and formation of Sister Dorothy, whom many lovingly called Dot.

One of nine children, Dot was born to devout Catholic parents and grew up on a farm outside Dayton. Her parents were devout not just in the daily Mass, evening rosaries or parish leadership sense of the word.

They also opened their home to people who needed a hand getting back on their feet. The children absorbed this active faith of their family as exemplified by their parents.

The example the parents set seemed to work: The younger twins became priests and Sister Dorothy, motivated by a desire to be a missionary in China, entered the Sisters of Notre Dame de Namur in Cincinnati at age 17 with her best friend, Joan Krimm, a main character in Sister Dorothy's life.

Eventually, after some other assignments, Sister Dorothy was called to Brazil. Here, in this vastly undeveloped South American country so far from home, she saw incredible poverty, injustice and environmental destruction.

She taught poor Brazilian migrant families how to see these things, organize and find their voice. She also taught them how to see God in their lives and live the Gospel. Of course, government officials and wealthy landowners did not like this radical American nun, or her newly aware small faith communities. From this, the land wars began.

Le Breton devotes a chapter to Sister Dorothy's creation spirituality and how she used it to teach the families fearful of the Amazon how to love, respect and carefully cultivate its land. This is particularly interesting in light of Pope Benedict XVI's frequent remarks on God, creation and the environment.

Both books are at times a bit dry, as biographies can be. But the testimony of friends and family, and the facts, dates and documents are appreciated by a reader using the books for more than enjoyable reading.

These stories do not embellish the truth. Instead, they say: This was the life and mission of Sister Dorothy; this is how an American girl from a farm became a martyr in Brazil's jungles.

Le Breton's biography is a bit more dramatic than Sister Murphy's book, as she takes more liberties using color describing Sister Dorothy's adventures. Sister Murphy is also a member of the Sisters of Notre Dame de Namur.

In the end, the deadly combination of money and guns finished a chapter in Sister Dorothy's life, but not necessarily her mission.

Though she was murdered on a dirt road in her beloved Amazon jungle, Sister Dorothy remains alive in her creation theology and fight for justice through Le Breton's and Sister Roseanne's books.

Recognizing Jesus overcomes our doubts, bolsters faith

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

I was happy my son telephoned today. He was just "checking in" to say hello, he said.

We chatted only briefly. Neither of us had anything major to report, but I was very glad to hear his voice, and after we hung up I had a sense of joy.

I hadn't heard from my son in three weeks, which isn't so long, but he usually is in touch about once a week, so I was wondering if he was OK. In fact, I was pretty sure nothing was amiss, but there are just enough trying circumstances in his life that I had some doubts.

Speaking to him allayed my fears, giving way to the joy of knowing all was well. I had been "pretty sure" before, but now I was certain.

Somehow, "pretty sure" just doesn't carry the same sense of exultation that "sure" does.

So it goes with faith. By definition it has a flip side: doubt.

In this weekend's readings, Peter explains that doubt creates a drag on our sense of joy for the salvation we will receive through Jesus. Our human life is a test, he suggests, and it carries discomfort. But in order to find salvation, we must constantly seek Jesus' presence through faith.

When we identify with Thomas in the Gospel passage, we know that Jesus will offer us moments to touch him. We have these moments when we experience acts of care, mercy, or even sacrifice.

Recognizing Jesus in such moments bolsters our faith in salvation by giving us a taste of heaven.

When my son called, he didn't tell me he had resolved any problems, but the positive tenor of his conversation showed his trust in God's providence. Choosing to share it with me restored my belief in Jesus being present to both of us.

At such a time, Peter notes, "Although you have not seen him you love him."

Those moments provide what Peter calls "genuineness of your faith" — something on which to hang our belief against occasions when worldliness drags doubt back into our human experience.

Questions:

What causes you to have doubts about salvation through Christ? What was a recent experience you had of "touching" Jesus? How did it affect your doubt?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"Even though you do not see him now yet believe in him, you rejoice with an indescribable and glorious joy, as you attain the goal of your faith ..." (1 Peter 1:8bc to 9a).

Controversy on campus

Bishop criticizes production of 'The Vagina Monologues' at Notre Dame

FORT WAYNE, Ind. (CNS) — The bishop of Fort Wayne-South Bend has criticized the University of Notre Dame for once again allowing an on-campus production of "The Vagina Monologues," a play that explicitly discusses women's sexuality.

In a March 12 statement, Bishop John M. D'Arcy reiterated his objections to the play being performed at Notre Dame as it has been in previous years, calling it "an affront to human dignity."

The bishop noted that this year's production at the university was even more offensive because performances were scheduled on Monday and Tuesday of Easter week.

The play, based on interviews with numerous women, is a series of monologues in which women discuss their sexual experiences, including rape and other forms of violence against them.

For the 10th year in a row, college campuses across the country have sponsored limited productions of the play with students reading the script. The shows are put on to benefit a campaign called V-Day, which raises money for organizations working to stop violence against women and girls.

For the past several years, the staging of the play at several Catholic universities has brought criticism from those who say the play is inappropriate for a Catholic setting.

The play is usually staged around Valentine's Day but performances were extended to March 30 this year. In noting the Notre Dame performances scheduled for March 24 and 25, Bishop D'Arcy said they would occur during the "holiest time of the church year."

"Notre Dame has a long and blessed tradition of liturgical excellence, a tradition both theoretical and practical and eminently pastoral and prayerful," he said.

"Surely Notre Dame will not prefer or even seem to prefer the requirements of the V-Day campaign to the proper observance of Easter," he said.

The bishop said he and Holy Cross Father John Jenkins, Notre Dame's president, had several discussions about hosting the play on campus.

"I am grateful to Father Jenkins for the extensive time he has put into our conversation and correspondence on these matters over the last two months," the bishop said.

He said the priest told him that the way the school is presenting the play "is consistent with the identity of a Catholic university."

It will be in an academic building, there will be no fundraising effort and it will be followed by a panel discussion presenting the Catholic perspective.

Father Jenkins compared the play with books the students read in class by authors who espouse ideas contrary to Catholic teaching.

"As bishop of this historic diocese, entrusted with the spiritual welfare of all those who live within its borders, including the students at our beloved Notre Dame, I believe that, once again, I must publicly and respectfully disagree with Father Jenkins' decision," Bishop D'Arcy said.

"I am convinced that permitting performances of 'The Vagina Monologues' is not consistent with the identity of a Catholic university and not comparable to the long-accepted academic tradition through which a wide variety of authors are read and discussed in classes at Notre Dame and in all institutions of higher learning," he added.

Bishop D'Arcy said book discussions do not compare with watching a play because after a book or play is read in class, the student expects it to be discussed and critiqued.

"This is not so when one attends the performance of a play," he said, adding "Father Jenkins' attempt to give the performances of this play an academic quality seems deficient."

He also said the performances, even without fundraising, advance the V-Day campaign, which he said has an agenda that is "directly opposed to the dignity of the human person and is antithetical to Catholic teaching."

In a March 10 statement, Father Jenkins said he was "well aware that the performance of this play will upset many."

He noted that it was painful for him that Bishop D'Arcy did not approve of his decision and that some Notre Dame alumni "see the performance of this play on campus as contrary to our Catholic mission."

Bishop John M. D'Arcy of Fort Wayne-South Bend, Ind., said in a recent statement that he has repeatedly urged the University of Notre Dame to prohibit campus performances of "The Vagina Monologues," a play that explicitly discusses women's sexuality. The bishop is pictured in an undated file photo.

He also pointed out that others are "upset at the restrictions on this performance."

"My decision on this matter arises from a conviction that it is an indispensable part of the mission of a Catholic university to provide a forum in which multiple viewpoints are debated in reasoned and respectful exchange — always in dialogue with faith and the Catholic tradition — even around highly controversial topics," Father Jenkins said.

He added that Notre Dame's policy on events that stir controversy "rests on the conviction that truth will emerge from reasoned consideration of issues in dialogue with faith, and that we will educate Catholic leaders not by insulating our students from controversial views, but by engaging these views energetically, in light of Catholic teachings."

The Son of God began His human existence at conception!

The eternal Son of God did not begin His existence as a human being at His birth at Bethlehem.

Single Cell Embryo The Word became Flesh at the Annunciation, when the Virgin Mary is told that she has been chosen to be the Mother of the Savior and gives her consent. Therefore the Son of God began His human existence as a single-cell embryo.

Scripture says that after the Annunciation, Mary went in haste to visit her cousin Elizabeth, who was six months pregnant with John the Baptist. Experts say it would have taken two to three days for Mary to reach Elizabeth. Therefore, Jesus likely had not yet implanted in Mary's womb when his presence caused John to stir in Elizabeth's womb:

"The moment your greeting sounded in my ears, the baby in my womb leapt for joy." — Luke 1:44.

Like every human being, this is what Jesus looked like three days after conception.

3 Day Embryo

This 5 to 7 day-old embryo is what each of us looked like when we implanted in our mother's womb.

5-7 Day Embryo

How long is it possible for believers, who meditate on the unborn child who was God, not to see that unborn children are made in God's image?

Is it likely that those who ponder that our Almighty Protector was a baby in the womb will fail to see that babies in the womb merit protection?

'Jesus is Risen'

Easter proclamation should guide our lives throughout the year

Jesus is risen from the dead! This is the joyful Good News we proclaim at Easter.

How do we proclaim the Good News of Jesus' resurrection? We proclaim it not only by word, but especially by the holiness of our lives.

Every aspect of our lives must demonstrate to others that the Risen Lord lives in us and has given us each a new life. Everyone must be able to see that the Risen Lord has transformed us interiorly, and that now we live no longer for ourselves but for him.

On Palm Sunday we began the special journey of Holy Week, walking with the Lord on his way of agony, pain, suffering, crucifixion and death. The reading of the account of the Lord's passion on Palm Sunday and on Good Friday draws us into the Lord's way of the cross.

We accompany Jesus through each moment of his suffering, and as a result we grow closer to him. The way of sorrow and suffering turns into the glory of resurrection at Easter, and we continue to accompany Jesus as he appears to his disciples and shows them the marks of crucifixion on his body.

Spending time with Christ during these holy days inevitably means that we become more like him. The image of Christ, crucified and risen, grows within us and we become more Christlike.

Through our friendship with Christ we acquire the heart of Christ, and this is a heart which desires to bring his love to the world. He makes us compassionate toward others, as he had compassion for the poor and needy, the hungry, the sick and suffering, the sorrowing.

From the Bishop

BISHOP PETER J. JUGIS

Because he lives in us, we truly are able to extend Christ's love and mercy to others. He lives in us and impels us to have compassion for our brothers and sisters. This love, which we show to others, is ultimately the most beautiful fruit of our friendship with Jesus.

The message of proclaiming the Risen Lord by the holiness of our lives is also the theme of our diocesan Eucharistic Congress this year, which will be held Oct. 3-4 at the Charlotte Convention Center.

The congress occurs during the special jubilee year to honor the anniversary of the birth of St. Paul the Apostle. The congress theme has been chosen appropriately to reflect the life and mission of St. Paul: "It Is Christ Whom We Proclaim."

The proclamation that we hear at church during Easter — "Jesus is Risen" — is also meant to be proclaimed continuously by our lives. Christ lives in us because of our baptism and our reception of the sacraments.

It is Christ whom we proclaim this Easter through the holiness of our lives and through good works of charity done for our neighbors.

Easter, and starting over

Golfers — hackers, not pros — have the right idea. Mess up a shot and you can declare a "mulligan," a do-over. That would be mighty handy when it comes to your family, friends, work and on and on.

Of course, Easter isn't really "starting over." It's more fixing what was messed up and making it as it was meant to be in the first place.

So how can you fix what you've messed up? How can you make things as they were meant to be in the first place? A few suggestions:

— Never underestimate the power of "I'm sorry," both sacramentally (in confession) and socially (between you and others).

Neither is easy, because we hate to admit to ourselves that we are wrong and we really hate admitting that to others.

— Accept another's "I'm sorry" graciously. Just as God offers you grace

Your Family

BILL AND MONICA DODDS

when you celebrate the sacrament of reconciliation, you can gracefully receive another person's admission of guilt and his or her asking for forgiveness.

This can be challenging, too, because it just feels so darned good to say, "Yes, I forgive you, but ...," and then get in a few shots, digs, pointed comments. ("I told you so" is an all-time favorite.)

— Create an atmosphere in your home, in your marriage that makes it easier to ask and to offer forgiveness.

Resurrecting our faith

Easter message should compel us to action

On the day of Christ's resurrection, two of Jesus' disciples were walking to the village of Emmaus. It had been three days since the crucifixion of their master. And they were grieving.

Along the way they were joined by a man who eased their sadness as he explained the Scriptures to them concerning the Messiah. And although they did not recognize who he was, they knew they were in the presence of holiness. So they urged him to stay with them.

That evening while seated around the table, this very unique man took bread, blessed and broke it, and gave it to them. Immediately their eyes were opened, and they recognized the risen Jesus in their midst. Then he vanished.

They exclaimed, "Were not our hearts burning ... while he was opening the Scriptures to us?"

They returned to Jerusalem and shared with the apostles how they had come to know Jesus in the breaking of the bread.

What a wonderful story! And what priceless lessons are contained in it!

Like the disciples on the road to Emmaus, there are sad roads we too must walk. Sometimes it seems like nearly the whole world is confused and sad. But confusion and sadness are most often of our doing.

Like the Emmaus disciples, we need to allow the Lord to open our minds and hearts to the wisdom and joy contained in Scripture. The word of God is eternally rich.

But if we come to sacred Scripture full of ourselves, we leave no room for Jesus to explain its true meaning for us and our world.

For instance, how can we honestly read Jesus' instructions in Matthew's Gospel to feed the hungry and not be committed to ending global hunger and poverty?

How is it possible to hear in that same passage our Lord's teaching to welcome strangers, and yet possess disdain for undocumented workers?

How? Want only the best for each other.

Be aware that you play a central role in helping those loved ones become better people and they have the same responsibility toward you. Love builds them — and you — up. Grudges and resentment do the opposite.

— Be patient with yourself. God, who is all-knowing, hasn't given up on you. So you, who are not all-knowing, would be more than a little foolish to throw in the towel with "I'll never ...," "I just can't ..." or "There's no way I'm going to ..."

Curb your tongue. Quit smoking. Focus on work and get the job done. Get along with that one person who tends to drive you right up the wall! (Humility and perseverance can accomplish a lot!)

— Remember Judas and Peter. Each messed up big-time. Judas betrayed Jesus.

Making a Difference

TONY MAGLIANO

How can we claim that we are really listening to Christ's directive to care for the sick and those in prison, and yet refuse to urge government leaders to pass universal health care coverage and meaningful prison reform?

And how can we sincerely meditate on Jesus' command to put away the sword — "For all who take the sword will perish by the sword" — and not strive for multilateral disarmament and an end to all war?

If only we would allow Jesus to let the words of Scripture burn in our hearts like the Emmaus disciples did, how holier we would be, how better our world would be!

Why do so many Christians instead act as though evils like hunger, poverty, abortion and war are insurmountable facts of life? Has it not occurred that he who conquered sin and death can surely guide and strengthen us to transform our hurting world?

If like the Emmaus disciples we had enough faith to clearly recognize Christ in the breaking of the bread, our eucharistic gatherings would always be full of wonder and celebration.

Then we would enthusiastically go out into the world to be bread for others.

We would nourish many with the merciful, generous, just, peaceful and loving presence of Jesus. We would even become broken bread for others, working and suffering with them.

We would be the real presence of Christ to a world that is hungry for the bread of life!

Peter denied him — three times! One assumed what he did was unforgivable. The other returned to Christ and then went on to lead the early church and to sainthood.

— Realize that even though some things can't be undone — the harm you caused another or the harm that you endured because of another — you can choose to move forward and do good.

To acknowledge the past, accept the past and know that even though in some ways it may hobble you, you're not shackled to it. With God, all things are possible.

With God, Easter is possible.

Joyful traditions inspired by Easter

We are all inheritors of Jesus' Easter joy

When I was raising my children, I would get the same questions from them that I used to ask my grandmother: Why do we pay so much attention to eggs and rabbits and flowers and homemade bread at Easter?

My grandmother's answers always said celebrating these all came from Jesus, who died but came back to life so we could all go to heaven — if we were good, of course.

There was that special nod of her head as she shaped the dough and selected the perfect eggs to be set into her creations before they went into the oven.

That nod by my Italian grandmother — as anyone with an Italian background would know — meant that what she had spoken was absolute truth!

I did wonder when I was a youngster why Easter was not called "Resurrection," which is the event being celebrated, or "Pasch," the Jewish feast allied to the events of Jesus' last meal, death and rising from the tomb.

Later, as I studied more about language, I found that most European languages do use a word related to the Hebrew "Pasch" to describe the Christian celebration of the resurrection of Jesus. In Italy, it's "Pasqua"; France, "Pasques"; Holland, "Paschen"; and Spain, "Pascua."

English-speaking countries call it the paschal season too, though the day itself is not called "Pasch."

There is a reasonable explanation for all of this.

It lies in the fact that the English language is more closely related to the German language than to what scholars call the Romance languages such as French, Italian and Spanish.

Because of this, the roots of some words can be found in terms the early Germans used.

Easter is such a word. It comes from the rising light of the day, "Eostre." When the Germans first met the early Christian missionaries, heard of Christ and his triumph over death and that life is unending, it was easier to use "Eostre," the dawn of a new day, to designate the event.

If they had introduced a strange new word — "resurrection" or "Pasch," for example — the people would not have truly understood its meaning.

The young Christian church wisely used the word "Eostre," the celebration of the renewal of life each dawn, to designate the celebration of life eternally and forever.

And so, both the German and the English words for Easter are traced back to "Eostre," the rising light of a permanent new day — Jesus rising from the dead.

Father of the Church St. Bede wrote in the eighth century that "Eostre" was also the name of a West Germanic goddess of the dawn celebrated by pre-Christians at the vernal equinox.

As for eggs, an old Russian proverb says an egg "is dear on Easter Day." An artist told me once that eggs contain "the seed of life; they represent the revival of earth's fertility."

All of these customs really point out how Easter reminds us to celebrate the richness of new life that is continually in process in our earthly place.

But it is so much more.

It is a love story, the promise that in this earthly life we are not alone. We are forever linked to the Son of God, Jesus, who has given us the ultimate new life, the permanent joy of life forever, if only we choose it!

No matter what difficulties and sorrows we may have to bear, how many losses hit us, how broken we may feel, how mired in grief we may become, we are the inheritors of Jesus' Easter joy.

Good Friday began the process that blasted open the tomb; Easter Sunday made us alleluia people, capable of rejoicing and singing — no matter what darkness we may have to endure — because we are permanently celebrating the new light of such good news.

An ancient belief says, "On Easter morn the sun dances."

My grandmother agreed!

Pope expresses hope that Easter Week, Easter rituals deepen faith

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI said he hoped the church's Holy Week and Easter rituals would help deepen all Catholics' conversion to Christ and their solidarity with those who suffer.

At his March 19 general audience in the Vatican's Paul VI hall, the pope explained the meaning of the liturgies the church was to celebrate in the coming days.

The Easter triduum lets the faithful share in the mystery of Christ's suffering, death and resurrection, he said, and represents "the heart and climax of the liturgical year as well as the life of the church."

He asked the thousands of pilgrims present to use this holy period to let their lives be guided by God and to "renew our 'yes' to the divine will just as Jesus did with his sacrifice on the cross."

The moving ceremonies celebrated during Holy Week and Easter "offer us an opportunity to deepen the meaning and value of our Christian vocation," said the pope.

The liturgies are not simply a remembrance of the past, he said; they also entail a deeper reflection of and greater commitment to "today's history."

Therefore, he said, let everyone also dedicate prayers to the dramatic events and situations "that afflict many of our brothers and sisters in every part of the world."

"We know that hatred, division, violence never have the last word in history's events," he said, adding that Easter was a time to revive the great Christian hope that the "crucified Christ is risen and conquered the world."

"Love is stronger than hatred" and won the battle against death and evil; "we have to align ourselves with this triumph of love," said the pope.

People must start with Christ and work together with him in order to build a world "based on peace, justice and love," he said.

The pope also reminded everyone of the importance of confession, especially on Holy Saturday. He said the sacrament of reconciliation is an "indispensable way to purify the heart" and prepare for Easter.

"We need this inner purification, this renewal of ourselves at least once a year," he said.

During his audience, the pope received good wishes in a number of different languages because it was the feast of St. Joseph; Pope Benedict's birth name is Joseph Ratzinger.

Catholic crucifixes

Q. In our art history class, the question arose why crucifixes in Catholic churches usually include the figure of Christ and Protestant crosses do not. Neither the teacher nor any student could give an answer. Does it involve differences between Protestant and Catholic doctrines? (Ohio)

A. The difference between the two types of crosses is related to different ways Christians have historically honored the humanity of Jesus and tried to portray the meaning of his saving death and resurrection. It predates by centuries the differences between Catholic and Protestant customs and beliefs.

Very early Christian art rarely included images of the cross. Since crucifixion was the Roman punishment for big-time criminals, followers of Christ didn't quite know at first how to handle the "sign" of the cross, fearing that people outside the faith would focus on its shameful aspects and miss the Christian conviction that the crucifixion of Jesus was a sign of God's infinite love for the human race.

As St. Paul wrote, Christ's death on the cross is foolishness to nonbelievers, "but to us who are being saved it is the power of God" (1 Cor 1:18).

The cross appeared more widely later, but during roughly the first 800 years of Christianity the passion and death of Christ were viewed in both theology and art not so much as experiences of horror and pain but as expressions of the triumph of God in Jesus Christ over suffering and death.

For example, the Fathers of the Church, recognized as among the greatest early bishops and theologians, saw the five wounds of Christ (hands, feet and side) as sources of grace, giving birth to his body, the church.

This understanding of our Lord's death explains why during those centuries Christian crosses rarely bore the image of Christ as suffering. The conviction that the death of Christ was part of the whole paschal mystery, encompassing the death, resurrection and glorification of Jesus as one cosmic event, expressed itself by predominant emphasis on the resurrection.

Interestingly, the more mystical, otherworldly vision of Christ triumphant and ruling over all creation prevalent in early Christianity largely continues to this day in the theology and iconology of the Eastern Catholic churches.

and disfigured in bloody agony have been more common since around the 10th century.

However, with today's renewed emphasis on the resurrection and its central role in the history of salvation, something like jeweled crosses and crucifixes with the body of the risen Christ are again not uncommon in Catholic churches.

No one, to my knowledge, has satisfactorily explained why Protestant churches customarily use crosses without the body of the Lord. Perhaps it was another way some 16th-century Reformation leaders distanced themselves from Roman Catholic art and iconography, which, as I explained, by that time generally portrayed on its crosses a tortured and humiliated Christ.

White Stadium, spring training home of the New York Mets baseball team. Parishioners sold hot dogs, nachos and beer at two games this year to raise money for the church building fund.

Spring training inspires homilies, offers chances for evangelization

ORLANDO, Fla. (CNS) — With the spring training field for Major League Baseball's newest team right across the street, it's no wonder the sport would find its way into a homily at St. John the Evangelist Church in Viera.

"Our first Sunday here, the pastor (Father Lawrence Olszewski) compared the spirit of Lent with spring and spring training. He said how similar they are because it's a new start for everyone, including the ball club," said Washington Nationals spokesman John Dever.

His team has played spring training games at Space Coast Stadium since its inaugural season in 2005.

The Nationals were one of 18 major league teams that played their preseason games in five of Florida's seven dioceses this year. Players start reporting for spring training in mid-February and it's over at the end of March.

During that time the presence of the teams and their fans does more than inspire homilies and bolster attendance in nearby churches. It offers opportunities for game-day fundraising and evangelization, and for allowing Catholic players to share their stories.

But it also presents the challenge of meeting the spiritual needs of Catholic players, coaches and team staffers who have crushingly busy schedules.

"Baseball's schedule is not very forgiving for any faith, but I've been able to hit Mass a couple of times here on Saturdays and it has been fantastic," said Nationals left-handed pitcher John Lannan, a parishioner at St. Mary of the Isle Church in Long Beach, N.Y.

As an avid baseball fan, Father Tom Anastasia of St. Clement Church in Plant City often travels to Clearwater to enjoy his front-row seats for the Philadelphia Phillies at Bright House Network Stadium.

Sitting in Father Anastasia's front-row seats at Bright House stadium on a recent afternoon was Father Michael O'Brien, pastor of St. Justin Martyr Church in Seminole. As a child growing up in St. Petersburg, Father O'Brien regularly saw spring training games and had a brother-in-law, Bill Freehan, who played for the Detroit Tigers.

"Baseball is just a major part of our family," Father O'Brien said. "Spring training has been in my blood since I was a kid."

Like Father Olszewski in Viera, the priest uses spring training as a metaphor in his Lenten homilies. Lent is a time of preparation for Catholics, just as spring training is a time of preparation for professional baseball. Like the pros, they cannot let their skills go lax after Easter.

"What typically happens is people say, 'Hey, Lent is over,'" and they stop focusing on growing spiritually, he said, but he tells them, "Lent has been our spring training and the triduum is the opening game, so come out and play!"

At St. Bernadette Church in Port St. Lucie, parishioners sell concessions during the New York Mets' spring training at Thomas J. White Stadium.

"We get a portion of the sales," said parishioner Joe Duffy. "We put a donation jar out and people toss coins in it, too. The money goes toward the building fund."

The pastor, Father Victor Ulto, said he always joins in and has fun.

"We make a few hundred dollars. More than that, we evangelize. Along with the hot dogs, we tell them about the parish. It's terrific. Man does not live on hot dogs alone," he said.

Maryland Legislature passes measure to set up death penalty study

BALTIMORE (CNS) — Richard Dowling, executive director of the Maryland Catholic Conference, praised the Maryland General Assembly for passing legislation to establish a commission that will study the death penalty in Maryland.

The Catholic conference is the legislative lobbying arm of Maryland's Catholic bishops.

The House of Delegates passed its version of the bill March 21 on an 89-48 vote, and the Senate passed its version a day later on a 32-15 vote.

The two versions are expected to be reconciled soon, and Gov. Martin O'Malley is likely to sign the measure into law, Dowling said.

The commission will be made up of people on both sides of the issue, and it is expected to include representatives from the state's religious community.

"We're hopeful this commission will help remove the residual doubts about whether our justice system can be best served by repeal of the death penalty," said Dowling.

The commission is expected to hold regional hearings, and Dowling said he is "confident people and interests throughout the state will have their say."

"If the polls are any indication, the people will make clear their preference for life sentences without the possibility of parole," he said.

While the Catholic conference had high hopes that a bill to repeal the death penalty would have been approved this year, the legislation was one vote short in the Senate judicial proceedings committee. Dowling is hopeful the commission will recommend repeal.

"If it does, that will provide the momentum needed to move repeal legislation through," he said.

Vatican official discusses Saudi king's idea to initiate dialogue

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The importance of marriage and the family and the values needed to sustain family life can be an appropriate starting point for interreligious dialogue, said an official of the Pontifical Council for the Family.

Franciscan Father Gianfranco Grieco described as "interesting" Saudi Arabian King Abdullah Aziz's idea to initiate a dialogue with Muslims, Christians and Jews to defend the family, moral values and the importance of religion.

While Saudi Arabia is a strictly Islamic country where the public practice of any other faith is illegal, King Abdullah announced March 24 that he had been consulting Muslim religious leaders about the possibility of inviting "all religions to sit together with their brothers, faithfully and sincerely, as we all believe in the same God" to discuss "the crisis all humanity is suffering in the current time."

The institution of the family has been "weakened and dismantled," a lack of faith and religious practice has spread and "there is a lack of ethics, loyalty and sincerity," he said.

The king's speech said that after more consultations with Muslim leaders he hoped to convoke meetings with Christians and Jews because the Bible and the Torah, like the Quran, contain teaching that would help humanity defend itself against "those who tamper (with) religions, ethics and family systems."

King Abdullah said he had discussed the idea with Pope Benedict XVI when he traveled to the Vatican in November.

Commenting on the king's proposal, Father Grieco said, "Everything that helps family stability, values and education from whatever source — Christian, Muslim or Jewish — is good. We all know the importance of the family."

Vatican spokesman: Muslim convert has right to express his own ideas

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — When Pope Benedict XVI welcomed into the Catholic Church a Muslim-born journalist often critical of Islam, it was not a sign that the pope accepts everything the journalist believes, said the Vatican spokesman.

The Italian journalist, Magdi Allam, "has the right to express his own ideas. They remain his personal opinions without in any way becoming the official expression of the positions of the pope or the Holy See," said Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi.

Father Lombardi, the Vatican spokesman, made his comments March 27 in response to a statement from Aref Ali Nayed, a spokesman for the 138 Muslim scholars who initiated the Common Word dialogue project in October and who established the Catholic-Muslim Forum for dialogue with the Vatican in early March.

Father Lombardi said baptism is a recognition that the person entering the church "has freely and sincerely accepted the Christian faith in its fundamental articles" as expressed in the creed.

"Of course, believers are free to maintain their own ideas on a vast range of questions and problems on which legitimate pluralism exists among Christians," he said. "Welcoming a new believer into the church clearly does not mean espousing all that person's ideas and opinions, especially on political and social matters."

Nayed questioned the pope's decision to baptize Allam March 22 during the globally televised Easter Vigil from St. Peter's Basilica.

In a March 25 interview, Allam said his decision to convert grew as he became convinced that it was impossible to believe in a moderate form of Islam because "a substantial ambiguity found in the Quran and in the concrete actions of Mohammed" feeds violent tendencies.

Father Lombardi also strongly objected to the way Nayed referred to Allam's early education in Catholic schools in Egypt, implying that Catholic schools try to proselytize non-Christian students. The Catholic Church's commitment to the education of all children deserves praise and not suspicion, Father Lombardi said.

Father Lombardi said the Catholic Church today does not deserve an accusation that it lacks respect for human dignity and freedom, but there are many situations in the world where such respect is lacking and which need attention.

"Maybe this is why the pope accepted the risk of this baptism: to affirm the freedom of religious choice which derives from the dignity of the human person," he said.

Smoke-free sanctuary?

A woman smokes at the Vatican March 27. The Vatican used to be known as a haven for smokers, but in 2002 smoking was banned in offices and public places. Physicians and Nurses against Tobacco, a Rhode Island-based organization, has asked Pope Benedict XVI to support its petition to declare Vatican City the world's first tobacco-free state.

Bishop says he won't go to Catholic college's graduation

ERIE, Pa. (CNS) — Erie Bishop Donald W. Trautman said March 31 he will not attend May graduation ceremonies at Mercyhurst College because of the school's decision to allow Democratic presidential candidate Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York to hold a campaign rally on campus April 1.

Clinton supports keeping abortion legal.

"I am disappointed in Mercyhurst College for not reflecting the pro-life stance of the Catholic Church regarding abortion," said Bishop Trautman, who usually attends the ceremonies.

In response, Dr. Thomas Gamble, college president, said the school respected the bishop's decision but was "saddened by it" and "will deeply miss his presence at graduation" at the college, run by the Sisters of Mercy.

School officials invited all the presidential candidates to address students as an educational opportunity for students; Clinton was the first to accept the invitation.

Volunteer honored for work with refugees

in the United States, many refugees are overwhelmed with the challenges of adjusting to their new home. For more than 50 years, LaMay has been a resource and support to help refugees become self-sustaining, valuable members of the Charlotte community.

Known for his multitasking abilities, LaMay takes the lead in organizing his parish, St. Matthew Church in Charlotte, and community volunteers in securing and setting up furniture for new arrivals' apartments and ensuring the cupboards are stocked.

If a larger family lacks a washer and dryer, he's on the hunt to provide them one. If a washer and dryer can't be located, he collects bags of laundry and washes them overnight at home.

He makes sure that refugee children, who may step into a Charlotte winter with few belongings, are welcomed with warm coats and bicycles.

To many refugee clients, LaMay is both a mentor and a friend. Knowing how important it is for a refugee to quickly learn English, he often tutors several families at a time and even helps refugee children and their parents bridge the language barrier at area schools.

"He lives out his faith and inspires all around him to be better Christians with his self-deprecating humor, compassion and caring for the neediest among us," said Bruton.

LaMay's impact doesn't stop with his work with refugees. He serves as a CSS "ambassador" in the community, helping to identify needs, generate donations and recruit new volunteers.

A typical day might find him painting a classroom, checking on a client's job progress or explaining the mysteries of an American grocery store to a new arrival.

On a regular basis, he shares his energy and vision with fellow members of CSS's board of directors.

The National Volunteer of the Year Award annually recognizes the invaluable contributions volunteers make to the Catholic Charities network throughout the country.

LaMay was chosen from dozens of nominations submitted by local Catholic Charities agencies for exemplifying the spirit and mission of Catholic Charities in reducing poverty, supporting families, and empowering communities.

"Without the dedication and commitment of volunteers like Bill, who donate so much of their valuable time and energy, Catholic Charities agencies across the United States would never be able to provide services for millions of people a year," said Father Larry Snyder, Catholic Charities USA president.

"When I look at the lives of all the refugees that Bill has touched and the difference he has made in the community, I am grateful that he is part of the Catholic Charities family.

The world is a better place because of Bill," he said.

Volunteers nationwide provide the backbone of the Catholic Charities movement. Collectively, local Catholic Charities agencies rely on more than 243,000 volunteers each year to serve more than 7.8 million people of all faiths and diverse needs.

The 2008 award recipient will be announced during National Volunteer Week, April 27-May 3, and will be honored at Catholic Charities USA's Annual Gathering in New Orleans Sept. 27.

Prayer and reflection

Ecumenical women's gathering focuses on relationships with God

BREVARD—Women of many faiths recently reflected on their relationships with God and each other.

Two hundred and fifty women from 31 area churches attended the third annual Christian Woman's Day of Reflection at Sacred Heart Church in Brevard March 8.

The day opened up with a prayer service led by Austin Robeson, a member of Cornerstone Presbyterian Church in Brevard, followed by presentations by Anne Trufant and Jane Derrick.

Trufant, a parishioner of Sacred Heart Church and writer/singer of Christian music, spoke on "Relationships." She challenged the women to deepen their relationships with God through prayer and actions.

Derrick, a Bible teacher and workshop leader at the Billy Graham Training Center in Asheville, discussed "Prayer" and utilized a number of psalms in her presentation.

The day also provided opportunities for small group discussions and networking. Participants also were president," recalled his mother.

Susan Saunders, Deacon Roberts' childhood babysitter, remembered that he could recite all the U.S. presidents and vice presidents by the age of five.

"It's been amazing to look back over his life and see where the Lord has led him," she said.

Like Saunders, Patti Roberts also recognized something special in her son at an early age.

"At 5-years-old, he could sing all the Lutheran liturgy," she said.

Following high school, Deacon Roberts began training to be a Lutheran minister. He studied Lutheran theology under the guidance of Rev. Andrew Weisner, campus pastor at Lenoir-Rhyne College in Hickory.

"As a student assistant, Ben just knew what to do without instruction and without prompting," said Rev. Weisner. "He was born with a sense of liturgy; it's in his bones."

Rev. Weisner was instrumental in encouraging Deacon Roberts' conversion to the Catholic faith. He introduced him to Father Conrad Kimbrough, then-pastor at St. Benedict Church in Greensboro.

"Father Kimbrough was really helpful in helping to discern my vocation, not only by talking but by showing what it means to be a priest," said Deacon Roberts.

Deacon Roberts said there were three things that drew him to the Catholic faith.

"It was the Eucharist, a consistent moral doctrine and someone taught me how to pray the rosary," he said.

He was received into the Catholic Church and confirmed by Father Peter Fitzgibbons at St. Philip the Apostle Church in Statesville Oct. 30, 1999.

After a year of working in a soup kitchen in inner-city Chicago, Deacon Roberts entered the seminary under the Missionary Oblates of Mary Immaculate in Buffalo, N.Y. Next he entered his novitiate, a yearlong spiritual retreat in preparation for vows. During that time, he discerned the call to become a parish priest.

"There has been a wonderful example and support of so many priests in the Diocese of Charlotte," he said.

He said he is especially thankful for the support of the parishioners at his home parish, St. Philip the Apostle Church in Statesville, and its pastor, Father Kurt Fohn.

"I learned a lot about ministry and the importance of prayer for a priest from Father Kurt," Deacon Roberts said.

In his homily at the ordination, Bishop Jugis discussed the three areas through which deacons are called to serve the church: the ministries of the word, the altar and charity.

"It is as a servant that Benjamin will share in the mission and the grace of Christ," said Bishop Jugis.

"He wants to give himself in service to the church," said Amber Luckey, a college friend of Deacon Roberts. "He has a complete love for God and he's doing this very willfully and joyfully."

"I know he is always going to put those in his flock first," she said.

During the rite of ordination, Bishop Jugis called forth Deacon Roberts to make the promise of celibacy and the vow of obedience. He lay prostrate on the floor while the bishop, the concelebrating priests and deacons serving stood and prayed the Litany of the Saints.

Following the litany, the bishop laid his hands on Deacon Roberts' head and asked the Holy Spirit to descend upon him. Father Kimbrough, now a retired priest, and Deacon Nicholas Fadero of St. Patrick Cathedral then vested him with the dalmatic and stole.

Deacon Fadero has been a family friend of Deacon Roberts for many years; like Father Kimbrough, he encouraged Deacon Roberts in his vocation.

Next, Deacon Roberts knelt before the bishop, who placed the Book of Gospels in his hands. The new deacon then assisted with the Liturgy of the Eucharist.

Deacons are permitted to preach, to assist priests at the altar during the Liturgy of the Eucharist; to officiate at weddings, baptisms and funerals; and to administer blessings during certain liturgical rites. Transitional deacons are men enrolled in seminaries who intend to be ordained as priests.

Deacon Roberts is currently completing his studies at St. Charles Borromeo Seminary in Pennsylvania and will be ordained to the priesthood in the Diocese of Charlotte in June 2009.

"I love preaching," Deacon Roberts said, "But what I'm looking forward to most as a deacon is saying the words in the ritual of baptism."

"That I, through my unworthy hands, will bring about divine life in a soul," he said, "that is what I am looking forward to most."

Order priest arrested on sex abuse charges

Diocese unaware of police investigation into allegations

BY DAVID HAINS

SPECIAL TO
THE CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

CHARLOTTE — A religious order priest who once served in the Diocese of Charlotte was arrested April 2 on sexual abuse charges involving a minor.

Capuchin Franciscan Father Robert Yurgel was taken into custody by U.S. marshals in Passaic, N.J., where he lives, on a warrant issued by Charlotte-Mecklenburg police. He will be extradited to Charlotte.

The warrant alleges five counts of indecent liberties with a child and two counts of statutory sex offense that allegedly took place with a minor in 1999, while Father Yurgel was a parochial vicar at St. Matthew Church in Charlotte.

Father Yurgel served as parochial vicar at the church from 1997 until 1999. After this time, he served briefly at Our Lady of Consolation Church in Charlotte.

The alleged victim, now in his early 20s, only recently reported the matter to Charlotte-Mecklenburg police. Diocesan officials were not made aware of the allegations or the investigation prior to the April 2 announcement of the arrest by Charlotte-Mecklenburg police.

Under the provisions of the U.S. bishops' Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People, the Diocese of Charlotte is required to report allegations of sexual misconduct by church workers to civil authorities. No allegations regarding Father Yurgel were reported to the diocese.

Since the diocese adopted the charter in 2002, more than 16,300 diocesan employees and church volunteers have attended the diocese's sex-abuse awareness training program,

"Protecting God's Children."

The diocese conducts background checks on employees and volunteers to safeguard the young and the vulnerable. More than 2,400 background checks were conducted during the last fiscal year.

The training and background checks are ongoing.

In June 2002 at a meeting in Dallas, the U.S. bishops adopted the charter and its mandates for an annual audit and survey and also adopted the "Essential Norms" to assure that all dioceses adhere to the charter.

The charter also established the Office of Child and Youth Protection and the National Review Board to oversee compliance with the charter. The Diocese of Charlotte has been found in compliance with the charter.

The charter was updated in 2005, the norms in 2006. The charter and norms have Vatican approval.

David Hains is communications director for the Diocese of Charlotte.

DIOCESAN REQUIREMENTS FOR REPORTING MINISTRY-RELATED SEXUAL ABUSE OF A MINOR

1. Any individual having actual knowledge of or reasonable cause to suspect an incident of ministry-related sexual abuse is to immediately report the incident to the Chancery.
2. The Chancery will then report the incident to the proper civil authorities. The individual reporting the incident to the Chancery will be notified of the particulars regarding the Chancery's filing of the incident with civil authorities.
3. This reporting requirement is not intended to supersede the right of an individual to make a report to civil authority, but is to ensure proper, complete and timely reporting. Should an individual choose to make a report to civil authority, a report is still to be made to the Chancery.

NEED ASSISTANCE?

As a part of its commitment to support the U.S. bishops' "Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People," the Diocese of Charlotte has appointed a coordinator to assist survivors of sexual abuse.

The assistance coordinator can help survivors of abuse whether the incident took place in the Diocese of Charlotte or in another diocese.

The current coordinator is David Harold. Contact him at (704) 370-3363 or dwharold@charlottediocese.org.

Pope Benedict prays JP II will help him build on spiritual gifts

Almost 40,000 people joined Pope Benedict April 2 in St. Peter's Square for a Mass marking the third anniversary of Pope John Paul's death.

"We pray that from heaven he will continue to intercede for each one of us, and in a special way for me, whom providence has called to harvest his invaluable spiritual heritage," the pope said in his homily.

"May the church, following his teaching and example, continue his evangelizing mission faithfully and without compromise, tirelessly spreading the merciful love of Christ, the source of true peace for the whole world," he said.

The concelebrants included Polish Cardinal Stanislaw Dziwisz of Krakow, who had served as Pope John Paul's secretary for almost 40 years.

At an April 1 conference dedicated to the memory of Pope John Paul, Cardinal Dziwisz said he continues to receive hundreds of letters from people who have asked for Pope John Paul's intercession and he, himself, continues to pray for his former boss' assistance.

"I do not miss John Paul," he said. "I accompanied him for almost 40 years and now he accompanies me. When I have a problem, I turn to him and he is with me."

Speaking in Poland before traveling to Rome for the anniversary events, Cardinal Dziwisz said he hopes Pope John Paul will be beatified and canonized soon, but he would not put any pressure on Pope Benedict to speed the process further.

"The pope will know when and at which moment to proclaim John Paul II's beatification. We trust in his wisdom and assistance," the cardinal said.

Msgr. Slawomir Oder, the priest in charge of promoting the cause, told Vatican Radio March 31 that he had completed a 2,000-page draft of the "positio," the official position paper explaining why Pope John Paul should be proclaimed a saint.

An official at the Congregation for Saints' Causes is examining the draft, a few adjustments are expected, and then the report will be officially submitted for judgment.

Pope Benedict said Pope John Paul's repeated calls for people not to be afraid were not based on a trust in human potential or success, "but only on the word of God, the cross and the resurrection of Christ."

"He always said it with inflexible firmness, first brandishing his pastoral staff topped with the cross and then, when his physical energies were diminishing, almost hanging on to it, and then — on that last Good Friday in which he participated in the Way of the Cross from his private chapel — gripping the cross in his arms," the pope said.

Pope John Paul was totally devoted to Christ, Pope Benedict said: "With him he lived and with him he wanted to die."

Pope Benedict prayed that Pope John Paul would intercede for him with God, helping him to gather and build on the spiritual gifts that the late pontiff gave to the church.

'His love and joy were contagious'

At Vatican, pilgrims remember pope as man of peace, father figure

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Pilgrims gathered in St. Peter's Square to mark the third anniversary of Pope John Paul II's death remembered him as a man of peace and a pastoral father who inspired a whole generation of young people around the world.

Tens of thousands of people of every age and nationality attended the April 2 outdoor memorial Mass with Pope Benedict XVI. Banners and flags, many of them representing Poland, fluttered in the gentle breeze under Rome's warm spring skies.

Pope John Paul "really felt like a father figure, and the way he loved Christ inspired me to love God more," said Carolina Robles, 25, of Lubbock, Texas.

She told Catholic News Service that the late pope convinced her that committing oneself to God was something that every young person could and needed to do.

"Being young, he made me think I could do that and not wait until the end" to follow Christ, she said.

"He knew young people had a yearning for God in their hearts," said Robles, one of a small group of graduate students of theology studying in Rome this spring.

Another Texas student, Stephen Schietinger of Austin, said when Pope John Paul died, "I felt this void."

It suddenly felt like this "pastoral father who had watched over me my whole life" and "who had personally cared for me wasn't there anymore," said Schietinger, 22.

Father Stefaan Lecleir, a member of the Institute of the Incarnate Word, said the pope's main message throughout his nearly 27-year pontificate was "to gather the youth and to be a real father for them and to give them a strong message of truth."

The priest from Antwerp, Belgium, said the Polish pope helped all people "feel at home in the church."

The late pope was popular in part, he said, because people saw him as a man who practiced what he preached.

"He was a man who suffered under communist rule, who was true to himself even during persecution. What he believed and what he did were united, and I think people feel that when someone is true" to his or her beliefs, he said.

Federico Geli of Mendoza, Argentina, said the late pope "could communicate the word of God really well."

He always urged young people to not be afraid "because God is with you, Jesus needs you. So I think that's why the youth loved him," he said.

Sefanit Mekonnen said Pope John Paul "gave us a lot to be thankful for, and I'm here to pray for him."

"His joy and love were contagious," said the 26-year-old from Dallas.

Many pilgrims said they were happy Pope John Paul's sainthood process was going forward. Teresa Deeble of Essex, England, said the pope, who always prayed for peace, deserved to be honored in such a way.

Nikki DeMarco and her husband, Anthony, who reside in Vicenza, Italy, said they did not think the canonization process was going too slowly.

"In this world of instant gratification, it is nice some things take awhile," she said.

Diocesan video to play prior to papal Mass

BY DAVID HAINS

SPECIAL TO
THE CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

CHARLOTTE — During his visit to the United States, Pope Benedict XVI will get to see a piece of the Diocese of Charlotte, without ever leaving Washington, D.C.

A video greeting by Bishop Peter J. Jugis and images from the diocese will be seen on the large-screen television in Nationals Park prior to the papal Mass April 17.

At the invitation of the Archdiocese of Washington, the Diocese of Charlotte created the welcoming video for Pope Benedict. The pope's first visit to the United States is April 15-20.

In the one-minute video recorded at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte, Bishop Jugis briefly describes the diocese and its 300,000 Catholics.

"We call home places like Biscoe and Boone, Greensboro and Gastonia, Cherokee and Charlotte," says the bishop in the video. "We worship Jesus Christ, his Father and the Holy Spirit in a beautiful cathedral and in tiny mission parishes."

Bishop Jugis was taped in front of the cathedral, the chair for the bishop in the sanctuary at St. Patrick Cathedral. The background was altered slightly with the addition of a silhouetted crucifix. The sanctuary was returned to its regular appearance after the video shoot was completed.

WINSTON-SALEM — Benedictine Father Samuel Weber, associate professor of early Christianity and spiritual formation at the Divinity School at Wake Forest University in Winston-Salem, has been invited to compose original chant settings that will be performed during Pope Benedict XVI's visit to Washington, D.C., April 15-17.

The chants will be sung during vespers, or evening prayer, with the pope at the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception April 16, and during a private Mass — the first papal Mass celebrated by Pope Benedict in the United States — at the apostolic nunciature (papal embassy) the following morning.

"I am deeply honored to have a small part to play in the preparation of this vesper service," said Father Weber.

The Benedictine monk, of St. Meinrad Archabbey in Indiana, composed original chant melodies for the antiphons, which are scriptural verses sung before and after the psalms and canticles of vespers.

Peter Latona, basilica director of music, invited Father Weber to compose the chants and has created polyphonic settings based on Father Weber's chants.

During the service, the antiphons will be sung by the basilica's 24-member choir in plain chant before the psalms and canticles of vespers, and then repeated afterward in full harmony.

Father Weber said the decision to use chant melodies reflects the aesthetic and tradition at the heart of prayer life in the Catholic Church.

"Historically, sacred compositions were based on the chant melodies which formed the core of liturgical music," he said.

The April 16 vespers service is expected to be televised worldwide.

the upcoming diocesan Eucharistic Congress, an annual event that draws 10,000 people to the Charlotte Convention Center for a day of worship, music and reflection. This year's congress takes place Oct. 3-4.

The bishop ends his welcome by expressing his hope that the papal visit will have a positive impact on America.

"May the inspiration of his visit live in the hearts and souls of all Americans for many years to come," says Bishop Jugis.

The video will be played for the audience gathered in Nationals Park, the new major league baseball stadium and home to the National League's Washington Nationals, prior to the Mass celebrated by Pope Benedict. Bishop Jugis will be among the bishops and priests to concelebrate the Mass.

Bishop Jugis and other bishops also will attend vespers and a meeting with the pope in the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington April 16.

Pope will find a spiritual nation in U.S., says survey

What Every Catholic Can Do to Transform the World," debuted the same day.

By a ratio of more than 4-to-1, the survey said, Americans have a favorable opinion of Pope Benedict; 58 percent of those surveyed said they view him favorably, compared with 13 percent who have an unfavorable opinion.

Seventeen percent said they have never heard of him.

Sixty-five percent of Americans have a favorable opinion of the Catholic Church, compared to 28 percent who have an unfavorable view.

"The bottom line is despite very negative stories about the church and the pope" over the last few years, Anderson said, "the American people have a very ... balanced view of (Pope) Benedict and the Catholic Church, and they are very open to hear his views on how they might live out their faith."

Despite their positive view of the pope, Americans said they don't know much about him, he noted.

When Pope Benedict comes to the United States, Anderson said, Americans will find that he "is a very warm and kind man whose intellectual talents and formidable background as a theologian do not prevent him from giving sermons that are accessible to the average person."

"He is an incisive creative thinker who is one of the most skilled and thoughtful theologians of modern times," he continued. "He is deeply concerned about the future of the world and has a carefully thought-out worldview on how the church relates to the world and how the church can set out to change the world."

Survey says

Other survey results showed that:

— Sixty-three percent of Americans believe the Catholic Church contributes either "a great deal or a good amount to people and communities" in the United States; 24 percent believe the church contributes "not very much or nothing at all."

— Forty-two percent of Americans said they would like to attend one of Pope Benedict's public appearances; 66 percent of Catholics said they would like to attend one of the events.

— Seventy percent or more of Americans said they want to hear the pope talk about spiritual matters such as allowing God to be part of their daily lives and finding spiritual fulfillment "by sharing their time and talent," as well as how "they can make a positive difference in the world, their state and communities."

— Nearly two-thirds of Americans, or 64 percent, expressed an interest in hearing Pope Benedict address "how they can have a society where spiritual values play an important role."

— Most Americans identify themselves with a particular religion: Protestant, 52 percent; Catholic, 26 percent; Mormon, 2 percent; Jewish, 2 percent; Hindu, 1 percent; Muslim, 1 percent; other, 3 percent. Thirteen percent identified no religion.

— A majority of Americans attend religious services regularly, including 59 percent of Catholics.

The survey was conducted Feb. 25-March 5; 1,015 adults 18 years of age or older were interviewed.

An oversample of Catholics also was done, so a total of 613 interviews were conducted with Catholics nationwide. The margin of error is plus or minus 3.1 percentage points for the entire survey, and plus or minus 4 percentage points for the Catholic sample.

Promoting hope

Anderson told his press club audience that the Knights have set up a special Web site — www.papaltrip.com. It features a daily schedule of papal events, an interactive map, a detailed biography of Pope Benedict, the full text of his encyclicals and links to his books.

The Knights also will sponsor a nationally broadcast TV discussion program titled "A Journey of Hope" to preview the trip. It will air April 13 on CBS affiliates in New York, Washington, Chicago and Los Angeles.

It also will air on the Fox Business Channel on cable and on a variety of Catholic television outlets, including the Eternal Word Television Network. (Viewers should check local listings for airtimes.)

Anderson told his audience that it is "no accident" that Pope Benedict's first encyclical was on love: "Deus Caritas Est" ("God Is Love").

"The notion that God is love is fundamental to our understanding of our creator," Anderson said. "We are all fallible human beings and we all need love and the very fact we exist at all is the result of God's love. It is often hard for us to love others, but love we must if we have any hope to change the culture."

Upcoming book links parishioners' politics with their priests' views

Interviews, parish bulletins reveal what priests emphasize

BY PATRICIA ZAPOR
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — A small study to be reported in an upcoming book on the political influence of parish priests found huge differences in the types of political messages being emphasized from one parish to another, which may come as no surprise to anyone.

But whichever subjects their priests address, said author Gregory Smith, a fellow at the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life, people clearly are being influenced in their political thinking by what they hear from the pulpit and read in their parish bulletins.

Smith spoke March 14 to a group of editors of U.S. and Canadian Catholic publications and staff members of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops at USCCB headquarters in Washington.

For his upcoming book, "Politics in the Parish: The Political Influence of Catholic Priests," Smith conducted detailed case studies at nine parishes in adjacent dioceses in Maryland, Virginia and Washington, and analyzed data from the Notre Dame Study of Parish Life, which was conducted in the mid-1980s.

Smith said that although he studied only a small number of parishes in a relatively small geographic area, the type of political messages being heard varied radically from one parish to another, even within the same diocese. He gathered data in 2004, concluding shortly after the general election in November.

For instance, parishioners were more likely to describe themselves as politically conservative if they were in parishes where the priests regularly emphasized life issues, such as abortion and stem-cell research, but rarely brought up subjects such as poverty or the environment in a political context, Smith said.

Likewise, Catholics who described themselves as politically moderate or liberal were much more likely to be members of parishes that regularly emphasized political responsibilities toward the poor or immigrants.

The priests he interviewed don't mince words that might not be well received, he found.

"Across the board they all said they were willing to speak up even when they know the subject matter is going to be unpopular," he said.

Smith said his extensive interviews with priests and parishioners were designed to filter out people who choose their parish on the basis of whether it has a reputation for being politically liberal or conservative. By doing so, he explained, he believes he was able to link people's voting behavior to influences from their parishes.

In comparing the data from the Notre Dame study to his own recent interviews, Smith told Catholic News Service he found the link between people's political beliefs and the perspectives they hear at church to be more indirect than what the Notre Dame report showed.

The Notre Dame study found a strong correlation between how people voted and the political views of their priests. No comprehensive analysis of how Catholics are or are not influenced by what they hear at their churches has been conducted since that mid-1980s study, Smith said.

Besides questioning priests and parishioners, Smith over the course of the year also studied parish bulletins, as a source of information about what issues are emphasized in parish life, whether through activities or explicit voter guidance materials.

"There was a very close match between the information conveyed in the bulletins and the responses from priests about what they said they emphasize," Smith said.

By 'walking wounded,' we become healers for Christ

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

When my daughter was 5 years old, she was involved in a household accident that left a deep gash in her upper thigh. Horrified, I scooped her up, wrapped a clean dish towel around the wound and took her to the emergency room where they cleaned and sutured it.

It healed remarkably fast and the leg is fully functional, but nine years later a scar remains as a visible reminder of the accident.

There's an expression, "walking wounded," that describes people who are by all appearances functional but who carry in their bodies and their psyches the traces of injury.

Cuts and abrasions leave scars on the skin; abusive treatment, tragic events and acute losses leave scars on the soul.

No human beings who live in an imperfect world are immune; in a sense, we're all "walking wounded," projecting images of well-being and perfection while hiding the evidence of those wounds out of a sense of shame and guilt.

According to the Gospel featured three weeks ago, Thomas remained unbelieving until he felt the nail marks in Jesus' hands and the wound in his side — blemishes that remained even in Jesus' resurrected body.

Although one would expect that all physical traces of his torture on the way to Calvary would have faded away, they endured not only visibly but palpably. Jesus the healer, risen from the dead, victorious over suffering and death, chose to reveal himself to his disciples as a wounded person.

Why? Perhaps he did so to remind us that healing is not about restoration to some imagined state of pristine perfection. Our wounds, like his, have the power to heal others.

Our sufferings, touched by the healing love of a resurrected savior, become a source of empathy, compassion and the motivation to ease others' sufferings.

By putting aside misplaced shame and guilt and "walking wounded" with one another, we become healers as well, according to the image of Christ, by whose wounds we are healed.

Questions:

What "wounds" do you carry but hide from view? How can these become a source of compassion and healing for others?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"By his wounds you have been healed" (1 Pt 2:24).

Catholic leaders reflect on football player's impact on, off field

BY JEFF KUROWSKI
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

GREEN BAY, Wis. — While the sports world came to halt at the March 4 announcement of Green Bay Packer Brett Favre's retirement, Catholic leaders in Green Bay and Mississippi also paused to reflect on the impact the near-certain Hall of Fame quarterback had on and off the field.

Father Richard Getchel, pastor at St. Agnes Church on Green Bay's west side, presided at Brett and Deanna Favre's wedding in 1996, and baptized their daughter Breleigh in 1999.

The couple grew up in Mississippi. "I thought he would return, so it surprised me," Father Getchel said. "I'm happy for him and the family. I sent Deanna an e-mail. She wrote back thanking me for my concern, which was nice."

Norbertine Father James Baraniak, chaplain for the Packers, attempted to reach the Favres in the days prior to the announcement. He was unaware of the pending retirement.

Instead, Father Baraniak sought to share a special invitation from the papal visit advance team for Brett and his wife and the Packers' Coach Mike McCarthy to attend the papal Mass in Washington.

When he finally spoke to Deanna, "she explained that it was an intense time," so they weren't answering all their phone calls.

"When I shared with her the proposal," the priest said, "she said if it was entirely up to her, she would give me an answer immediately, but she had to talk to Brett. 'You know that husband of mine,' she said."

Both priests spoke of their admiration for the Favres. St. Agnes Church was the family's home parish, while they were in Green Bay. Daughters Brittany and Breleigh had both attended Holy Family School, located on the parish grounds.

Father Baraniak first met Brett 12 years ago on a team flight. It is a moment he will never forget.

"I didn't get the memo to dress formal on the plane," he said. "I was wearing a polo and khakis. When he saw me on the plane, he pointed me out and said, 'New guy.' When he later saw me in my habit, he was really surprised. He said, 'New guy's a priest!' That was our introduction."

Father Baraniak was with the Favres in Oakland when Irvin Favre, Brett's father, died in 2003.

"They are very impressive people," he said, "so there is a bit of sadness. For very young people, they have done very well considering all the difficult times they have faced," including Deanna's battle with breast cancer.

Brett's playful demeanor was not only displayed on the field, said Father Baraniak. It was sometimes showcased at the team Mass prior to home games.

"There are more people at the Mass on the road, so at home, I really saw that personality," he said.

"I remember I was getting ready to start a Mass, when Brett interrupted me. Jeff Thomason (former Packer tight end) was wearing a wild shirt," the priest recalled. "Brett stood up and said, 'Excuse me Father, but J.T., I just want to know if you're wearing one of those shirts that if you stare at it long enough an image appears?' Everyone was laughing."

The Favres attend St. Thomas the Aquinas Church in Hattiesburg, Miss. Father Tommy Conway, pastor, said he will miss trips to Green Bay for Packers games, but is happy for the family.

"It's a massive relief for Deanna," he said. "She loves the Packers, but she was concerned that something would happen to him."

"I think Deanna has shaped Brett Favre into the man he is today. I give her an awful lot of credit," he said. "They have faced adversity in their lives and they are both better people for it."

"I told Brett when he left for this past season that I was praying for two things for him," Father Conway added. "I wanted him to remain free of injury and to have a whole lot of fun. He was able to accomplish both."

One way the Favres live out their faith is through their numerous charitable efforts, including the Brett Favre Fourward Foundation and the Deanna

Favre Hope Foundation.

Green Bay Bishop Robert J. Banks, who has spoken with Brett several times at the annual Bishop's Charities Game, said the player's popularity goes beyond his success on the football field.

People relate to not only his wife's battle with cancer, but to the quarterback's own struggles with addiction to painkillers and deaths in the family.

"He's faced some tough challenges and he's handled them so well," he said.

Loyalty, unpredictability and humility come to mind about Brett, said Auxiliary Bishop Robert F. Morneau of Green Bay.

"Brett was here for 16 years," he said. "This is almost unheard of in professional sports."

"I believe that Packers fans interpreted this as a sign of fidelity; that Brett really wanted to be here," he said. "He seemed to be saying, 'I love this organization and its many and varied members.' People responded to this with deep affection and admiration."

Acting on faith

Youths take part in an acting workshop during Extreme Faith 2008 at St. Barnabas Church in Arden March 15.

Youths gather for fun, prayer at annual retreat

BY CAROLE MCGROTTY
CORRESPONDENT

ARDEN — Youths from around the Diocese of Charlotte recently learned different ways to proclaim Christ.

More than 100 youths gathered for the annual Extreme Faith middle school youth retreat held at St. Barnabas Church in Arden March 15.

Sponsored by the diocesan Youth Ministry Office, Extreme Faith is a daylong event held at different parishes each year. It is an opportunity for Catholic youths to gather together for a day of fun, workshops, communal prayer and extreme games — including an obstacle course, bungee run and other games of skill.

"It's a way to bring middle school children into the life of the Catholic Church through experiences geared toward them," said Peg Ruble, associate director of diocesan youth ministry.

"The U.S. bishops have stated that ministry to youth should be integral to the life of the church. This retreat combines the message of Jesus with the mission of the young church — to know, love and serve," she said. "It provides an experience of church that allows youths to say they've heard Jesus' message and it was fun."

This year's theme was "It Is Christ Whom We Proclaim," chosen to coincide with the theme of the upcoming diocesan Eucharistic Congress in Charlotte Oct. 3-4.

The theme was woven through the retreat's seven workshops for youths and two for the 20 adult chaperones and volunteers. Youths were assigned to participate in some workshops and got to select others.

The acting workshop was a popular choice — participants learned what Jesus was trying to teach in each parable by acting it out and putting the parables into modern times.

In the "Iconography: Creating Sacred Images" workshop, youths used art to learn about Jesus. Other workshops utilized music, humor and different ways of learning to reveal how Jesus wants his people to live and behave.

The workshops "honor the developmental needs of early adolescents with the relational needs of the teen," said Ruble. "We hope to offer them a taste of the depth and wisdom of the faith and the opportunity to grow in understanding."

Meanwhile, adults discussed the current and future needs of youth ministry in the diocese. Chaperones and volunteers from various parishes discussed different approaches for reaching and evangelizing middle school-aged youths.

CHARLOTTE — It was a whirlwind season for the Charlotte Catholic High School swim team, which recently won both men's and women's North Carolina High School Athletic Association state 3-A swimming and diving championships at N.C. State University's Willis Casey Aquatic Center in Raleigh Feb. 9.

"It was a great year for all of us, and it was definitely an awesome way for the seniors to end their final season swimming for Charlotte Catholic," said men's team captain Mark Lascara.

The win marked the fourth consecutive state title for the men's team and the seventh consecutive state title for the women's team.

"We went into states after winning regionals by over 130 points, so our heads were held high but we didn't take anything for granted," said Lascara.

The men beat runner-up Lake Norman High School by 133.5 points and the women beat second-place Ronald Wilson Reagan High School by 102.8 points.

"I must give credit for our success to the coach, Brian Gross," said women's team captain Kathryn Turner.

This was Gross' fourth year coaching the Charlotte Catholic swim team; assistant coach was Molly Meehan.

Spring — a good time to check your beneficiaries

As we welcome daylight savings time and the official arrival of spring, many of us are in the process of gathering documents for income tax returns. This is also a very good time for an estate plan review.

When was the last time you checked the beneficiary designation on your employer benefit plans? When was the last time you checked the beneficiary designation on your own property, such as life insurance and IRAs?

The beneficiary designations on these contractual arrangements are just as important as the provisions of your last will and testament or trust. The beneficiary designation will control, for example, who gets life insurance proceeds at your death.

Your estate planning objectives may change from time to time, and your beneficiary designations also must change to reflect your new plan. Perhaps in filling out your employment forms or opening an IRA you did not designate any beneficiary, thinking you would do this later. If you do not follow through with this, it could mean that these benefits are not included in your estate plan as you intended.

There are many consequences of not keeping your beneficiary designations up to date. If the beneficiary you named dies before you, the proceeds of the life insurance or other benefit may be paid instead to that person's estate, which may not be your intention at all.

Or, at best, the proceeds would be paid to your estate, perhaps requiring a probate court proceeding to determine the distribution of funds to beneficiaries. You may have intended to benefit individuals or charities other than those the court decides.

To avoid some of these problems with your benefits, you should designate a contingent beneficiary. For example, you could name your living trust as a contingent beneficiary on your benefit plans.

Guest Column

JUDY SMITH
GUEST COLUMNIST

In that case, if the primary beneficiary predeceases you, at your death the proceeds will be paid to your trust and distributed according to the terms of your trust agreement as part of your overall estate plan.

It may also fit very well in your estate plan to name your church, Catholic school, Catholic agency, the diocesan foundation or the Diocese of Charlotte as the contingent beneficiary of your benefit plans. If your primary beneficiary predeceases you, you will then be helping to sustain Christ's ministries for future generations.

Another suggestion for beneficiary designation on life insurance or retirement plans: name the church as beneficiary of a percent of the plan. Beneficiary designations can be divided up in any manner you choose, and including the church in your designations leaves a wonderful legacy of your faith.

Estate planning professionals advise reviewing your estate planning documents — wills, trusts and durable powers of attorney — every few years to assure they continue to meet your objectives and family situation. For the review of your estate plan to be complete, you should also be sure to review your benefit plan beneficiary designations.

Prayers can foster peace

I was struck by two quotes from columns in the March 21 issue.

Tony Magliano ("Resurrecting our faith"): "Why do so many Christians instead act as though evils like hunger, poverty, abortion and war are insurmountable facts of life? Has it not occurred that he who conquered sin and death can surely guide and strengthen us to transform our hurting world?"

And Pope Benedict XVI ("Pope expresses hope that Easter Week, Easter rituals deepen faith"): "We know that hatred, division, violence never have the last word in history's events."

Remember how many years that Catholics prayed for the conversion of Russia, and then it happened? I don't think any of us could have accomplished that as humans, but our prayers were answered.

My hope is that we can start, as a church, praying for a conversion to peacefulness of all peoples, especially for suicide bombers in the Middle East. They believe in God, and are doing what they do because of their belief. We must ask God to change their ways of thinking, from violence to peaceful ways to serve Him.

As humans, we cannot bring this about, but as people of God, we can ask his help to accomplish it. With God all things are possible.

An Easter morning reflection

A story as sure and true as the turning of the earth

It was a day that began like all other days.

Morning broke as it always had since that first morning at the dawn of time. Darkness gave way to light as the first rays of the sun stretched over the horizon. Humanity awakened, yawned and set about the arduous tasks the new morning always brings.

No one on earth had any idea that this day of all days would change the world like no other before it or since. In fact, those who were closest at that moment perhaps stood the farthest away, even as they stood on the brink of its discovery.

They were in mourning — a deep, confused and fearful sort of mourning. A mourning born of witnessing the betrayal, torture and murder of a beloved friend and teacher.

An empty and hollow mourning that fills a person's soul with the overwhelming heaviness that comes when you feel you've lost everything, even hope.

These were people who had just spent three years following a man for whom they'd given up homes, careers and even families to follow. These were people who had sat at this man's feet and tried to understand his radical teachings about a loving God he called his Father.

They'd been with him and watched as he healed the sick and drove out demons. They'd seen him feed thousands with a handful of food and watched as he walked on water. They'd seen him calm storms and had even watched as he brought the dead back to life.

This man was their master, their teacher and their Savior. And they'd just buried him.

It isn't hard to imagine what that select group must have felt at the moment when it was the darkest just before that first Easter dawn. What it must have been like for Peter and James and John. And Andrew, Phillip and Bartholomew. Matthew, Thomas, Jude Thaddeus, James the Less and Simon.

These weren't learned men. Nor were they leaders. And from what we read of them in the Scriptures, they weren't very good followers either. For even as hard as they tried, it seems that more often than not they got the Master's message wrong, lost faith and sometimes just plain missed the mark altogether.

Yet they stayed the course and followed their friend. Followed him to the bitter end, which is exactly where it appeared they were now. They were sad, lost and dejected, and even hiding in fear for their very lives for having associated with this man they literally had worshipped.

Then the dawn began to break over their sadness, just as the first rays of light pull a new morning over the horizon, when a few of them went to the tomb and found it empty.

This new emptiness of the tomb brought hope to some of them and doubts to others.

And who wouldn't have doubted, given all they had been through?

But through all of this, not one of them gave up and went home, or tried to find another savior to follow.

Even when conventional human logic and reason would have told most of us that it was high time to throw in the towel, these 11 hand-picked men all hung tough and hung together.

Oh, they huddled and hid at first, but then something happened — something that took a group of disciples who, in three years, could never seem to get the Master's message right, and transformed them into 11 dynamic, highly-motivated preachers and teachers of the Gospel of Christ.

For me, it's this transformation that proves more than anything else that the Gospel of Jesus Christ is true. It could only be truth and the touch of the Master's pierced hand that could pick up 11 distraught human beings, dust them off and then send them out preaching the Gospel to the four corners of the earth.

Without them, we would never have known. Without them, we too would have had no hope, even though the tomb was empty. Somebody had to tell the story.

So Easter morning should have us thanking God for the message of salvation that comes through his Son, Jesus Christ. And thanking God also for the messengers who brought Him to us.

It is a day that makes every day for those who believe a glorious new day like no other.

W.S. "Bill" Melton Jr., a humorist and convert, is a parishioner of St. Michael Church in Gastonia.

Security over liberty?

"If we restrict liberty to obtain security, we will lose them both."

— Ben Franklin

As we now live in a post 9/11 era, dominated by the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) and its concerns for America's security, we have to ask ourselves if the message of Ben Franklin holds true in the current environment.

If we look at the issue of immigration and its subsequent handling by DHS instead of the State Department, we realize there is no appeal process for the undocumented immigrant. This estimated population of 12 million is living in fear and in the realization that any hope for "suspension of deportation" is nil.

The immigration issues are not always clear cut but their study is relevant to the democratic process. If we look at this wonderful experiment in liberty and freedom that our forefathers created, we will find the pillars of democracy include: a free press, a transparent judiciary, an educated population and a strong federal reserve.

Franklin's sage advice was to alert citizens of the newly-formed democracy to the delicate balance that exists between liberty and security.

Let's look at our country and the North Carolina community today in light of Ben Franklin's statement.

The U.S. House barely rejected a bill that would have made it a felony for any U.S. citizen to aid or assist an undocumented immigrant, directly or indirectly, during the employment process.

Bank of America offered a bank card to enable immigrants forwarding monies home to families who are very often living in poverty. But the media-directed public opinion classified any aid to potential undocumented immigrants as a mechanism for sending funds to would-be terrorists.

Current records will show that there are approximately 300,000 undocumented immigrants living in North Carolina.

We live at a time of unparalleled opportunity and in a state that houses several of the largest banks in the world. Surely, the North Carolina banking community, the political establishment, the local media and the Chamber of Commerce — assisted through its various business outreach committees — could put forth an immigration alternative to the politically correct indecisiveness spawned by this election year.

If we as Catholics view democracy as participatory and borne of civility, then surely we should be leaders in developing and effecting solutions for immigration reform.

Thomas Paine stated "that which we obtain too easily, we esteem too lightly. It is dearness only which gives everything its value."

The U.S. bishops' recommendations for comprehensive immigration reform include:

— The issue of separation: U.S. citizens and legal permanent residents endure long years of separation from family members while waiting on a backlog of available visas, often waiting up to 15 or more years for the visa to become available.

Recommendation: Pending backlogs should be reduced and more visas made available so that families can be reunified.

— The issue of lack of access to due process: Immigrants have often been subject to laws and policies that debase our country's fundamental commitment to individual liberties and due process, such as detention for months without charges, secret hearings and ethnic profiling.

Asylum seekers are also incarcerated for long periods of time while their claims for asylum are considered.

Recommendation: Government policies should not confuse immigration with terrorism. The government should revisit these laws and make the appropriate changes consistent with due process rights.

— The issue of undocumented workers: Undocumented workers who are already in the country and have formed lives here are often "stuck," having no means to become legal.

Recommendation: Those already in the country, who do not have proper immigration documentation, should be given the opportunity to obtain legalization if they can demonstrate good moral character and have built up equities in this country.

The Catholic bishops have offered a blueprint for comprehensive immigration reform, and the above issues are but a few of their recommendations. For more, visit www.justiceforimmigrants.org.

The power of words

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE
HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

Jesuit Father Walter Burghardt, one of the finest priest and homilist of our times, died on Feb. 17.

The first time I met Walter was at a meeting in Washington. One by one we gave our opinions on a church issue we were discussing. When the time came for Walter to give his input, his manner of speech was striking. Every word he said had weight. He chose them with such care and spoke them in the spirit of a book he had written, "Fire in the Belly."

What does it mean to speak with weight? It means not slurring words but pronouncing every syllable. We don't have to necessarily speak slower. Rather, we need to avoid running over words so that the person listening to us doesn't miss them.

Although news commentators speak fast, their words are very clear.

Speaking with weight means knowing how to accentuate a word. Hitting the right syllable at the right moment makes it stand out and stick with us.

Speaking with weight means knowing when to raise and lower volume. When people speak loudly continuously, often their speech sounds strident. If they speak too softly, much of what they say is lost.

However, if within a sentence they hit a word hard and loud and then finish it with a soft whisper, the effect can be very moving.

Words have their greatest impact when they come from a person's heart. As soon as we hear them, we may say to ourselves, "He or she has been there and has personally experienced what they are saying. There is a ring of authenticity!"

As Americans brace themselves for more months of political speeches and decide who they want as their president, they should listen carefully to the words spoken by the candidates.

Are there too many clichés and jingles? Are words garbled, reflecting little thought behind them?

Are audiences being shouted at? Do words ring with a sense of respect and evidence that the speaker is working hard to use the right word to be as clear as possible?

If Father Burghardt were still alive, I think he would finally ask, "Do you sense fire in the belly? Is there heart and soul in what they are saying — do their words ring with an energy that says down deep, I believe?"

Remember, words are who we are!

Editor's note: There was no weekly general audience April 2; in its place, the pope presided over a memorial Mass for Pope John Paul II, who died three years ago on that day. See story, page 6.

Am I excommunicated for having an abortion at age 16?

Q. Last Sunday at Mass, Father spoke about God's all-forgiving love. When I was 16 years old, I discovered I was pregnant. I was frightened and had no one to turn to.

My family was Catholic but rarely went to Mass and was all messed up. Our parents fought a lot, and when my older sister went through a bitter divorce my mother went off the deep end and tried to kill herself. I was the one who found her. I had never discussed abortion with anyone, but my boyfriend and I felt we had no choice. I had no idea I was taking a life.

I'm married now to this same boyfriend. We have two beautiful children, both baptized, and we go to Mass faithfully. Even if there is no hope for my forgiveness I'm writing this hoping some parents will speak more frankly to their children, and maybe someone in my shoes will be glad I'm asking this question.

Can I ever be fully accepted back into the church again? Am I excommunicated? I've been through hell the past several years. I'm afraid to go to the priest in our parish, and my family knows nothing about all this.

With all the publicity today, young women would probably weigh their options more heavily. If I knew then what I know now, I would never have done it.

I hope parents, no matter how depressed they may be, will watch for stress in their children. Their problems can be bigger than you think. (Indiana)

A. In the name of all the people who may read this, I thank you for what must have been a painful letter to write. I think it will be helpful for lots of people, even for those whose spiritual fears and concerns may not be exactly the same as yours.

Your deep regret and sorrow, and your sincere love for yourself and God and other people, shine through in your letter. So be calm and peaceful about it.

The way for you is simple. The first requirement for forgiveness anytime is that we accept responsibility for the wrong we have done, and desire forgiveness. Apparently you have passed this point long ago.

You should receive the sacrament of reconciliation, if not with your priest then with another. There are several in your area. After that, return to holy Communion and continue your Catholic life as faithfully as you are now, and grow in it.

Question Corner

FATHER JAMES DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

In this process it's not necessary to attempt to dissect the past. In fact, when we sin seriously, it is generally impossible to unravel all the good, bad and doubtful motives that influenced us.

It is usually not even healthy to try to do so after the fact. God does not expect or want this.

Finally, for a variety of reasons, you are not and have not been excommunicated. To mention only one major reason, the possible excommunication for acquiring an abortion is one of what are called automatic ("latae sententiae") excommunications.

No automatic excommunication applies to anyone who was under age 17 when the offense was committed. Therefore, it does not apply to you. (For those interested, see Canons 97 and 1323.1.)

FAITHFULLY DEDICATED

Bishop Frank J. Dewane of Venice, Fla., makes the sign of the cross with sacred chrism on the interior wall of the Ave Maria Oratory during the dedication ceremony of the new building in the town of Ave Maria, Fla., March 31. The church sits in the center of the Catholic university community conceived by Tom Monaghan, Domino's Pizza founder and chairman of the Ave Maria Foundation.

Bishop dedicates Ave Maria Oratory, focal point of new university

NAPLES, Fla. (CNS) — The towering, $24 million Ave Maria Oratory that is the focal point of Ave Maria University and the town being built around it was dedicated March 31 as a quasi-parish to provide pastoral care for students, faculty, staff and residents.

Bishop Frank J. Dewane of Venice was main celebrant for a Mass and dedication of the 1,100-seat landmark church building that's 104 feet tall and topped with a 10-foot Celtic cross.

Ave Maria is one of the first Catholic universities to open in the United States in 40 years. Multimillionaire Tom Monaghan, who founded the Domino's Pizza chain, announced plans in 2002 for Ave Maria University and a town of the same name on 5,000 acres east of Naples, about 30 miles from the Gulf Coast.

He's now university chancellor.

According to its Web site: "Ave Maria is known for faithfulness to the magisterium of the Catholic Church, a caring faculty and staff, and a unique educational philosophy that strives to develop the whole person."

Classes began on the permanent campus this past fall, and construction of the Ave Maria Oratory was completed early this year.

The town's planned 11,000 homes and commercial development are expected to be built over the next decade or more.

"As the faithful of this new quasi-parish, the students, faculty and residents of the town will have a place of worship, not only to participate in the holy Eucharist, but to receive all other sacraments and enrich their spiritual life, including the moral values of faith and devotions," Bishop Dewane wrote in a statement announcing the dedication.

Father Robert Tatman, a priest of the Venice Diocese, has been named administrator of the church.

Canon law indicates "a quasi-parish is a definite community of the Christian faithful in a particular church, entrusted to a priest as its proper pastor but not yet erected as a parish because of particular circumstances."

Conscience questions remain after Catholic pharmacist loses appeal

MADISON, Wis. (CNS) — Although a Wisconsin judge upheld the official reprimand of a Catholic pharmacist who refused to dispense a contraceptive drug to a college student or transfer the prescription to another pharmacy, debate on the issue of conscience rights was continuing in the state.

In a March 24 decision, 3rd District Court Judge Michael Hoover rejected pharmacist Neil Noesen's appeal of sanctions imposed on him by the Wisconsin Pharmacy Examining Board in 2005.

However, an official of the Wisconsin Catholic Conference said the judge nevertheless acknowledged that conscience rights under the state constitution are even broader than those granted by the U.S. Constitution.

Kim Wadas, the Catholic conference's associate director for education and health care, said Hoover's affirmation of conscience rights was a step in the right direction.

"We were excited to see some of that language, which continued to recognize that pharmacists have a right of conscience," Wadas said. "This is something we advocate for on behalf of health professionals, especially Catholic health professionals."

The Noesen case dates to 2002, when he refused to dispense FE 1/20, a hormonal contraceptive, to Amanda Phiede, who was a student at the University of Wisconsin in Stout.

Hoover's ruling upheld the state pharmacy board's reprimand and limited Noesen's pharmacy license so that he would be required to notify a potential employer of his inability to distribute certain drugs and detail in writing how he would ensure the patient's access to those drugs.

Noesen's lawyer said he would appeal the decision to the Wisconsin Supreme Court.

FROM THE VATICAN

Grandparents are precious resource for families, pope says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Grandparents are a precious resource for families, the church and society, Pope Benedict XVI said.

"So-called new models of the family and rampant relativism" have weakened the core values of traditional families, and such societal ills need an urgent response, the pope said.

In order to overcome the crises and threats today's families are facing, people could start by turning to "the presence and witness of their grandparents" whose visions and values have more solid foundations, he said.

The pope made his comments April 5 during an audience with participants in the plenary assembly of the Pontifical Council for the Family. The April 3-5 meeting discussed "Grandparents: Their Testimony and Presence in the Family."

The pope said current economic and social conditions have relegated the elderly to the sidelines, when in the past grandparents played a more important role in the life and growth of the family, including sharing their memories and wisdom with others.

But today, many elderly find themselves left in a sort of "parking lot," he said, while others may feel they are too much of a burden for their families and so choose to live alone or in a nursing home.

People must band together to prevent the alienation of the elderly and to help them be more integrated in society and the family, he said, because if people really do believe grandparents are a precious resource then more must be done to better show their worth.

The pope asked that "grandparents continue to be witnesses of unity (and) values based on loyalty to a single love that generates faith and the joy of life."

Grandparents should never be excluded from families as they represent "a treasure that we cannot snatch from the newer generations," he added.

Pope says he wants to bring message of hope to U.S., U.N.

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — In a videotaped message, Pope Benedict XVI said he wants to bring a message of Christian hope to all Americans and to the United Nations when he visits in Washington and New York April 15-20.

"I shall come to the United States as pope for the first time to proclaim this great truth: Jesus Christ is hope for men and women of every language, race, culture and social condition," the pope said.

He said he intends to reach out spiritually to U.S. Catholics and show fraternity and friendship to other Christians, to followers of other religions and to all people of good will.

The text of the papal message, released April 8, was designed to set the thematic stage for the pope's April 15-20 visit to Washington and New York.

Rather than focus on specific events, the pope spoke about the theme of his visit, "Christ Our Hope." Those three words express the church's belief that Christ is the face of God in human history and gives fullness to people's lives, he said.

"I know how deeply rooted this Gospel message is in your country. I am coming to share it with you, in a series of celebrations and gatherings," he said.

He thanked people for their prayers for the success of his visit, saying that "prayer is the most important element of all." Without intimate union with the Lord, he said, human endeavors would mean very little.

The pope said his message of Christian hope had particular relevance to the United Nations, at a time when the world needs hope more than ever before — hope for peace, justice and freedom.

But he said this hope can never be fulfilled without obedience to the law of God, which Christ expressed in the commandment to love one another.

The pope said that although his itinerary will take him only to two cities, his visit aims to reach out to everyone, especially those in need.

Father Ray Wadas poses with a life-size cutout image of Pope Benedict XVI outside the gift shop at the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington April 6. The pastor of Our Lady of Sorrows Church in Takoma Park, Md., said he wanted to have his photo taken with the cutout because it was "as close as I'm going to get" to the pope.

Speakers at memorial Mass recall Buckley's deep faith, lasting impact

NEW YORK (CNS) — Mourners remembered William F. Buckley Jr. at an April 4 memorial Mass as a man of deep faith and unfailing confidence in the Catholic Church who brought people to believe in God and inspired vocations to the priesthood.

"His tongue was the pen of a ready writer" and his "words were strong enough to help crack the walls of an evil empire," according to Father George W. Rutler, celebrant at the memorial Mass at St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York.

"His categories were not right and left but right and wrong," Father Rutler said. "What graces he had to change a century came by his belief in Christ, who has changed all centuries."

Buckley, the erudite spokesman for the conservative political movement in the United States, died in Stamford, Conn., Feb. 27 at 82. He was the founder of the National Review magazine, hosted the weekly "Firing Line" television program for 33 years and wrote more than 50 books.

Catechists explore sacraments, prayer at workshop

Father," said Father John Denny, pastor of St. Margaret of Scotland Church in Maggie Valley, during his presentation on sacraments.

Human beings communicate through signs, symbols, and rituals. Sacraments are "efficacious symbols"; that is, they bring about the desired effect. A stop sign communicates — it tells you to stop — but it isn't efficacious: it can't reach out and stop you.

According to the catechism, sacraments "are efficacious because in them Christ himself is at work; it is he who baptizes, he who acts in his sacraments in order to communicate the grace that each sacrament signifies."

"Sacramental life is a constant invitation from God to live in relationship with him," Father Denny said.

In "Response to the Call According to States of Life," Father Matthew Kauth, pastor of St. Francis of Assisi Church in Franklin, also spoke of the invitation to be in relationship with Christ.

In Matthew 4:18-22, Jesus, walking by the Sea of Galilee, calls his first disciples, who immediately follow him.

"Jesus doesn't command; he invites," Father Kauth said.

That invitation, he said, "captures [the disciples] immediately. Their lives are going to change radically. Following Christ, you have to move. It's not stagnant."

Like Jesus' first disciples, Father Kauth said, we are moving.

"You're on a pilgrimage — that image has a lot of merit," Father Kauth said. "You are climbing up or you are sliding down. You cannot absorb the spiritual life by osmosis, and you cannot get home [to heaven] by standing still."

"You're going to be asked by Christ to give yourself away," Father Kauth said. "God promises little when he calls, but then requires more and more. You settle down to the real work of giving yourself and in that you are sanctified."

Living the Lord's Prayer

In his presentation on the Lord's Prayer, Jim Greer, pastoral associate at St. Joan of Arc Church in Candler, talked about giving oneself away, or losing oneself, and in that giving or losing we find resurrection as new persons.

"We've all experienced having things wrenched away from us," Greer said. When Jesus gave his life away at age 33, he said, it was "in a very degrading and humiliating way."

Giving his life on Good Friday led to Jesus' resurrection on Easter Sunday. It's the same for us, Greer said. We've all lost something or someone important to us, but, "We've all experienced resurrection," he said.

People spoke of their own resurrection moments, which led to intimacy with God: caring for an ill husband, loss of a friend or relative, returning to the practice of the Catholic faith, being with both parents as they died.

Exchanging blessings are Victor Lopez (left), a parishioner at St. Francis of Assisi Church in Franklin, and Eduardo Bernal, Smoky Mountain Vicariate Hispanic ministry coordinator, during a workshop at St. Mary, Mother of God Church in Sylva April 5.

"We are the Lord's Prayer," he said. "It's not 'pray this way,' it's 'be this way.'"

To pray the Our Father more intimately, Greer asked all present to close their eyes. After he said each word, they repeated that word softly and appreciated it before the next word was said.

For catechists wanting presentations in Spanish, Jesuit Father Bill Ameche offered "The Call to be a Catechist" in the morning and "Skills and Theory" in the afternoon.

Father Ameche helps with Hispanic ministry in the Asheville Vicariate and in other vicariates as needed.

For all present, "what I gave them was a different way of looking at catechesis," Father Ameche said later. "Many times, catechesis in the United States is a class, and then you graduate."

He favors catechesis through ongoing, lived experience, such as seeing God's love in the ordinary experiences of everyday life, in the things we take for granted.

In helping people experience the gift of faith, we can be impediments or helpers. An important part of catechesis involves helping people see God's gifts and God's love.

"God shows love for us through his gifts to us," Father Ameche said. "When we experience those gifts, we know that God has given us love."

The person experiences God's love through experiencing others' love for him or her.

During his 30 years of working in Mexico, Father Ameche said, "The best catechist I ever worked with when I lived in Chihuahua couldn't read or write. She had very deep faith, she was very loving, and the children knew that."

She combined her love with asking those who could read to share their book knowledge.

Father Ameche said "a good catechist has an open heart."

"What can we do with our gifts?" he asked. "We can accept God's invitation."

Scribe gives pope volume of illustrated Bible

The pope said,
"This is a work for eternity."

— Donald Jackson, master calligrapher

be bound into seven volumes that measure two feet tall and, when open, three feet wide. Five of those volumes are now complete.

U.S. Cardinal Theodore McCarrick, retired archbishop of Washington and president of the U.S.-based Papal Foundation, called the project "one of those special moments in the life of biblical art."

He was part of a delegation that met with Pope Benedict XVI April 4 to present him with a high-quality, rare reproduction of the first volume of The Saint John's Bible.

The pope, a great lover of books and sacred Scripture, was awed — his eyes glistening "with great joy" as he said, "This is a great work of art," the cardinal said at a press conference soon after.

Jackson said the pope told him, "This is a work for eternity," to which the artist said he replied, "It certainly feels like it sometimes."

Writing from the heart

At the press conference, Jackson asked the question most people might pose: "Why do it? I mean it's a crazy idea to turn the clock back 500 years" in this day and age of computers and laser-jet printers.

But he said the tools of the old medieval scribes "enable you to write the words of God from the heart."

And by creating such a hefty, richly illustrated book whose pages look and even feel special, the reader is being told to "slow down, set this volume down carefully" and meditate over each and every word; it is not something to flip through casually, Jackson said.

In fact, one of the aims of this project, commissioned in 1998 by the Benedictine monks of St. John's Abbey and University in Collegeville, Minn., is to glorify the word of God.

Jackson said modern technology has "solved the problem of dissemination. Every hotel room has a choice of one, if not two, Bibles in the nightstand."

But often mass-produced Bibles are printed with small, cramped type on cheap "onion-skin" thin paper and put what should be thought-provoking passages of God's word "in a straitjacket," he said.

The Bible needs to also reach out to the human senses, not just the intellect, he said.

The Saint John's Bible, with its large pages and creatively arranged text, "invites one to linger over phrases, words and even letters" and "presents the word of God as something special," said one of the project's many press releases.

Even the artwork, which ranges from Byzantine icons to modern styles and botanically correct renderings of insects and plants, is meant to invite the reader toward greater reflection.

Jackson said he and his scribes have had "to let go of modern conceptions of perfection" and of creating a flawlessly copied text. They cannot, after all, hit the delete button or use correction fluid to cover up mistakes.

Small errors can be scraped away with a sharp knife-edge, he said, but a more common "occupational hazard" of accidentally omitting a line is not so simply corrected.

But with the help of their artists they have been able to turn "what was a disaster into something charming," Jackson said.

For example, an artist has drawn a small bird grasping a rope that holds a banner upon which is written the missing verse. The bird is pointing its beak to where the line should go while appearing to be hoisting the forgotten line back where it belongs.

A chubby bumblebee does the same thing in another volume, only she is using a pulley system copied from one of Leonardo da Vinci's sketchbooks.

Rediscovering the importance

full-size, fine art reproductions have been produced for special benefactors. The pope's rare copy was a gift from St. John's University and Abbey purchased on behalf of a trustee from the U.S.-based Papal Foundation.

The gift and its publicity come the same year the world Synod of Bishops is gathering at the Vatican this fall to discuss the importance of sacred Scripture.

Synod leaders have said they hope the meeting can address what is seen as a lack of appreciation and understanding of the Bible among Catholics.

Pope Benedict has said the Bible "requires special veneration and obedience" by all Christians, and he said he hoped the synod process would help Catholics "rediscover the importance of the Word of God in the life of every Christian."

The Saint John's Bible uses the New Revised Standard Version and, when completed in 2009, will include volumes that include Gospels and Acts, Psalms, Pentateuch, Historical Books, Prophets, Wisdom Literature, and Letters and Revelation.

The finished original manuscript crafted by Jackson and his team will reside at a special museum on the St. John's University campus.

It is not the first time Jackson brought a piece of his "Sistine Chapel" to the Vatican; he also gave Pope John Paul II a limited-edition prototype of the Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles at the Vatican in 2004.

While unique, these papal copies of The Saint John's Bible are not the only rare specimens of sacred Scripture to grace the Vatican's bookshelves.

The Vatican Library has a fourth-century Codex B manuscript — a complete text of the Bible in Greek — as well as two copies of the Gutenberg Bible.

This Bible was one of the first books printed by the movable type process invented by Johann Gutenberg in 1455, and only about 60 copies remain.

Pope: Take Gospel to those who've divorced, had abortions

Knights co-sponsor international conference on 'destructive forces'

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Pope Benedict XVI said the church must bring the "Gospel of mercy" to those involved in abortion and divorce, showing sensitivity to the inner burdens they bear.

He made the remarks April 5 in a meeting with participants of an international conference on the aftermath of abortion and divorce.

The Rome conference, themed "Oil on the Wounds: A Response to the Aftermath of Divorce and Abortion," was sponsored by the Knights of Columbus and the John Paul II Institute for Studies on Marriage and the Family.

"As an organization organized to protect families, we think it is absolutely necessary for society to take note of the effects of divorce and abortion, two things that do the most damage to the integrity of families in our society," said Supreme Knight Carl Anderson, who moderated the opening session of the conference.

"It is our hope that this conference will spur a greater ministry within the Catholic Church to these children whose stable family structure has been shattered, and to these parents, who grieve the abortion of their unborn child — often in isolation and silence," he said.

Speakers came from eight countries, including several from Italy and the United States.

"Pope John Paul II and Pope Benedict XVI have often spoken of the importance of the family as the cornerstone of society, and both divorce and abortion strike at the heart of that cornerstone," said Msgr. Livio Melina, president of the Pontifical John Paul II Institute for Studies on Marriage and Family headquartered at the Vatican.

"We are here to discuss how the church can help heal the wounds left by these two destructive forces," he said.

During the conference, Pope Benedict said both abortion and divorce had created much suffering in modern society, particularly among innocent victims, leaving wounds that affect people's lives permanently.

He said abortion in particular produces "devastating consequences" for the woman involved, for the family and for society, helping promote a materialistic mentality that shows contempt for life.

"How much selfish complicity often lies at the root of the painful decision that so many women have had to make alone and whose unhealed wound they carry in their souls," he said.

To women who have had an abortion, the pope urged them not to be overwhelmed by discouragement and hopelessness and to open themselves to repentance.

The pope said the church's ethical teachings about abortion and divorce are well known. Although they are of a different nature, both acts are considered grave offenses to human dignity and an offense to God, he said.

In addition, he said, both abortion and divorce create innocent victims: "the child recently conceived and still unborn and the children affected by the breakup of family ties."

He said one of the church's pastoral priorities should be to help children of divorced parents, as much as is possible, to maintain ties with both parents and to be aware of their family origins.

At the same time, the pope said, the church recognizes that such decisions are often made in dramatic and difficult circumstances and that they also bring suffering to those who commit them.

"Following the example of the divine teacher, the church always takes an interest in the concrete person," he said.

Many of the men and women involved in abortion and divorce are troubled by guilt and "are looking for peace and the possibility of recovery," and the church must approach them with love and sensitivity, he said.

"Yes, the Gospel of love and life is also always the Gospel of mercy, offered to the real and sinful people that we are, to raise them from any failing and repair any wound," he said.

The pope quoted Pope John Paul II to emphasize that by showing mercy, the church demonstrates its faith in the human being and in human freedom.

Although public opinion is often focused on the church's "no's" in matters of morality, its teachings are really "a great 'yes' to the human person, to his life and his capacity to love," he said.

The pope said the public debate over issues like abortion and divorce is often purely ideological, neglecting the real needs of those directly involved. This is where the church is called upon to offer an attitude of merciful love, he said.

KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS

New Knights in Charlotte

Council conducts new member ceremony in honor of pope's upcoming visit

CHARLOTTE — Knights of Columbus Council 10852 at St. Matthew Church in Charlotte conducted a first degree ceremony for five new members at the South Charlotte Banquet Center Feb. 16.

In honor of Pope Benedict XVI's first papal visit to the United States in April, Supreme Knight Carl Anderson decreed that all first degree ceremonies conducted through June 30 should be in the pope's honor.

As such, special commemorative certificates were given to the new members to mark the occasion.

"Pope Benedict XVI's first visit to the United States certainly is cause for celebration and the Knights of Columbus, like all Catholics, eagerly anticipate the occasion," said Grand Knight Richard White of council 10852.

"Inducting members into the Knights of Columbus, a fraternal brotherhood dedicated to charitable works, is always momentous and the Feb. 16 ceremony was no exception," he said.

"We are humbled to have the opportunity to honor the pope and the blessing of his upcoming visit through our first degree ceremony," said White.

Knightly donations

WINSTON-SALEM — Four Knights of Columbus councils in Forsyth County hosted a dinner, at which they dispersed donations to county schools and agencies, at St. Leo the Great Church in Winston-Salem March 13.

The councils — 2829, 8509, 9499 and 10504 — raised the funds through their annual Tootsie Roll sales outside area stores as part of their Operation L.A.M.B. (Least Among My Brethren) campaign.

John Gouldie, Knights state deputy, and Greg Kent, Knights state treasurer, were in attendance at the dinner, as well as a number of Forsyth County schools and agencies that provide services to children with mental disabilities.

A month in Africa

CSS employee gains insight into lives of refugees

BY KATIE MOORE -
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — For Jennifer Girard, a trip to Africa meant a month away from the office, but it didn't mean a vacation from work.

Girard, who works as the English as a second language (ESL) coordinator for Catholic Social Services of the Diocese of Charlotte, spent the month of February in Burundi, a country located in central Africa on the southern border of Rwanda. There she worked as a volunteer with Lutheran World Federation (LWF).

LWF is a nongovernmental, faith-based organization whose mission is to "uphold the rights of the poor and oppressed," according to its Web site.

Over the past 15 years, conflict in Burundi has resulted in the displacement of more than 100,000 people. A civil war between Hutu and Tutsi factions broke out in 1993 following the assassination of Burundi's first democratically elected president. Although a ceasefire was issued in 2006, conditions in Burundi remain unstable.

Girard spent her time working at the LWF office in Burundi, traveling to several project intervention sites in rural Burundi and visiting a refugee camp in neighboring Tanzania.

The trip to Africa gave her a better understanding of the interconnected nature of the world.

"How we choose to live affects other people on the other side of the world," said Girard, who works in Catholic Social Services' Refugee Resettlement Office in Charlotte.

"You don't realize what you take for granted until you don't have ready access to it," she said as she recalled having limited access to power, water and food in Burundi.

"There was one place that only had electricity for certain hours of the day," she said.

"I have met several Burundian Hutu families who came to Charlotte as refugees in July 2007," she said. "They were part of the small group in Tanzanian refugee camps allowed to come to the U.S."

As the ESL coordinator, it is her job to help refugees learn English and adjust to life in the United States.

Girard said one reason for wanting to go to Africa was "to gain a better understanding into the lives of refugees overseas." She said she hoped the experience would allow her to provide "a greater foundation from which to serve them here."

CSS employee Jennifer Girard gets a lesson in basket weaving in Cendajuru, Africa, a mountain village located near the Tanzanian border. Girard spent the month of February volunteering in Africa with Lutheran World Federation.

"When I went over there, I had all these questions that I thought I would ask the people," she said. "What are your hopes for the future? What are your dreams? But then I realized it's all about survival. Everyone is living on the edge of life and death."

One of the most visible signs of hope she witnessed was the overwhelming turnout at a 7 a.m. Mass one Sunday. More than 1,000 people packed the pews of the community church.

"We had to get there early because it was standing room only," said Girard who recalled the streams of people coming from all directions by foot.

There is a strong sense of faith among the refugees.

"Their hope is in God. They sense that very keenly and it's very real to them," said Girard.

Resettling Refugees

How do you teach a refugee to speak English and adapt to life in the United States?

- Refugees undergo individual interviews and assessments to determine their English speaking ability and educational background.
- Refugees are enrolled in English classes sponsored by CSS. Classes are offered at various times and locations for the refugees' convenience.
- Classes cover survival skills and basic topics such as housing, community locations, driving, money and food.
- Teachers use visuals — pictures, videos and skits — to portray different scenarios.
- Refugees typically attend classes for a minimum of six months, but some continue taking classes for years.
- Once they get past the basic level, refugees can take classes on specialized topics such as math or vocational training.
- CSS also offers citizenship classes for those wishing to acquire U.S. citizenship.

MISSION WORK

Charlotte Catholic High School students install insulation during a spring break mission trip to Braithwaite, La., March 24-29.

Youths build homes for Hurricane Katrina victims in Louisiana

was arranged by Global Outreach, an international mission sending agency.

Braithwaite, located about 20 minutes from New Orleans on the southeastern side of the Mississippi River, was one of the locations hit hardest by Hurricane Katrina back in 2005. Most of the homes in the area were totally destroyed.

"It was a great opportunity to educate our students on the devastation that continues to exist in the area and how they can make a difference even if it is just one week — one house at a time," said Mary Jane Dawson, campus minister at Charlotte Catholic High School.

The students, who were accompanied by five teachers and one parent, stayed at the Living Cornerstone Church and Retreat Center.

During the days they sorted through food at a warehouse, installed insulation in two houses, put up drywall in other houses and completed demolition on a historic home. In the evenings, they gathered for prayer and group reflection.

"Leaving Braithwaite, I took away values and memories that I could have never attained by lying on a beach over spring break," said junior Anna Berger.

"Through helping others, I helped myself realize the true meaning of being a Christian, something we all speak of but seldom act upon," she said.

In preparation for the trip, the students raised $2,000 to pay for supplies. Rev. Rustin Treadaway, pastor of Living Cornerstone Church in Braithwaite, was so impressed with the students' work that he asked them to come back and build a youth center for the community.

"It was incredible to be a part of the energy, spirit and faith that were shared by our youths and adults," said Dawson. "They were the hands and feet of Christ that week. It was very inspiring."

The students hope to return to Braithwaite sometime in the fall to work on the youth center. In the meantime, they are working on raising funds for the project.

"Seeing a person with tears of gratitude was worth the whole trip," said Nichols. "This experience was life-changing in the fullest sense of the word."

'A General's Spiritual Journey'

Book is glimpse into faith of retired Army officer known for heroism

BY LARRY WAHL
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

MOBILE, Ala. — "A General's Spiritual Journey" gives a rare glimpse into the mind, heart and soul of a battlefield warrior and faith-filled American hero, retired Lt. Gen. Hal Moore.

It's a story of the courage, compassion, faith and servant leadership of a man whose heroism goes beyond the battlefield and points to the ultimate goal — eternal life — or, as Moore puts it, "the final cut."

"My principal hope is that a reader of this small booklet will derive some comfort as well as an urge and desire to become closer to God, whatever his or her religion," Moore, who is now 86, said.

A longtime resident of Auburn and a daily communicant at St. Michael Church, Moore is well known for his heroic actions in the battle of Ia Drang, the first major U.S. military confrontation in the Vietnam War.

The battle was Nov. 14-16, 1965, and was led by then-Lt. Col. Moore, of the 1st Battalion, 7th Cavalry.

He and Joe Galloway, the only journalist on the ground during the battle, co-wrote the 1992 New York Times' best-selling autobiographical recollection, "We Were Soldiers Once ... and Young," which detailed the battle through interviews of those who fought there.

The best-seller later became an award-winning movie directed by Randall Wallace and starring Mel Gibson.

For his actions at Ia Drang, Moore was awarded the Distinguished Service Cross, the Army's second highest military decoration after the Medal of Honor.

He and his 450 men were dropped by helicopter in a clearing in the Ia Drang Valley and were immediately surrounded by 2,000 enemy soldiers.

The casualties were many, but under his command, his men's defense of their position resulted in a 4-to-1 ratio of North Vietnamese casualties to U.S. casualties.

"A General's Spiritual Journey" is finding its way into the hands of U.S. troops currently serving in battle in hostile regions or deployed overseas for other duty.

Written by his personal driver, the book is a collection of Moore's memories and reflections on the most pivotal moments of his life, covering his childhood, his foundational religious experiences, his early years at the U.S. Military Academy at West Point, N.Y., his battlefield experiences and his devotion to his wife, Julie, now deceased.

It has a message for anyone who has struggled with loss, conflict, guilt, forgiveness and life's ultimate questions.

Copies of the 60-page book have been sent to the troops through an effort called Operation Gratitude. The California-based, nonprofit, all-volunteer organization sends care packages to American troops.

Its founder, Carolyn Blashek, recently requested 70,000 copies of "A General's Spiritual Journey," which were donated by the publisher, Wild Goose Ministries of Vail, Colo.

"This book is less about my life than the different spiritual journeys each of us will travel — and the people we can learn from along the way," Moore said in a press release about the book.

"If just one soul is influenced through the reading of it, then it will have accomplished its deepest purpose," he said.

Still going strong, Moore travels frequently to honor a long list of engagements, his devotion to duty and personal convictions driving him to still find ways to serve his country.

He is the founder of the National Endowment for the Public Trust, dedicated to preserving and promoting core American and religious values such as servant leadership and selfless character development.

He was asked what he sees as the United States' greatest threats, challenges and hopes.

"The greatest threat I see is the growth of bad example, the growth of negative messages and influence being imparted to America's youth and to the world through the entertainment industry," he said.

"The greatest challenge is to reverse that trend and the best thing we can do is to deploy parental guidance and set the example," he said.

"(We should) ask ourselves two important questions: What are we doing that we shouldn't be doing? And what are we not doing that we should be doing?" he said.

Jesus reveals himself in many ways, if we're willing to see him

BY JEFF HEDGLEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

I was 19 when my cousin came to live with my family. He was just out of the Marines. He was not doing very well and was lost in many ways.

When we were children we had been close, but it had been a few years since we had seen each other, and trying to re-establish our friendship was hard. To complicate things, my faith was becoming very important to me, and he rarely darkened the door of a church.

I took this in stride though. We had many conversations about the meaning of life, God, and faith in general.

He had a lot of opinions, but he was not ready to believe that God existed, much less believe that God loved him and wanted a relationship with him.

Try as I might, I could not get him to budge.

One night while we were lying in our bunk beds talking about life and faith, almost arguing, he finally said in an exasperated tone, "I'm not going to believe in God unless he comes down here and shakes my hand."

I had no idea what to say to that. I simply stared at the bottom of the top mattress with my mouth open and my mind empty.

I realize now that my cousin was no different from the first disciples. They had been with Jesus for three years and still did not completely understand who he was.

At the Last Supper Philip said to Jesus: "Master, show us the Father, and that will be enough for us." Jesus responds rather incredulously, "Have I been with you for so long a time and you still do not know me? Whoever has seen me has seen the Father."

Twenty-five years ago, lying in that bunk bed, I felt the same way. Didn't my cousin know Jesus had already come and revealed himself?

He grew up Catholic and had heard all the same readings I had heard. What was I to say to this lack of belief?

No words came, so I did the only thing I could think of; I silently asked God to come down and shake his hand.

I wish I could say that the next day he experienced a divine handshake, but though the hand of God was continually offered to him, it would be many years before he grabbed hold.

Questions:

How would you have responded to the challenge, "I'm not going to believe in God unless he comes down here and shakes my hand"?

How does Jesus reveal the Father to us?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"Master, show us the Father, and that will be enough for us" (John 14:8).

Singers who will perform for pope consider it a singular experience

BY BETH GRIFFIN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK — Performing for a papal event is not just another gig, even for those whose names are usually rendered in boldface type.

Headline entertainers who will sing for the crowds assembled to greet the pope at St. Joseph's Seminary in Yonkers and at Yankee Stadium in the Bronx spoke of the opportunity as a singular experience and one they are eagerly anticipating.

Kelly Clarkson, 25, a pop singer who gained national attention by winning the inaugural "American Idol" competition in 2002, will sing several of her standards for the youths awaiting the pope in Yonkers April 19. When the pope arrives, she will sing "Ave Maria" by Franz Schubert.

Through her publicist, she said, "I was so excited to be asked to sing for the pope! I grew up singing church music, and it's always been a dream of mine to perform 'Ave Maria.' To have that dream come true on such a special occasion is truly a blessing."

Clarkson, who was raised Baptist, will return from a European performance tour as the pope arrives in the United States.

At Yankee Stadium April 20, guitar virtuoso Jose Feliciano will sing "Lean on Me," "Que Sera, Sera" and "God Bless the USA."

In an interview with Catholic News Service, Feliciano's wife, Susan Feliciano, said: "This is a great gift, the opportunity of a lifetime, to be able to participate in something so special."

She said the family attends the Church of the Assumption in Westport.

Metropolitan Opera tenor Marcello Giordani will sing before and during the Mass at Yankee Stadium.

In the early afternoon, he will perform the Giacomo Puccini aria "Nessun Dorma" from the opera "Turandot." At Mass, he will sing "Panis Angelicus."

Giordani, who has sung at St. Patrick's Cathedral, was invited to sing by New York Cardinal Edward M. Egan. Giordani told CNS that he, his wife and their two children attend St. Patrick's during the months they live in New York.

"It's a great honor for me to sing for the pope. It's my first experience and I'm real excited," he said.

Asked if he might be nervous performing for Pope Benedict and 55,000 Massgoers, the tenor said, "I will close my eyes and sing."

The Irish singer Dana will also perform at the stadium. She has sung at papal events in the past, including World Youth Day in 1993, 1997 and 2002.

She also sang at the Superdome in New Orleans when Pope John Paul II visited there in 1987.

Jazz singer Harry Connick Jr. will perform two pieces he is composing for the event. Connick attended Jesuit High School in New Orleans.

Salvatore Licitra, a tenor with the Metropolitan Opera, will sing at the pope's Mass at St. Patrick's Cathedral April 19. He will perform "Domine Deus," from "Messe Petit Solennelle" by Gioachino Rossini.

Members of the Cathedral of St. Patrick Young Singers rehearse at St. Malachy's Church in New York April 1. The 17-voice choir will sing for Pope Benedict XVI when he meets with children with disabilities at St. Joseph's Seminary in Yonkers, N.Y., April 19 during his visit to the United States.

In Washington, tenor Placido Domingo and mezzo-soprano Denyce Graves will sing at the Mass at Nationals Park April 17.

Domingo, general director of the Washington National Opera, will sing "Panis Angelicus" at Communion, and Graves will sing "We Are One in the Spirit" just before the processional.

Stig Edgren is the producer for the entertainment portions of the New York events. He performed a similar role for Pope John Paul's visits to Dodger Stadium and the Los Angeles Coliseum in 1987 and Central Park in New York in 1995.

Edgren told CNS that each of the New York events will have its own flow. He said that the two-hour Yankee Stadium program will be marked by "pageantry and an orchestral, classical feel."

He said that Benoit Jutras, principal composer for Cirque Du Soleil has written a piece for the processional of the standard-bearers for Mass.

"I gave a list to Cardinal Egan and I asked Harry Connick Jr. to write opening and closing pieces" for the pre-Mass program, he said.

The musical program includes well-known entertainers in addition to choirs and orchestras assembled from throughout the Archdiocese of New York. The choirs include the Harlem Gospel Choir and the West Point Cadet Choir, from the U.S. Military Academy.

Edgren said, "I wanted to stick with the orchestral feel and not make this a parade of stars." The four-hour program in Yonkers, he said, "will have more of a festive atmosphere" than Yankee Stadium.

He said he wanted to "keep it young" and is using alternative rock, Christian rock bands and closing the show with Clarkson. He booked Clarkson as soon as he took the assignment.

"I was looking for an artist who was a good role model, a success, with no scandals," he said.

The program will showcase more than two dozen entertainers, many of whom are drawn from the schools and parishes of the Archdiocese of New York.

Comparing the papal entertainment programs with ones he has previously produced, Edgren said, "There's a different setting, a different pope ... but it all works. I base my part of the program — the pre-Mass events — on the venue."

He added that the Mass is not his area of responsibility — and deals with an even higher authority.

Staffers at Catholic Channel say they're excited to cover pope

NEW YORK (CNS) — The Catholic Channel of Sirius Satellite Radio may be a new kid on the block in the world of Catholic media, but it is taking a grown-up approach to covering Pope Benedict XVI's April 15-20 visit to the United States.

The channel, a joint effort of Sirius and the Archdiocese of New York, plans to provide listeners with uninterrupted live coverage of the pope's appearances at liturgies and other major events in Washington and New York.

Masses at Yankee Stadium in New York and Nationals Stadium in Washington will be broadcast live.

Sirius plans to add two channels for the trip: one that will repeat full coverage of the day's events on a looping schedule, and another that will offer historic speeches and other archival material from previous papal visits to the United States.

"Everyone is having a lot of fun getting ready," said Joe Zwilling, archdiocesan director of communications and general manager of the Catholic Channel. "It's a new approach to covering a pope. We've never had an outlet like this, to enable us to do all these things."

Rob Astorino, station manager and program director, said: "We're well-prepared and excited. We can't wait for the trip to begin."

Astorino noted that each of the station's program hosts would be assigned to one or more of the major papal venues in either Washington or New York. When describing the tone that the Catholic Channel would seek to bring to its coverage of the visit, he used words like comprehensive, respectful and interesting.

"People will get a sense of being at an event even if they are in their car," he said.

A Catholic Channel host, Father Paul Keenan, was in Central Park in October 1995 when Pope John Paul II celebrated Mass for more than 100,000 people. For the visit of Pope Benedict, Father Keenan will be pulling triple duty.

Along with hosting his regular nightly show, "As You Think," April 14-17, the New York archdiocesan priest will anchor the channel's broadcast of the papal Mass from St. Patrick's Cathedral April 19 and share commentator duties at the Mass in Yankee Stadium April 20 with Resurrection Sister Marie Pappas, archdiocesan superintendent of schools and another program host. Father Keenan also be doing voice work for the papal archives channel.

The trick to announcing a Mass on the radio, papal or otherwise, is knowing how to say enough but not too much, he said.

"You want people who are listening to feel that they are there," Father Keenan said. "They want to hear the Mass. You're there to help them to see the things they can't see."

The Catholic Channel, Sirius 159, is a 24-hour, seven-day-a-week operation that began broadcasting in December 2006.

Msgr. William N. Pharr, 1931-2008

Priest remembered for humble, prayerful life of service

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — To many, he was considered an inspiration, a confidant, a man of deep faith and a good friend.

By many, he will be dearly missed.

Msgr. William Neal Pharr, a retired priest of the Diocese of Charlotte, died at Sharon Towers retirement community in Charlotte April 5, 2008. He was 77.

A Mass of Christian burial was celebrated by Bishop Peter J. Jugis at St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte April 10.

Msgr. Pharr was born in Charlotte Feb. 24, 1931, the son of the late William Neal Pharr and Anne McLaughlin Heath Pharr. Born into a Protestant family, Msgr. Pharr first became interested in Catholicism while a student at Belmont Abbey Prep School in the late 1940s.

His interest deepened and he became a Catholic in 1952 while a student at Davidson College. After graduation in 1953, he began studies for the priesthood at Christ the King Seminary in St. Bonaventure, N.Y. Then-Bishop

Msgr. William Neal Pharr

Vincent S. Waters of Raleigh ordained him a priest at Our Lady of the Assumption Church in Charlotte May 26, 1960.

Then-Father Pharr spent his first year as a priest with the Missionary Fathers Apostolate as an assistant at St. John Baptiste de la Salle Church in North Wilkesboro. It was the beginning of a life of humble, priestly service that would affect and inspire countless people at parishes across the Diocese of Raleigh and then, after its establishment in 1972, the Diocese of Charlotte.

"St. Paul said a good man of faith is strong, loving and wise. Bill Pharr was true to that and more," said Father Frank O'Rourke, pastor of St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte. "He's been a wonderful companion to so many throughout our diocese on their journeys in lives of faith. I've always felt privileged to be counted among his close friends."

During his homily April 6, Father O'Rourke recalled his years of friendship with Msgr. Pharr. Like many who knew him, Father O'Rourke said Msgr. Pharr's life wasn't about "fluff."

Msgr. Pharr's lifestyle at Sharon Towers after his retirement in July 2001 reflected his long-standing approach to life and ministry. His apartment was modestly furnished. He happily remarked how he and all his neighbors were on a first-name basis — no titles, no pretenses; all were equals.

"His personal and priestly life was modeled on one of his favorite lines: 'No fluff, just the stuff,'" said Msgr. John McSweeney, pastor of St. Matthew Church in Charlotte and a friend for more than 30 years. "He had a deep sense of spirituality," said Msgr. McSweeney. "I considered him a friend, a spiritual mentor and a true confidant."

Msgr. Pharr once said a priest's relationship with Christ was top priority, and a trust in God was a vital part of priestly ministry. During a 1993 gathering of diocesan priests in Hickory, Msgr. Pharr encouraged his fellow priests to "let God be God" — to let him use them as he wished and not as they desired.

"If we do our best, he will take care of the rest. Our finite minds bow to his infinite wisdom," he said.

"He (Msgr. Pharr) was a great model of a servant who put his gifts generously at the service of all," said Father O'Rourke.

Then-Father Pharr served as an assistant pastor at St. Leo the Great Church in Winston-Salem from June 1961 until July 1962, when he became temporary administrator of St. Charles Church in Ahoskie.

From November 1963 until June 1965, he served as assistant pastor at St. Eugene Church in Asheville. He then became pastor of Our Lady of Lourdes Church in Monroe and Sacred Heart Mission in Wadesboro.

He became pastor of St. Benedict the Moor Church and Our Lady of Fatima Chapel in Winston-Salem in June 1969 and pastor of St. James the Greater Church in Concord in August 1971.

Four days after the Diocese of Charlotte was established in 1972, then-Bishop Michael J. Begley named him pastor of Immaculate Conception Church in Hendersonville, where he was to remain for five years.

During that time, he served also as chaplain and director of Our Lady of the Hills Camp near Hendersonville, vicar for religious of the diocese and director of the diocesan planning council.

The late Pope Paul VI appointed him a Prelate of Honor with the title of monsignor in October 1976.

Msgr. Pharr was appointed pastor of St. Pius X Church in Greensboro in February 1977 and, in July 1979, pastor of Our Lady of Grace Church in Greensboro and vicar forane of the Greensboro Vicariate.

Bishop Begley named him to the diocesan Seminarian Formation Committee in November 1979. Bishop John F. Donoghue, who succeeded Bishop Begley in 1984, reappointed him to the committee in March 1985.

Msgr. Pharr became pastor of Our Lady of Consolation Church in Charlotte in July 1986 and pastor of St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte in July 1991.

After his retirement in 2001, Msgr. Pharr continued to assist in various parishes and ministries in the Diocese of Charlotte. When asked in 2003 what he looked forward to in retirement, he replied: "Traveling, listening, learning and assisting."

And in September 2004, he took on yet a new role — that of model for a poster and brochure promoting the Diocese of Charlotte's annual Priests' Retirement and Benefits Collection.

Despite the summer heat of the outdoor photo shoot, Msgr. Pharr never lost his sense of humor and later mused about his new "modeling career."

In addition to his life of service, Msgr. Pharr wanted to continue giving to the church he loved, as he put it, long after he was "gone."

He designated the Foundation for the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte as a recipient of his assets.

"This is a means of saying thanks to the Lord for his gifts of the Catholic faith and my vocation to the priesthood," said Msgr. Pharr in a 2006 interview with The Catholic News & Herald.

"Through ongoing stewardship, my prayer is that many others will experience these same blessings," he said.

Memorials may be made to the St. Vincent de Paul Church Building Fund, 6828 Old Reid Rd., Charlotte, NC 28210.

No reversal on Vatican II teaching on Jews

"The Holy See wishes to reassure that the new formulation of the prayer, which modifies certain expressions of the 1962 Missal, in no way intends to indicate a change in the Catholic Church's regard for the Jews, which has evolved from the basis of the Second Vatican Council," said an April 4 statement from the Vatican press office.

In early February, the Vatican published Pope Benedict's revision of the Good Friday prayer, which is used only in the liturgy celebrated according to the 1962 Roman Missal, or extraordinary form of the Mass.

The extraordinary form is no longer widely used by Catholics but may be used by some church communities under recently revised norms. The new prayer removed language referring to the "blindness" of the Jews, but it prays that Jews will recognize Jesus, the savior, and that "all Israel may be saved."

The April 4 statement said some members of the Jewish community felt the new prayer was "not in harmony with the official declarations and statements of the Holy See regarding the Jewish people and their faith which have marked the progress of friendly relations between the Jews and the Catholic Church over the last 40 years."

In particular, some Jews, as well as some Catholics, felt the prayer contained an explicit call to attempt to convert Jews to Christianity.

Cardinal Walter Kasper said that on the basis of a long history of compulsory catechesis and forced conversion, "many Jews consider a mission to the Jews as a threat to their existence."

"The Catholic Church has no organized or institutionalized mission to the Jews," said the cardinal, who is president of the Pontifical Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews.

That statement of fact, he said, is backed up with a theological position in the revised 1962 prayer's second line: "Almighty and everlasting God, you who want all men to be saved and to reach the awareness of the truth, graciously grant that, as the full number of the Gentiles comes into your church, all Israel may be saved."

The second line echoes the teaching of St. Paul in his Letter to the Romans that God's promise of salvation to his chosen people has not been revoked and that once all the nations are gathered under Christ, the Jewish people will be saved, Cardinal Kasper said. "So one can say: God will bring about the salvation of Israel in the end, not on the basis of a mission to the Jews, but on the basis of the mission to the Gentiles, when the fullness of the Gentiles has entered" into Christ.

At the same time, Cardinal Kasper said, Christians do believe in the promise of salvation in Jesus Christ and no one should be surprised that Christians pray for the salvation of all people and that "tactfully and respectfully" they give witness to their faith in Jesus.

The Vatican's April 4 statement did not mention missionary activity or attempts to convert Jews.

Rabbi David Rosen, director of interreligious affairs for the American Jewish Committee, told Catholic News Service April 4 that the Vatican statement was "an important clarification."

"I think it contains a very important implicit statement — which I would have been happier to see made explicit — that if one accepts (the Vatican II document) 'Nostra Aetate,' then they must demonstrate esteem for Judaism, which precludes proselytism," he said.

The rabbi said the April 4 statement does not contain all of the elements he had been told in early March would be included in a clarification from Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, Vatican secretary of state.

A Vatican official said that by releasing the statement from the Vatican Secretariat of State it made clear the fact that it reflects the official position of the Vatican and not simply the position of an individual cardinal.

Addition of two U.S. meetings shows pope's concern for Jews

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Pope Benedict XVI's addition of two meetings with Jews in the United States underlined the pope's continuing interest in improving Catholic-Jewish relations.

It's a relationship that is extremely important to the German pope, but which has had its ups and downs since he was elected three years ago.

The pope has pleased many Jewish leaders by emphasizing that Jews have a special place in salvation history.

He has visited a synagogue and the Auschwitz death camp, suspended the sainthood cause of a priest suspected of anti-Semitism and expressed full support for the new relationship with Judaism launched by the Second Vatican Council.

But the comments he made at Auschwitz in 2006 prompted some Jewish representatives to ask why he didn't explore the roots of anti-Semitism and the responsibility of Christians — including those in his native country.

Perhaps the most sensitive issue is the question of conversion, and it has come to the fore in recent weeks.

After the pope relaxed restrictions on the extraordinary form of the Mass in 2007, Jews objected to the restoration of the old Roman Missal's Good Friday prayer for the conversion of Jews, which spoke of the Jews' "blindness."

In February, the pope took the unusual step of personally rewriting the prayer. But although he removed the offensive language, the revised text's reference to the salvation of the Jews left many fearing it called for their conversion.

The prayer, which is only used by a small number of Catholic communities, now begins: "Let us pray for the Jews. May the Lord our God enlighten their hearts so that they may acknowledge Jesus Christ, the savior of all men."

Cardinal Walter Kasper, who coordinates Catholic dialogue with the Jews, emphasized that the prayer is eschatological in nature, referring to the end of time, and is not a call for a missionary effort among the Jews.

But Jewish leaders continued to press for clarification of the new text.

In response, the Vatican published a statement April 4 saying the newly formulated prayer "in no way intends to indicate a change in the Catholic Church's regard for the Jews." The Vatican underlined the bonds of "esteem, dialogue, love, solidarity and collaboration between Catholics and Jews."

The Vatican's explanation, it is hoped, will help ensure the success of the two U.S. meetings, a brief encounter with Jews in Washington and a visit to the Park East Synagogue in New York.

Advancing efforts, dialogue

From the moment of Pope Benedict's election, some wondered how the Jewish community would react to a German pope who had been forced to enroll in the Hitler Youth during the Nazi era.

In fact, many Jewish leaders praised the new pope as a thoughtful dialogue partner and rejected the idea that he was in any way a sympathizer with Nazism.

Rabbi Israel Singer, vice president of the World Jewish Congress, met with Pope Benedict in 2005 and called him "an old friend in new white robes," the man who "gave the theological underpinnings to the gestures of Pope John Paul."

What many Jewish leaders appreciated was the pope's clear teaching that Christianity has a special relationship with Judaism.

As Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, he said several years ago: "It is evident that we come from the roots of Israel and that their Bible is our Bible and that Judaism is not just one of many religions but is the foundation, the root of our faith."

In one of his first acts as pontiff, Pope Benedict sent a message to Rome's chief rabbi expressing his intent to advance dialogue with the Jewish community.

Later in 2005, marking the 40th anniversary of "Nostra Aetate," the Vatican II declaration on relations with non-Christians, the pope cited the shared spiritual roots of Catholics and Jews and called for a common witness on issues of life, human dignity, the family and peace.

The pope showed sensitivity to Jewish concerns the same year when he effectively suspended the beatification cause of Father Leon Dehon, founder of the Sacred Heart of Jesus religious order, and formed a commission of church experts to study the priest's writings for alleged anti-Semitism.

On a sainthood cause with even greater potential impact, Pope Benedict late last year established a commission to study archival material about the papacy of Pope Pius XII and examine how his possible beatification would affect Catholic-Jewish relations.

The move was not an abandonment of the sainthood cause, but it signaled that the pope would be looking very carefully at its wider consequences, including interreligious and diplomatic aspects.

On his very first foreign trip in 2005, Pope Benedict visited a synagogue in Cologne, Germany, that had been destroyed in a 1938 Kristallnacht pogrom and rebuilt after the war. In a moving encounter, he recalled the Nazi persecution of the Jews as "the darkest period of German and European history."

A year later, however, when he visited Auschwitz in Poland, some Jewish leaders criticized the pope for not focusing enough on the Nazis' Jewish victims and for not explicitly condemning anti-Semitism.

The pope responded a few days later, telling a general audience in Rome that humanity must not give in to "the temptation of racial hatred, which is the origin of the worst forms of anti-Semitism."

One of the pope's most intriguing "encounters" with Judaism came in his 2007 book, "Jesus of Nazareth." The most quoted author in the pope's book was Rabbi Jacob Neusner, a U.S. professor of religion and theology.

Responding to Rabbi Neusner's own book, "A Rabbi Talks With Jesus," the pope praised him for taking the Gospel of Jesus seriously and for correctly grasping Jesus' own understanding of his mission as the Son of God — even though, in the end, the rabbi could not accept Christ as savior.

A collection of columns, editorials and viewpoints

Today's sins may look different

Christians must be formed to counter society that ignores God

I have to admit that, like most young adult Catholics I know, it has been some time since I pulled out my copy of the Catechism of the Catholic Church and reviewed what exactly is a mortal sin.

So while most media outlets have mocked the Vatican's statement on new social sins — such as polluting the environment, drug trafficking, and genetic manipulation and other experiments conducted within the “greatest danger zone” of bioethics — I actually appreciated the reminder of what sin looks like today because not every young adult can make the cognitive jump between yesterday's sins and modern immorality.

For example, not until I read an incisive article by Christian author Kathleen Norris did I understand the grave sin known as sloth to be anything other than laziness. In her “Christian Century” piece, Norris writes: “Sloth is so much more than laziness. It is an inability to concentrate on serious matters, and profound weariness of soul.”

As Evelyn Waugh once wrote, “The malice of sloth lies not merely in the neglect of duty (though that can be a symptom of it) but in the refusal of joy. It is allied to despair.”

Yikes. Really?

My soul is weary a lot, and these reflections made me think, which was exactly the intention of Bishop Gianfranco Girotti, head of the Apostolic Penitentiary, when he described to the Vatican newspaper L'Osservatore Romano how globalization impacts morality.

“You offend God not only by stealing, blaspheming or coveting your neighbor's wife, but also by ruining the environment, carrying out morally debatable scientific experiments or allowing genetic manipulations which alter DNA or compromise embryos,” he said in the interview.

Granted, most major newspapers and television networks have a ball with this kind of stuff, implying, “Those Catholics, they are so old-fashioned.”

But the whole point of the Vatican's statement was to communicate that sin isn't old-fashioned. It is very real and organic in the decisions we make on a daily basis.

My friend, Father James Martin, associate editor at America magazine, said this during a National Public Radio interview: “I think [Bishop Girotti] is reminding people that sins are not just individual ... that there are also social sins — sins that affect the community at large and sins that an institution can engage in.”

Perhaps Bishop Girotti was merely articulating the same message that Pope John Paul II wrote in his 1979 apostolic exhortation, “On Catechesis in Our Time”:

“Fashion changes, but a profound reality remains. Christians today must be formed to live in a world which largely ignores God or which, in religious matters, in place of an exacting and fraternal dialogue, stimulating for all, too often founders in a debasing indifference, if it does not remain in a scornful attitude of ‘suspicion’ in the name of the progress it has made in the field of scientific ‘explanations.’

“To ‘hold on’ in this world, to offer to all a ‘dialogue of salvation’ in which each person feels respected in his or her most basic dignity, the dignity of one who is seeking God, we need a catechesis which trains the young people and adults of our communities to remain clear and consistent in their faith, to affirm serenely their Christian and Catholic identity, to ‘see him who is invisible’ and to adhere so firmly to the absoluteness of God that they can be witnesses to him in a materialistic civilization that denies him.”

Don't deny guns to all citizens

In response to Moses Sandoval's March 14 column (“Sacrifices to the gun, our leading idol”), it is true that almost anyone can become a criminal capable of murder. However, to take away the rights of all law-abiding citizens to own guns is wrong.

Do all citizens deserve to lose the right to operate motor vehicles because of drunk drivers? Should we do away with knives and pointed sticks?

Perhaps if Mr. Sandoval's cousin had

The season after Easter: A magnificent eucatastrophe!

Christ's sacrifice ends with joy, if we open ourselves to it

J.R.R. Tolkien was a famous British writer whom most know for “The Lord of the Rings” trilogy recently popularized in film. But he also was a prominent Christian thinker and close acquaintance of C.S. Lewis.

Tolkien coined the word “eucatastrophe,” which can help us — if we reflect upon it — to keep the spirit of Easter alive beyond the Sunday of overflowing church pews and new spring outfits.

A eucatastrophe, said Tolkien, is “the joy in a sudden glimpse of the underlying reality or truth.”

Quite simply, a good ending not expected.

Surely to the frightened apostles on Good Friday this was the meaning of the resurrection, and likewise for us the “good ending unexpected” of Easter ought not be shut away as one might save a basket for next year.

To know the joy of the resurrection, we must hold fast to the significance of Christ's death beyond the weeks we recite the Stations of the Cross.

Christ's death is not mere historical fact — the tale of a heroically good man standing up to the injustices of the world and being crushed for his trouble. This is a compelling and instructive story line, but it is also an incomplete accounting of the faith.

To say that Jesus died because those in power ordered him killed does not reveal the great truth of his death. We come closer when we say that Jesus died for our sins and in fulfillment of God's plan of salvation.

But even this falls short, either because it is too glib or because it leaves us baffled how any father, let alone our Father, would give a son over to the profound suffering of the crucifixion.

What's more, our own mind revolts at the notion of an innocent man being punished for the transgressions of others.

C.S. Lewis reminds us in “Mere Christianity” that Jesus was not being punished in a retributive sense but in the sense of generously paying a debt or footing a bill — our bill — the debt we incur each time we assert that we belong to ourselves.

Faith & Precedent

DOUGLAS W. KMIEC
CNS COLUMNIST

This rebellion of spirit of course began with Adam and Eve, but it continues for each of us in every act of selfishness or self will. Our self-conceit is all the worse because it is made in the face of the infinite abundance of God's gift of life and creation to which we have no entitlement.

All humanity was greatly “in the hole,” as Lewis would say, with no way out. The debt that Jesus assumed for us was frankly beyond our capacities to fulfill. And if we think about it, were it not for the Incarnation, beyond God's.

It was not in God's divine nature to spurn, as we spurned, unmerited gifts of love. He could do it only by assuming our nature and then by dying unto it. Only then would the debt be paid.

So in these days after Easter, let us not understate the significance of Christ's passion, death and resurrection.

Most of all, let us not run up a new debt by putting undo emphasis upon the next success in material things, by constantly demanding to be entertained rather than accepting the day and the opportunities to do good that it brings.

The Easter season continues. It does not end on Easter Sunday. It is a eucatastrophe!

The resurrection is the eucatastrophe of the story of the incarnation, a story in Christ Jesus that, as Tolkien observed, begins and ends with joy — if we open ourselves to it.

Hope and healing after abortion

Resources available to help overcome post-abortion symptoms

The freedom to make choices means we bear the consequences of our decisions. For many people, the decision to choose abortion as the answer to an unplanned pregnancy carries with it pain and regret.

While each person's story is unique, there are many similarities common to those who have decided to terminate their pregnancies. Many felt overwhelmed with the reality of raising a child. And the strain of limited finances, the abandonment of parents or the baby's father, or the challenges of completing school are some of the common struggles impacting the choice to end a pregnancy.

But what may have seemed like a solution turns into deep feelings of guilt, shame and isolation. Many women later deal with symptoms of depression, eating disorders and drug and alcohol abuse. Many experience painful flashbacks of the abortions; many go on to have multiple abortions.

Additionally, post-abortive men and women report having difficulty dealing with relationships and feel disconnected from God, feeling they have committed an unforgivable sin.

In his 1995 encyclical, "Evangelium Vitae" ("The Gospel of Life"), Pope John Paul II eloquently addresses the pain these men and women may be experiencing and he calls them to accept God's grace:

"I would now like to say a special word to women who have had an abortion. The church is aware of the many factors which may have influenced your decision, and she does not doubt that in many cases it was a painful and even shattering decision.

"The wound in your heart may not yet have healed. Certainly what happened was and remains terribly wrong. But do not give into discouragement and do not lose hope. Try, rather, to understand what happened and face it honestly. If you have not done so, give yourself over with humility and trust to repentance.

"The Father of mercies is ready to give you his forgiveness and his peace. You will come to understand that nothing is definitively lost, and you will also be able to ask forgiveness from your child who is now living in the Lord.

"With the friendly and expert help and advice of other people and as a result of your own painful experience, you can be among the most eloquent defenders of everyone's right to life."

If you are struggling with an abortion in your past, or know of someone who is, there is hope and forgiveness with resources available to help begin the healing journey. As our Holy Father said: "Do not give into discouragement and do not lose hope."

Pope: Europe must undergo ethical renewal to avoid repeating mistakes

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS)—The future of Europe cannot rest solely on political and economic unity; the continent must also undergo an ethical and spiritual renewal if it is to avoid repeating its past mistakes, Pope Benedict XVI said.

A crucial source for that renewal can be found in St. Benedict, the patron saint of Europe, who is still the best teacher to show people "the art of living true humanism," he said.

The pope spoke about St. Benedict, the fifth-century father of Western monasticism and "patron saint of my pontificate," during his April 9 general audience in St. Peter's Square.

A question about the frequency of confession

Q. In a recent column you discussed a question from a lady concerned about confession without mortal sin. She was told that since she had no mortal sins to confess she was wasting the priest's time.

After that, she had been to confession only a few times over many years, and wondered about going to Communion. In your response you wrote, "Nothing in anything you said is a reason to forego receiving Communion."

Am I wrong that one of the commandments of the church is that we receive the sacrament of penance at least once a year, whether or not we are guilty of serious sin?

We learned it is sinful to receive the Eucharist if we had not confessed within the prior year. Don't the "six precepts of the church," including yearly confession, exist any more? (Ohio)

A. In the year 1215, the Fourth Lateran Council decreed that all Catholics should confess any serious sins once a year. In spite of the rather different wording you remember, which I too learned in school in the 1930s, that has been the law of the church during the past 800 years.

The old Baltimore Catechism No. 3 (St. Joseph Edition, Question 293), which for decades defined authoritative beliefs and practice for American Catholics, says the obligation for annual confession binds "if we have a mortal sin to confess."

The present Catechism of the Catholic Church (No. 1457) and current canon law (No. 989) say the same.

It bears repeating again that the church does not recommend receiving this sacrament only once a year or only when one is conscious of a serious sin. It is simply the bare minimum required.

As I indicated in the column to which you refer, most Catholics who wish to benefit spiritually from this sacrament would receive it more than once a year, mortal sin or not.

As for the precepts of the church, current canon law describes the obligations and rights in general for all Catholics, and specifically for the laity, largely in canons 206-231.

These regulations reflect what Catholic faith teaches about our common responsibility to cooperate in building and sanctifying the body of Christ. They can be briefly summarized as follows.

1. To lead a full sacramental life, especially to participate in the Mass on Sundays and holy days, share in holy Communion, and receive the sacrament of penance regularly, at appropriate times.

Question Corner

2. To provide proper religious education for oneself and one's children, especially by use of Catholic schools and other education programs.

3. To observe the marriage laws of the church.

4. To strengthen and support the church, one's own parish community and clergy, and the worldwide church.

5. To practice penance and self-denial in the spirit of Christ, including fast and abstinence on days appointed by church leaders.

6. To share in the missionary spirit and apostolic work of the local and universal church.

It is just coincidence that this group numbers six. But they cover essentially what the "precepts of the church" have been and are today.

A free brochure answering questions Catholics ask about the sacrament of reconciliation is available by sending a stamped self-addressed envelope to Father John Dietzen, Box 3315, Peoria, IL 61612.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

Our catechesis today is concerned with St. Benedict, the father of Western monasticism.

The most important source of information on his life is the Second Book of the Dialogues of Pope St. Gregory the Great. Writing in a time of turmoil and moral decadence following the fall of the Roman Empire, Pope Gregory believed that the life and Rule of Benedict could be a light leading the people of Europe out of darkness.

Benedict was born in 480 in the region of Nursia. He came to Rome to study but soon left the city so as to live in silence and to please God alone. He spent some time in a religious community before becoming a hermit in a cave.

After struggling victoriously against the fundamental human temptations of pride, sensuality and anger, he decided to found a monastery at Subiaco. Years later he established a new community on a mountain, Montecassino, to symbolize the public role of a monastery called to be a light shining for the good of the church and society.

Indeed, when he died in 547, St. Benedict left behind a thriving spiritual family and a rule, which invites us to search for God in prayer, obedience and humility while attending faithfully to daily duties and to those in need.

In 1964, Pope Paul VI proclaimed St. Benedict patron of Europe, recognizing the role that his teaching and his disciples had played in shaping Europe's spiritual life and culture.

Let us continue to pray that Europe's new unity may be enlightened and nourished by a religious and moral renewal drawn from its Christian roots.

Caritas health center provides needed care in Muslim Somalia

Cooperating in the name of God

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

BAIDOA, Somalia — Before dawn each morning, large crowds line up outside the gates of the Caritas Somalia Health Dispensary in this southern town, which has been hit hard by drought, a recent cholera outbreak and nearly 20 years of violence between rival clans and armed factions.

To be first in line for treatment, people sleep outside the gates of this outpatient facility that provides free health care. Sometimes the line is so long that not all patients can be seen.

Hawo Adan, a 28-year-old mother of four, came to the center knowing that her child with leishmaniasis would be treated and fed. Leishmaniasis, also known as black fever, is an often-fatal disease transmitted by sand-fly bites.

"A serious drought ravaged our land, so there is no food at home. But I knew at this clinic, even if my child's treatment lasts a month, I will be given food for all that period," Adan said.

Another patient, Ibrahim Mohammed, walked more than 20 miles to the center.

Through the Pontifical Council Cor Unum, the Vatican agency that promotes and coordinates Catholic charitable giving, Pope Benedict XVI donated to this medical center the 2007 collection from his Holy Thursday Mass in the Basilica of St. John Lateran in Rome.

The center is run by Caritas Somalia, the local affiliate of Caritas Internationalis, a confederation of 162 Catholic relief, development and social service organizations working in more than 200 countries and territories.

More than a year after the papal donation, the Baidoa center has increased its service to almost 170 patients a day.

Davide Bernocchi, director of Caritas Somalia, said the center's work shows that it is possible to meet Somalis' basic needs with limited resources.

Many of its patients have traveled long distances from their villages, while others live in camps set up for those who have fled the conflict in Mogadishu, the nation's capital. It is not unusual for people to travel 60 miles to receive care.

For the past year, Ethiopian-backed Somali forces have fought Islamist insurgents in Mogadishu almost daily. The fighting has killed hundreds of civilians and forced tens of thousands to flee.

The center works on a first-come, first-served basis, but anybody is served regardless of clan or social status.

With support from nongovernmental organizations, including the U.S. bishops' international aid agency Catholic Relief Services, the Baidoa center offers specialized treatment to many people, said Abdullahi Bernocchi, the center's medical coordinator.

Many people said it would be impossible for a Catholic organization to work in this violent environment, where people were unused to interacting with outsiders and where any non-Muslim religious presence was likely to be regarded with suspicion.

"We needed to give the local people some hope that the ongoing national reconciliation process would eventually result in concrete positive outcomes in their daily life," Bernocchi said.

Maalin Nuno Abdulrahman, the imam at a mosque next to the Caritas center, said, "I don't know what life would have been without Caritas. ... The respect we have for this service can be seen by the distance people travel to come for medical care."

Shihab Babiker, Islamic Relief's Somalia director, said the cooperation between his agency and Caritas Somalia is noteworthy.

"When Christian and Muslim agencies cooperate in the name of God, it is placing the dignity of the human person before other differences," he said.

HONORING A COURAGEOUS CATHOLIC

CNS BY BRIAN AHO, COURTESY OF U.S. NAVY VIA REUTERS

U.S. President George W. Bush applauds after presenting a posthumous Medal of Honor for Petty Officer 2nd Class Michael Monsoor to his parents, George and Sally Monsoor, at the White House in Washington April 8. The Catholic Navy SEAL died Sept. 29, 2006, after diving onto a grenade during an attack on his combat team in Ramadi, Iraq.

Bush presents posthumous Medal of Honor to Catholic Navy SEAL

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A tearful U.S. President George W. Bush presented the parents of Petty Officer 2nd Class Michael Monsoor with a posthumous Medal of Honor for saving the lives of two Navy SEAL teammates by sacrificing his own in Ramadi, Iraq.

Monsoor was 25 when a hand grenade tossed by Iraqi insurgents hit his chest and landed on the ground in front of him. Monsoor immediately threw himself on the grenade, smothering its blow. He died less than 30 minutes later.

At the April 8 ceremony at the White House, Bush said this highest military medal was "awarded for an act of such courage that no one could rightly be expected to undertake it. Yet those who knew Michael Monsoor were not surprised when he did."

Father Paul Halladay, former chaplain of the 1st Battalion, 506th Infantry Regiment, was at the ceremony and knew Monsoor when he was a chaplain stationed in Ramadi.

Though the circumstances in which Monsoor died were a very outward sign of his heroism, Father Halladay described Monsoor as being "very soft-spoken, low-key, unassuming."

He was not unlike others his age, Father Halladay told Catholic News Service April 7, noting that like the saying "still waters run deep," Monsoor "was a man with a depth of courage and spirituality."

Father Halladay, a priest of the Archdiocese of Mobile, Ala., currently stationed with the 58th Transportation Battalion at Fort Leonard Wood, Mo., told CNS he knew Monsoor "was well loved by his team" and said Monsoor had a "quick smile."

The first time Monsoor met Father Halladay, he asked the priest to hear his confession. Father Halladay said that, to him, this was a sign that Monsoor was concerned with and cared about his spiritual life.

"I do know that (his faith) was important to him, while that didn't keep him from being a normal 25-year-old man," he said. But his faith "just made him the best 25-year-old man he could be," added the priest.

Father Halladay said Monsoor's faith life allowed him to instinctively save the lives of his teammates.

"So when it came down to laying down his life for his friends, his faith life allowed him to be able to do that without a moment's hesitation," he said.

Father Halladay, who was with Monsoor before he was officially pronounced dead, noted that Monsoor died Sept. 29, 2006, the feast of St. Michael and two other archangels.

Monsoor received the Silver Star Medal posthumously for his heroic actions in May 2006 when he pulled a wounded teammate to safety while under enemy fire. He also was honored with the Bronze Star Medal, the Purple Heart and the Combat Action Ribbon.

Monsoor became the third Medal of Honor recipient from the Iraq War.

Syrian, Jordanian diplomats urge U.S. to share Iraqi refugee burden

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The ambassadors of Syria and Jordan called on the United States to share the burden of the unprecedented Iraqi refugee crisis.

"The situation is terrible and the burden" on Syria's resources and population is horrendous, said Imad Moustapha, Syrian ambassador to the U.S.

Moustapha was a participant on one of several panels at an April 4 forum in Washington. The forum, sponsored by Villanova University School of Law in Pennsylvania, gathered advocates, aid workers and lawyers involved with Iraqi refugees.

Moustapha stressed the economic and security problems that 1.5 million Iraqi refugees in Syria have caused the already strained government, which subsidizes social programs such as health care and education for Syrians.

Prince Zeid Ra'ad Zeid Al-Husseini, Jordan's ambassador to the U.S., said the "volume of people in such a short space of time (in Jordan) is staggering to the mind."

Najla Chadha, director of the Catholic-run Caritas Lebanon Migrant Center, said the Lebanese "are starting to get jealous" of the 50,000 Iraqi refugees in Lebanon because of the support they receive.

Chadha said there is a problem with overlap in services provided by nongovernmental organizations. In an effort to garner funding from donor countries, many organizations say they are working with Iraqi refugees, she said, adding there is a lack of coordination on the part of donors and service providers.

Several other aid workers discussed the unique problems faced by Iraqi refugees, many of whom are illegally residing in their host countries.

FROM THE VATICAN

Cardinal: Papal events with Bush don't signal approval of policies

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI's upcoming visit to the White House to meet with U.S. President George W. Bush does not signal Vatican support of the Bush administration's foreign policies, a Vatican official said.

The April 15-16 encounters with the president when the pope arrives in the U.S. should "absolutely not" be seen as support of Bush's stance on Iraq, said Cardinal Renato Martino, president of the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace.

The cardinal spoke to reporters April 11 during a break in an international conference on disarmament sponsored by the Vatican council.

"The pope and the Holy See cannot renounce with one visit all the Holy See's positions of rejecting war, always encouraging dialogue to smooth over disagreements and fostering cooperation," he said.

He said the argument that U.S.-led troops have to remain in Iraq in order to bring security and protect the Christian minority is open to question.

But whether it is wise to keep troops in Iraq is "a very difficult judgment" to make because some analysts say "the daily slaughter that unfolds in Iraq" is rooted in the continued presence of foreign troops, said the Italian cardinal.

Cardinal Martino, who served as the Vatican's permanent observer to the United Nations, 1986-2002, said he and others at the U.N. "did everything" to prevent what they saw as unjust attacks against Iraq in 1991.

However, Vatican lobbying and repeated papal appeals against the 2003 war against Iraq failed, he said.

The pope's role is much like the priest urging his flock "to follow the Ten Commandments. It's then up to us to follow them or not," he said.

Pope urges world to slash military spending, funnel savings for peace

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI urged nations to slash military spending and funnel savings into peaceful development projects around the world.

He also called on nations to halt the spread of handguns and other small-caliber weapons "that fuel local wars and urban violence and unfortunately kill too many people across the world every day."

The pope made his comments in a written message presented to participants gathered for an April 11-12 seminar sponsored by the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace. The Vatican released a copy of the papal message April 12.

The international seminar, which brought together dozens of experts and representatives from the church, governmental agencies and grassroots groups, was titled "Disarmament, Development and Peace: Perspectives for an Integral Disarmament."

In his written message, the pope praised the gathering, saying the topic was "timely" and "urgent."

In order to avoid repeating "the horrors of the Second World War," leaders created the United Nations, but "today the international community seems like (it is) missing," he said.

Tension and warfare rage in some parts of the world, while in places where people are spared such conflict "the feelings of fear and insecurity are widespread," Pope Benedict said.

Global terrorism also has blurred the lines between the state of peace or war and is "seriously jeopardizing the future hope of humanity," he said.

While peaceful economic development and political and juridical guidelines are needed to help reduce conflict and weapons proliferation, the pope said it is "ever more urgent to foster a new humanism that enlightens humanity's self-understanding and the meaning of its place in history."

Arms reduction and authentic peace can only come about after violence has been eliminated from its roots, that is, in people's hearts, he said. People need to "decisively point themselves toward the quest for peace, the good, and the just" and become peace workers, he wrote.

Pope names Slovakian cardinal as envoy to eucharistic congress

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI has named Slovakian Cardinal Josef Tomko to be his representative at the International Eucharistic Congress in Quebec City.

The 84-year-old cardinal was president of the Vatican's office for organizing the international event from 2001 to 2007. Previously he served for 16 years as prefect of the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples.

The June 15-22 International Eucharistic Congress in Quebec coincides with the 400th anniversary of the founding of Quebec City.

Church and government officials had invited Pope Benedict to preside over the congress, and Canadian Catholics even launched an Internet petition urging him to attend.

The Vatican announced April 12 that the pope had appointed Cardinal Tomko to be his representative at the gathering, which will include speeches and workshops on different themes related to the Eucharist, opportunities for eucharistic adoration and Masses.

The theme of the congress is "The Eucharist, Gift of God for the Life of the World."

Workshop better equips advocates for handling marriage nullity cases

nullity process, working under a set of procedures and laws established as part of canon law, the universal law of the church.

"An advocate is a bridge between the petitioner and the church in a unique way," said Joy Barnes, tribunal advocate for the Diocese of Charlotte.

An advocate is someone who helps those seeking annulments to develop their cases.

Priests and deacons of the diocese, who serve as case sponsors and provide pastoral support to parishioners going through the process, also attended.

"These workshops are focused on giving them (advocates) both the theory behind the various grounds that are available for hearing marriage cases, as well as some practical experience in looking at cases," said Dominican Father W. Becket Soule.

Father Soule, who presided over the workshops, is a judge for the Diocese of Charlotte and currently the pastor of St. Denis Church in Hanover, N.H.

A licentiate, or graduate degree beyond the master's level, in canon law is required to serve as judge. A graduate of Davidson College, Father Soule holds a licentiate and a doctorate in canon law from the Catholic University of America. He was appointed a judge for the Diocese of Charlotte by Bishop Peter J. Jugis four years ago.

"Since all procedures in a canonical process have to be in writing, actually being in the office every day is less crucial than it is in a secular trial," said Father Soule. "Given the current shortage of trained personnel, I am happy to be able to assist the Diocese of Charlotte in any way I can."

The goal of the workshop was to better equate advocates with grounds of nullity and go over basic annulment procedures, according to Lisa Sarvis, head of the diocesan tribunal.

"Frequently the judge is unavailable to answer questions," said Father Soule. "The advocate, therefore, is both a means to keep the parties informed as well as a mean to keep the tribunal aware of their needs and concerns."

There are 50 volunteer advocates located throughout the Diocese of Charlotte. At least one advocate is assigned to every parish and mission to assist its parishioners.

The purpose of a nullity process is to determine whether or not an indissoluble marriage bond was created when the parties entered their marriage. It must be proved clearly and without doubt that this enduring bond was not established in order to declare the marriage null.

This proof must focus on grounds of nullity recognized by church law and must apply to the marriage from its very beginning. Grounds are the provisions in the law of the church, identifying the circumstances under which a marriage may be invalid.

The tribunal receives around 300 new requests for annulments each year.

"Unfortunately divorce is a fact of life but a civil divorce has no standing in the church, just as decisions rendered in canon law have no civil effect," said Sarvis.

During a Jan. 26 meeting with members of the Tribunal of the Roman Rota, a Vatican court that deals mainly with appeals in marriage annulment cases, Pope Benedict XVI said local tribunals play an indispensable role in making justice accessible to Catholics and in "investigating and resolving cases in their concreteness, which is sometimes tied to the culture and mentality" of the local population.

However, he said, "all the sentences must always be founded on common principles and norms of justice."

When handling the nullity process, the tribunal works under a set of procedures and laws set forth by the Code of Canon Law.

The Code of Canon Law is seldom revised; however, new interpretations and applications continue to develop as cases are heard and resolved throughout the universal church. Thus, the tribunal offers continuing education to the advocates to help them keep up with the latest developments.

"When consent to marriage is invalid, for whatever reason, it is the responsibility of the church to bring that fact to light and free the parties to move on with their lives and their faith journeys," according to the diocesan advocate handbook. "That is the mission of this ministry and the hope and prayer of all involved."

"Advocacy is a healing ministry," said Barnes. "Often our petitioners have become separated from the sacraments by divorce and remarriage. An annulment draws them back to the Eucharist and full participation in their faith communities."

The Annulment Process:

1. The first step for a petitioner considering a marriage case is to approach the local parish priest or pastoral assistant, who will assist the petitioner in completing a preliminary questionnaire for submission to the diocesan tribunal. This questionnaire provides the tribunal staff an overview of the marriage.
2. The tribunal next contacts the other party to the marriage – the respondent – who has a right to be heard. A questionnaire is sent to the respondent to request information regarding the alleged grounds of nullity.
3. The petitioner is expected to inform witnesses that they will be contacted by the tribunal, and request their prompt cooperation. Each witness is sent a questionnaire based on the grounds in the case and a cover letter explaining how to proceed. The testimony is to be given under oath, and witnesses have the option of signing the completed questionnaire before a Catholic priest or pastoral minister or before a notary public.
4. A favorable decision in the diocesan tribunal must be reviewed by the Court of Appeals of the Province of Atlanta, Ga.
5. Upon completion, the petitioner is notified and sent a copy of the final decree.

Young girls gather around the runway to get a closer look as Pure Fashion models showcase the latest trends in fashion and modesty.

Models of the 'Great Designer'

Teen girls take fashion high road

BY KATIE MOORE
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — A runway extended to the center of the second-floor ballroom at the Westin hotel. A cluster of young girls lined the platform anxiously awaiting the beginning of the show.

When the models emerged, the clothes became the backdrop as the message of purity took center stage.

It was the first annual Pure Fashion show in Charlotte, April 13. The show was the culmination of a seven-month program in which 69 teen girls between the ages of 14 and 18 learned the value of dressing modestly in a not-so-modest world.

Tickets to the show sold out in advance and the ballroom was filled to its 760-seat capacity.

"Charlotte is ready for this program," said Kathy Comer, Charlotte Pure Fashion chairwoman. "Just look around at the malls, in the schools and in the grocery stores. Modesty is more than the way you dress. It is an interior attitude."

The afternoon included a motivational talk, music and dance performances, a runway show, and a message from national Pure Fashion director, Brenda Sharman.

Three themes ran throughout them all: modesty, dignity, and glorifying God.

"It is heartening to know that young people are searching for ways to live in the modern world while retaining Christian values and virtues," said Bishop Peter J. Jugis, Bishop of Charlotte, who opened the event in prayer.

"Pure Fashion is a faith-based program that encourages teen girls to live, act, and dress in accordance with their dignity as children of God," according to its Web site.

Pure Fashion is sponsored by Regnum Christi, an apostolic Catholic movement associated with the Legionaries of Christ.

Maria Knuth, a consecrated woman of Regnum Christi who assisted with spiritual formation for the Charlotte program, said that the goal is to "teach the girls they can be fashionable and modest at the same time."

The unique thing about the program is that it "reaches girls you wouldn't normally reach with other church programs," she said.

Over the course of seven months, the girls learned lessons in public speaking, manners, hair and makeup artistry, and personal presentation. The Charlotte program also included an essay writing competition, service project, and retreat.

"We teach them that they are made in the image and likeness of God and are created to glorify God in all things, even in the way they dress," said Comer.

Meredith Walsh, a junior at Charlotte Latin School and a parishioner at St. Ann Church, said the program has helped her deepen her friendship with Christ.

"Pure Fashion has taught me that you can be fun and fashionable and have a relationship with Jesus," she said.

"Modesty is more than the way you dress. It is an interior attitude."

She added that one of the most rewarding aspects of the program is being a good role model for young girls.

"I like being able to help other girls see that they are children of God," she said. "We are all models of the Great Designer."

The importance of family was another message that came across strongly throughout the show.

"The seeds of modesty begin at the home," said Comer, mother to sons Braxton, 12, and Walker, 10, and daughter Lydia, 8. "It's never too early to start teaching our young girls the importance of living a life of dignity."

Not surprisingly, the idea behind Pure Fashion came from a group of mothers in Atlanta, seven years ago. It was institutionalized as a Regnum Christi apostolate two years ago and has spread across the country and expanded internationally.

It is about "living your faith in your daily life," said Thalita Cortes, one of the finalists in the essay writing competition.

Cortes, an 8th grader at Community House Middle School and a St. Matthew parishioner, said that through Pure Fashion she became comfortable with herself and realized that there was "no pressure to be something else."

"This is what is meant to recognize true beauty," said Comer, "by learning the importance of living a life in accordance with God's will and fostering a life of grace through purity of mind, heart and body."

'The great Galileo'

After four centuries, renowned astronomer to return to Vatican

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Four centuries after he was called by church officials to retract teachings deemed suspect of heresy, the 17th-century Italian astronomer Galileo Galilei will be returning to Vatican City.

A statue of the great scientist will be erected in Vatican City to help commemorate next year's celebration of the International Year of Astronomy and the 400th anniversary of Galileo's first use of the telescope to observe the cosmos.

Paid for through private donations, the work of art was commissioned by the Pontifical Academy of Sciences, but the statue still needs a place to call home.

The science academy "is one of the most beautiful masterpieces of Italian Renaissance art and, therefore, there is a problem of precisely where the statue should go" so as not to disrupt the aesthetic beauty of the landscape, the academy's president, Nicola Cabibbo, told Catholic News Service.

"The Vatican is very enthusiastic about the idea," he said, but "the problem is where. ... But something will be worked out," hopefully by next year when the jubilee kicks off.

Cabibbo, a particle physicist at Rome's Sapienza University, said honoring Galileo in such a way is important because the academy considers the scientist "to be one of the oldest members of our academy."

The pontifical academy has its roots in the world's oldest scientific academy — the National Academy of Lincei — of which Galileo was a member.

Cabibbo said a model of the statue shows Galileo standing and gesticulating as if he were giving a lesson.

Galileo, in fact, taught the church several important lessons. Pope John Paul II outlined most of them in a 1992 speech when he formally acknowledged that the church erred when it condemned the astronomer for maintaining that Earth revolved around the sun.

After accepting the findings of a commission he had appointed in 1981 to study the Galileo trial, the pope told members of the Pontifical Academy of Sciences that the Galileo case held important lessons concerning "the nature of science and the message of faith."

One key point, he said, was that the whole affair underlined "the duty for theologians to keep themselves regularly informed of scientific advances" so they could see whether there was cause for "introducing changes in their teaching."

Incorrect condemnation

Galileo's condemnation in 1633 by the Holy Office, predecessor of the Vatican Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, is often used to symbolize the tensions between science and religion; critics often use the Galileo affair to suggest religion might somehow be an obstacle to the advancement of human knowledge.

This "myth," as Pope John Paul had called it, is still alive and well, despite the late pope's hopes of putting the Galileo case to rest for good.

Earlier this year, Pope Benedict XVI canceled a planned visit to Sapienza University after more than 60 professors wrote a letter protesting the visit, saying the pope was "hostile to science."

One accusation — based on an erroneous page on the Italian Wikipedia Web site — held that the pope was "against Galileo."

The page, which has since been corrected, said that in a 1990 speech the future pope endorsed a modern philosopher's opinion that the church's trial of Galileo was "reasonable and just" when in fact the pope had called the author's opinion "drastic."

During a talk to young people at the Vatican in 2006, Pope Benedict praised the scientist as "the great Galileo" who understood mathematics as the language of God the creator.

Power of proof

Born in Pisa in 1564, Galileo was one of the most important mathematicians, physicists, astronomers and inventors of his era. Through his telescopic observations he discovered sunspots, the moon's pocked and mountainous surface and Jupiter's satellites.

He also provided evidence for Copernicus' view that Earth revolved around the sun. At the time, the generally held theological view was based on several Old Testament verses and attested the sun revolved around a stationary Earth.

This view of the Earth-sun relationship was considered an essential part of the overall belief that humans, as redeemed by Christ, are the center of the universe.

Galileo argued his controversial heliocentric view did not oppose faith.

He believed the Bible was not meant to give scientific explanations of nature; in a letter he once paraphrased a famous remark by Italian Cardinal Caesar Baronius saying sacred Scripture does not reveal what is in the heavens, but rather how to get to heaven.

Jesuit Father Sabino Maffeo, the Vatican Observatory's vice director for administration, told CNS that Galileo ran into trouble with the Holy Office because he did not have proof for his claims.

"Not having proof ... (the Holy Office) was forced to hold on to the centuries-old concept" that saw Earth as the center of the cosmos, he said.

If he had had proof, which did not come for another 100 years with discoveries made by Isaac Newton, Galileo's fate could have been much different, Father Maffeo said.

"The Vatican is very enthusiastic about the idea."

— Nicola Cabibbo

He added that Italian Cardinal Robert Bellarmine, who was part of the 17th-century Vatican commission that admonished Galileo not to hold or defend the Copernican theory, had told Galileo "the day in which you bring a demonstration then we will have to look at how sacred Scripture gets interpreted differently, but as long as there is no proof, we will continue to interpret (Scripture) literally as we have all along."

Church and science

The Stensen Institute, a Jesuit-run cultural center in Florence, Italy, has organized a world congress for spring 2009 to re-examine the Galileo affair.

Members of the Vatican Observatory, the Pontifical Council for Culture and the sciences academy are some of the experts invited to the congress to show how "recent scientific and historical research" could help alleviate the "tension and conflict" still clouding the relationship between the church and science, said Jesuit Father Ennio Brovedani, head of the Stensen Institute.

The Jesuit is just one of a number of scholars who believes there is still more to be done to assure the public that the church has made peace with Galileo.

Cardinal Paul Poupard, who was the last to head Pope John Paul's commission on Galileo, told CNS that the late pontiff once asked him, "Well, Eminence, has the case been closed?"

"I told him, 'No, there will still be women and men who with (free will) will be able to think whatever they want,'" the cardinal said.

CSS AWARENESS WEEK

CSS Awareness Week 2008

Helping people across the diocese and beyond

BY DAVID HAINS

SPECIAL TO
THE CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

CHARLOTTE — In a Russian orphanage, a 1-year-old boy sits idly in a crib.

In Greensboro, N.C., an immigrant from the Dominican Republic worries about her three children. Supporting her family keeps her away from home for long hours and the children resent her time away.

In Charlotte, an elderly couple has a bleak future — the husband has dementia and the wife is overwhelmed by the decisions she now must make alone.

The thread running through these three stories isn't their tragic dimension; it is the hope of Catholic Social Services of the Diocese of Charlotte. CSS offers services that have touched the lives of these people and countless others. Their stories are contained within this week's issue of The Catholic News & Herald.

With CSS Awareness Week taking place April 19-27, these stories are reminders of the thousands of people helped each year in CSS offices throughout the 46-county diocese.

In Asheville, Winston-Salem, High Point, Greensboro, Charlotte and Murphy, CSS offices offer marriage preparation courses and natural family planning instruction; pregnancy support; elder ministry; counseling, adoption and immigration services; refugee resettlement; burial assistance; and peer support groups for youths.

CSS is affiliated with Alexandria, Va.-based Catholic Charities USA, which has provided social services and organization leadership for U.S. dioceses since 1910.

CSS was first organized in North Carolina in 1947 and was a part of the Diocese of Charlotte when it was established in 1972.

Elizabeth Thurbee, executive director of CSS of the Diocese of Charlotte, said that each year more than 14,000 people in the 46 counties receive services, regardless of their religion or ethnicity.

"I constantly hear people say, 'Wow, I didn't know that,' when I describe the services offered by CSS. People are amazed," said Thurbee.

Thurbee said CSS Awareness Week should make Catholics proud of the work done in the name of their faith.

"We were established to provide services to the vulnerable in our society, regardless of who that person may be, in accordance with Catholic social teaching," she said.

CSS adoption programs bring families together

BY DAVID HAINS

SPECIAL TO THE
CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

WAXHAW — Jennifer and Michael Kellam of Waxhaw worked with Catholic Social Services' international adoption program to bring Andrew into their lives.

Andrew came from a Russian orphanage in late 2006, a week shy of his first birthday. He is now 27 months old.

Like all new parents, the Kellams are keeping track of their "greatest moments as parents." For Jennifer, it is whenever she hears Andrew laugh. For Michael, it is "when Andrew says 'Daddy' and runs to me or when he hugs me every morning," he said.

Licensed as a child-placing agency since 1948, CSS of the Diocese of Charlotte provides professional domestic and international adoptions based on the highest children welfare standards. The CSS program emphasizes support, preparation and education.

CSS' international adoption program, based in CSS's Western Region Office in Asheville, places children from several regions in Russia and assists in adopting children from China.

Since its founding in 1994, the program has placed more than 600 Russian children in U.S. homes. CSS currently places between 50 and 80 children each year with families — couples married at least two years — and with single women who have been carefully screened and prepared to welcome children.

In 2000, the Russian Federation required agencies placing children from Russia be accredited by the Russian government. Reaccreditations occurred annually until 2006, when the Russian government delayed the process while instituting new requirements.

In 2007, CSS was among the first eight agencies worldwide to be accredited by the Russian Federation.

CSS' accreditation was the culmination of months of intensive scrutiny to ensure applicant agencies were prepared to conduct adoption services within the government's new guidelines.

CSS is the only Catholic agency in the United States with a direct placement program in Russia. This means CSS deals directly with Russian authorities in placing children in U.S. homes, usually making the adoption process faster and less expensive than an agency without direct placement capability.

CSS staff located in Moscow and other areas assist adoptive parents in all phases of the process.

Children from infancy to school age are placed in suitable homes. CSS encourages the placement of siblings. Adoptions are usually completed in 12-18 months.

The Kellams describe their adoptive experience through CSS as "wonderful."

"We felt free to call the staff anytime. There was always someone available to talk with us," said Jennifer Kellam.

"CSS was very upfront and efficient and made the whole process as smooth as possible," she said.

The Kellams are in the process of adopting a second child from Russia through CSS. They are all excited that Andrew will soon have a brother or a sister.

Louise and Stewart

Counseling services help couple face difficult moments

BY DAVID HAINS
SPECIAL TO THE
CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

Editor's note: Names have been changed for privacy.

CHARLOTTE — He was her first boyfriend.

But "first loves" usually don't last and so it was for Louise and Stewart, who eventually went their separate ways.

Thirty-eight years later, Louise's husband had died and Stewart was divorced.

He called her and the old flame was kindled.

She moved to Charlotte and love led to marriage. Together in their 50s, it looked as if they would glide together into the golden years.

But when Louise and Stewart were in their 60s, something began happening to Stewart. A medical diagnosis confirmed it — he had dementia.

"It was like going into a dark valley that he will not come out of," said Louise.

As Stewart lost his ability to speak, he began communicating his pain in a journal.

"I am tears on my pillow," he wrote.

Louise's loss was coupled with fear about finances and their future. She wondered how she would take care of him.

As they had always been a self-reliant couple, Louise believed she could talk through a problem and resolve it.

But Stewart could no longer speak, and as a senior citizen with limited resources, Louise had no access to professional counseling.

There was just too much on her plate until a bulletin announcement at her parish, St. Matthew Church in Charlotte, offered a spark of hope: Catholic Social Services provides professional counseling services.

Louise began meeting with a counselor and started talking about the things that frightened her.

After four months, the will was taken care of, Medicaid was arranged and her finances were in order.

Even with some issues resolved, Louise's time now with Stewart may not be what they had envisioned when they met more than 40 years ago, or what they anticipated when they married late in life.

But it is a life of dignity and caring, as Louise spends her days with her husband.

"He likes me to sit with him and hold his hand," she said.

Louise is appreciative of all the help they received from CSS.

"CSS supports me in what I have to do. CSS helps me take care of me," said Louise.

"There are lots of supports out there and CSS gave me the courage to take advantage of them," she said. "I didn't want to sit and fear the future and, thanks to CSS, I don't."

HIGH POINT — At 32 years old, Ana Marie's life was looking bleak in the Dominican Republic.

She could not find work and felt resigned to live with her physically and emotionally abusive husband, because she saw no other way to support her three children — 16-year-old Nancy, 14-year-old Rita and 11-year-old Jorge.

But then one day in 2004, she was contacted by a cousin in North Carolina who told her there was work here, and that she could obtain proper documentation to enter the United States.

Ana Maria borrowed some money to make the move. But she could not afford to take all the children, so only Jorge made the trip. The girls were left with a grandmother.

Ana Maria's life in America was a regimen of hard work, worsened by her inability to be with her growing daughters. Back in the Dominican Republic, Nancy and Rita both felt abandoned by their mother.

While Nancy, who had seen her mother's bruises at the hands of her father, tried to understand the sacrifice, Ana Marie's absence was especially hard on Rita. She had grown quiet and seemingly had forgotten how to smile.

Finally after two years, Ana Maria earned enough money to send for the girls.

Unfortunately Ana Maria's story did not have a fairy tale ending upon reuniting with her daughters. She struggled with the trauma of the domestic violence she had suffered.

She also worked such long hours to support her family that she wasn't connecting with her children; it seemed to them that they were being abandoned, yet again.

The girls became estranged from her. Nancy began skipping school and was constantly angry toward her mother and siblings. Rita still wouldn't smile. Jorge was withdrawn and quiet as he tried to adjust to life in a new country.

The turning point for the family came when they met Leticia Ontiveros from Catholic Social Services' Latino Family Center in High Point.

Ontiveros introduced Ana Maria's daughters to the Hermanas (Sisters) program for Latina women.

At first, Nancy was quiet during presentations that dealt with self-esteem and abstinence to drugs, alcohol, tobacco and sex. But it didn't take long for Nancy and her sister to begin enjoying the twice-a-week Hermanas meetings.

Now they are building a connection with their Hermanas' instructors, participating in activities and learning valuable skills and lessons that could change their lives and futures.

The Latino Family Center staff next arranged for Ana Maria and her children to receive family therapy. Irene Agudelo, a CSS caseworker, began serving as an interpreter for them.

Jorge has since joined the Hermanos (Brothers) program this past semester. He has made friends and learned positive decision-making skills.

Ana Maria participates in the center's Family Literacy program, where she learns English while her kids take part in other program activities.

Unlike previous holidays, Ana Maria's family had a wonderful Thanksgiving and Christmas recently, thanks to members of St. Leo the Great Church in Winston-Salem and Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in High Point, who donated food and gifts.

"It was a nice holiday season for the family," said Tanya Hoeller, Latino Family Center director. "Rita smiles now, and Ana Maria's whole family is full of gratitude."

Refugee finds new life, work through CSS

CHARLOTTE — Mirsad Suljakovic is pursuing the American dream, thanks to the help of Catholic Social Services.

Suljakovic, a refugee from Bosnia-Herzegovina, has been living and working in Charlotte through the efforts of CSS' Refugee Resettlement Office in Charlotte.

After losing a brother to the ethnic violence among Serbs, Muslims and Croats in the early 1990s in Bosnia-Herzegovina, a multiethnic, multireligious war-torn nation, Suljakovic and his family fled to Germany and applied for refugee status to enter the United States.

In 2001, they arrived in Charlotte with few possessions but with a fierce determination to make new lives for themselves.

CSS' Refugee Resettlement Office provided their first living arrangements, arranged for English as a second language classes and helped them find employment.

Suljakovic now works with a local cabinet design and installation company, putting his skills to use installing high-end cabinets. Company owner Scott

Knowles said taking a chance and hiring a refugee was "the best experience I have ever had in business."

He credits Suljakovic for his company's increased sales because of the skills, hard work and integrity he brings to the cabinet installers' team.

"Mirsad has helped us improve the quality and efficiency of our work," said Knowles, who is also chairman of the Refugee Resettlement Office's employment advisory committee.

The committee is comprised of local employers who assist CSS to broaden opportunities for refugee employment.

Six years later after arriving in Charlotte, Suljakovic and his wife own a home and are involved in their children's school and sports activities.

CSS also serves refugees resettled in the Asheville area from Russia, Ukraine, Belarus and Moldova.

Marriage prep class helps couple prepare for life of matrimony

BY DAVID HAINS

SPECIAL TO
THE CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

CHARLOTTE — When the curtain went up on the romance of Jackie Dautel and Christopher Timmons, he was the technical director of Theatre Charlotte, she was working on the stage lighting for an upcoming show.

It didn't take long for 27-year-old Dautel and 29-year-old Timmons to become a couple. They dated for two years before deciding to commit their lives to one another in marriage.

Jackie and Christopher Timmons were married Oct. 6, 2007 at St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte.

Like all Catholic couples contemplating marriage in the Diocese of Charlotte, before they could make the sacrament of matrimony they first had to complete a marriage preparation class.

Marriage preparation classes are offered through Catholic Social Services throughout the year at locations in Charlotte, Winston-Salem, Greensboro, Hickory and Arden. Parishes sometimes offer the classes as well.

Jackie and Christopher Timmons' class was scheduled for a Saturday at St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte. As luck would have it, the weather outside was beautiful that day and the couple admitted they were not thrilled with spending the day indoors. Additionally, like many engaged couples, they were busy with wedding preparations.

"We weren't very excited about the class," said Jackie Timmons.

But after the class, their attitude about it — and their marriage and life together — had changed for the better.

"I remember coming out of the class and thinking, 'that was cool,'" said Christopher Timmons. "There were a lot of things that I gained and we gained."

The classes are divided into sections, each beginning with a lecture. Topics include marriage as a sacrament and covenant, marital sexuality and natural family planning, conflict resolution and money and finances."

After each section, the couples spend time together discussing their thoughts and feelings. Jackie and Christopher Timmons quickly discovered they had not had a deep understanding of each other's families.

And, they realized, they also had not spent much time discussing the handling of their finances once married.

"It was good to talk about all of those things that make the relationship stronger," said Jackie Timmons.

For other couples who may see the class as a time-consuming "to do" during a hectic time, Christopher Timmons has advice: "I would highly recommend it. It presents situations and information that you may not have talked about with your significant other."

"It definitely brought us closer together," he said.

New documentary showcases faith, witness of Sisters of Mercy

ERIE, Pa. (CNS) — Mercy Sister JoAnne Courneen recalls holding in her arms a woman who was crying out in pain at a homeless shelter in Washington several years ago.

It was a defining moment for her. "At that moment you realize God is really in your life. (The poor) are really the face of God for us," says Sister Courneen in a new documentary film produced about the Erie Sisters of Mercy.

On Jan. 1, they joined Mercy sisters in Buffalo, the Philippines, Pittsburgh and Rochester to form the New York, Pennsylvania, Pacific West Community.

Sister Courneen, who serves on the leadership team for the new community, says the incident made her realize that everyone is one bad decision away from being homeless.

Titled "Meeting of the Waters," the film is being released as a DVD. It premiered for the general public March 12 in Erie. It begins with the setting sun on the beaches of Lake Erie as a sister writes in a journal. She reflects on her calling as a sister after an emotional assembly in Buffalo, N.Y., last July that united the five regional communities of the Sisters of Mercy.

Moving moments of the assembly are woven into the film. Erie Sisters of Mercy have warmly embraced the film.

"There was some laughter and tears," Mercy Sister Mary Ann Bader said in an interview after attending a private screening in February. "It was profoundly moving; different than what I expected."

Using candid interviews and moving imagery, the hourlong film tells the stories of Sisters of Mercy who live out their commitment to religious life each day. Mini-features include a Mercy associate's faith story and a sister's invitation to women to consider a vocation to religious life.

"It's a very human story of women who were led by the Spirit to live out religious life according to the charism of mercy," said Gary Loncki, the community's communications director.

Loncki worked with Mercy associates to enlist Imago Dei Video Productions to make the film.

Filmmaker Greg Schlueter said most people find religious life intriguing and baffling as those who enter it forgo sexual intimacy, worldly opportunity and material possessions.

"Yet somewhere behind that door are real women who hold the keys to something we're all pursuing, who give witness to tremendous joy. That's what we wanted to capture: real women, in their own words, describing what they're about, why they do what they do," said Schlueter, whose Erie-based company has worked on several national projects such as Disney's "The Chronicles of Narnia," A&E's "God or the Girl" and Warner Bros.' "Superman's Return."

In the film, Sister Mary Dolores Jablonski tells of how her parents were reluctant to support her desire to enter religious life.

"They just wanted grandchildren," says Sister Jablonski, executive director of the Mercy Center on Aging.

Sister Carol Ann Voltz, a nurse's aide at the Sisters of St. Joseph living center, tells how the example of sisters led her to consider becoming one of them. "I was just so attracted to it," she says.

Sister Michele Marie Schroeck looks back on her years as a Mercy sister and finds her life fulfilling.

"I'm happier than I ever thought I would be," she says.

The film explores the impact the Second Vatican Council has had on the sisters' lives and what the Sisters of Mercy foundress, Mother Catherine McAuley, means to them.

Music for the film was scored by Tim and Ryan O'Neill, internationally known as "The Piano Brothers." The O'Neills have sold more than a million compact discs of their inspirational and moving music.

They have six Billboard hits and their music has appeared on HBO, PBS, A&E and ESPN.

Learning to let go and let God

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

A year ago, five other women and I formed a group to be spiritual companions to each other. We gather periodically to read Scripture, pray and "listen to God."

As we gradually have become secure enough in our friendship to reveal deeply held issues and experiences, we have found ourselves taking on each other's concerns as our own. Now we are a small community of faith, sharing our lives, in love, through the life of Christ.

As companions we've grown to be able to help one another discern God's will in each of our own circumstances. At any given gathering it is common for one person to tell another, "Something you said to me last time came back to me," helping that person resolve a particular problem or understand a situation more clearly.

Recently, for instance, we read a Scripture passage about placing trust in God instead of human capability. Someone lamented a long-running frustration in her life that seemed it would never be resolved.

"I know I should trust God," she said, "but really, I just can't believe it will work out."

One of the other women nodded in understanding, but said gently, "It will. It will." She spoke in such total confidence of the risen Lord's goodness that her friend was able to regain her trust.

The Holy Spirit acted through our communal love and faith.

In this weekend's Gospel reading, Jesus tells his disciples, "If you love me, you will keep my commandments." When that happens, he adds, the Father will send the Holy Spirit to dwell within and among them and constantly reveal himself to them.

Love and commitment to Jesus -- and in him to each other -- promises his life to us "always."

Questions:

What is an example of how your love of Jesus opened you to the grace of the Holy Spirit? How has the Spirit helped you to remain in Jesus and the Father?

Scripture to be illustrated:

"I will not leave you orphans; I will come to you" (John 14:18).

For the month of April, here are some historical facts about the Basilica of St. Lawrence in Asheville, which was designated a minor basilica by Pope John Paul II in April 1993.

The title of minor basilica is granted to prominent and significant churches throughout the world as a sign of papal honor. The title is reserved for a handful of churches — 11 in Rome, 34 in the United States.

- October 1909: St. Lawrence Church dedicated by Abbot-Bishop Leo Haid of Belmont Abbey

Historical Background

— The original St. Lawrence Church was dedicated in 1869, but did not have a resident pastor until 1887.

— One of the early missionary priests who served at the first St. Lawrence Church was Father Thomas Price, who would later become famous as the co-founder of the Maryknoll Missioners. His cause for canonization is currently open.

— The famous Spanish architect, Rafael Guastavino, who had earlier assisted with the Biltmore House in Asheville, helped design the basilica.

The second St. Lawrence Church had become too crowded in the summers, and on one particular Sunday, Guastavino had been unable to find a seat. This prompted him to offer the pastor, Father Peter Marion, his architectural services so that a new larger church could be constructed.

Father Marion, who had been very ill, had promised God that if his life was spared for a few more years, he would do some special work for the Lord's honor and glory.

His younger brother and assistant pastor, Father Patrick Marion, reminded him of this promise, and they accepted Guastavino's offer.

— The prototype of St. Lawrence Basilica was Our Lady of the Forsaken Basilica in Valencia, Spain, the native city of the architect, Rafael Guastavino.

"During Bishop Gibbons' first visit to Asheville, in 1868, a vacant space containing about seven and a half acres in the centre of the town attracted his and the clergy's attention. A more suitable site for a church and other ecclesiastical buildings could not be found.

"It was purchased at a moderate sum from Colonel N.A. Woodfin, an eminent lawyer ... who also contributed handsomely towards the contemplated object. The people were anxious for the establishment of a Catholic church. ... They [Fathers L.P. and J.P. O'Connell] succeeded, after much labor, in realizing the necessary funds, and the following year a commodious brick building was erected, and dedicated by Bishop Gibbons, under the invocation of St. Lawrence."

PAPAL VISIT TO USA

of Washington; Archbishop Timothy P. Broglio of the U.S. Archdiocese for the Military Services; Bishop Gerald F. Kicanas of Tucson, Ariz., USCCB vice president; and Mary Ann Glendon, U.S. ambassador to the Holy See.

Although the two spoke privately for less than 10 minutes in a building on the air base grounds, neither Bush nor the pope delivered any formal remarks at the air base. The pope's official welcome was to take place the next day at the White House.

In their meeting, Pope Benedict sat at a small round table, and the pontiff accepted a glass of juice. The president sat on the pope's right and the first lady on the pope's left. Cardinal George and Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, the Vatican secretary of state, also were at the table.

It was the first time in his presidency that Bush had gone to Andrews to welcome any head of state. The air base has hosted more than 300 arrivals or departures by heads of state since 2006.

Joining the president in greeting Pope Benedict were first lady Laura Bush and the Bushes' daughter Jenna.

White House press secretary Dana Perino said at an April 15 briefing before the pope's arrival that Bush would tell the pontiff at the White House that "the hearts of the American people are open to the Holy Father's message of hope."

Pope Benedict "will hear from the president that America and the world need to hear his message that God is love, that human life is sacred, that we all must be guided by common moral law, and that we have responsibilities to care for our brothers and sisters in need at home and across the world," Perino added.

Perino admitted that the pope and the president disagreed on issues such as the war in Iraq and the death penalty but said that "there is much more agreement between these two leaders than there is disagreement."

"I really don't think that the president is planning to spend a lot of time talking about the issues of Iraq with the pope," she said. "But I do think that the root cause of ... terrorism and extremism is something that they will talk about."

At Andrews, the wind ensemble from Bishop McNamara High School in Forestville, Md., provided entertainment while a crowd of approximately 1,200 people assembled before the pope's arrival. The group was chosen to perform because they were going to Disney World for a competition later in the week and would miss the April 17 papal Mass at Nationals Park in Washington.

Fridays again days of abstinence?

Q. A new priest in our area tells us that all Fridays are again days of abstinence. Another priest says it is a sin if we do not perform some act of penance on Fridays.

I know the rules about fast and abstinence during Lent, and we should do some penance on all Fridays, but I've never heard the obligation expressed in terms of sin. Is there a change? (Pennsylvania)

A. No, there is no change. I have a suspicion someone misunderstood the priest, and he was referring to abstinence on all Fridays of Lent.

In his apostolic constitution entitled "Paenitemini" (Feb. 17, 1966), changing the church regulation about abstinence from meat on Friday, Pope Paul VI was not replacing one kind of sin with another.

The pope said he was pointing out "the implications and importance of the Lord's command to repent," since all members of the church "are in continuous need of conversion and reform."

The fact that a spirit of penitence is primarily an interior religious experience, he writes, does not lessen the need for exterior practice of this virtue.

Because this need is so essential in Christian life, it "prompts the church, always attentive to the signs of the times, and according to the character of each age, to seek beyond fast and abstinence new expressions more suitable for the realization of the precise goal of penitence."

In other words, practices of penance effective for spiritual renewal at one period of time may not be the best for another period. Thus the church today invites everyone to accompany his or her inner conversion, for example, at times during Lent with "voluntary exercise of external acts of penitence."

Note the word "voluntary." One can understand what Pope Paul is getting at in this frantic and stressful age when he says the attitude or virtue of penitence should be exercised first of all in persevering faithfulness to the duties of one's state in life.

Not many would dispute that devoted, loving steadfastness in fulfilling our daily responsibilities automatically brings with it numerous opportunities for self-denial and patience.

The pope mentions specifically the difficulties arising from one's work, from one's human relationships, from the stress of insecurity that pervades modern life and the anxieties of each day's struggles as additional sources of mortification and self-restraint.

If anyone lovingly and generously tries to observe these habitual practices of penance the pope offers, it is hardly conceivable that he or she could go through a whole day without some sort of prayer, self-control and expressions of love that are prescribed by our Lord as well as by traditional Christian spirituality.

Pope Paul, in other words, had no intention to belittle or diminish the importance of penance. He was asking something even more demanding; go back to the command of Christ, "If anyone wishes to come after me, he must deny himself and take up his cross daily and follow me" (Lk 9:23), and ask yourself what, if anything, that means to you.

Nine months after the publication of "Paenitemini," the American bishops made its provisions specific for the United States, abrogating the law of Friday abstinence from meat except during Lent.

Without making it a "law," in the spirit of the pope's message they recommended Friday abstinence as a praiseworthy, voluntary (not mandatory) act of self-denial.

Janet's bag of blessings

Ordinary things can be extraordinary reminders of God's grace

Janet came to the sacristy after Mass with a plastic bag.

"Father," she said, "can you bless some things?"

People often bring things to be blessed after Mass. Sometimes there is a little line. It is part of our "sacramentalizing" impulse in Catholicism, by which I mean the desire to make the "ordinary" things of creation into "extraordinary" reminders of God's grace.

Ordinary things are holy when they are set apart for God.

In Janet's bag were some "holy things." There was a St. Rita of Cascia pill box. St. Rita was an Italian saint of the 14th century. She is patroness of impossible causes, aches and pains, and, most importantly, forgiveness.

She had to forgive the murder of her husband. She also bore on her head the wounds of Jesus' crown of thorns.

So she is sometimes thought of as a patron to people who have pain. Hence the pill box.

Blessing the pill box makes it a holy vessel of the medications and a way to say that real healing comes through the spirit in forgiveness.

Not a bad message.

Janet also had a Sacred Heart of Jesus coffee mug.

The Sacred Heart of Jesus is a puzzlement to many people. They don't understand the flame bursting out of Jesus' chest. But I think they are missing a great insight.

One of my favorite novenas is to the Sacred Heart. That novena speaks of Christ's heart as a burning furnace of love for us.

It may seem a little irreverent, but I always think of that Elvis song where he sings of "a hunk of burning love." Something really on fire for us.

It is nice that when you are drinking your morning coffee you realize that your life is not just warmed by "Mister Coffee" but by the heart of Jesus.

Janet also had a wall plaque of the prayer to the Immaculate Heart of Mary. People often confuse the Immaculate

Parish Diary

FATHER PETER DALY
CNS COLUMNIST

Heart of Mary with the Sacred Heart of Jesus. We have a man in our parish who always prays for fulfillment of the intentions of both.

I pointed out to him that we don't pray for the intentions of Jesus because Jesus is the second person of the Trinity, i.e., God. He does not need our help since he is, well, God.

But we do pray for the intentions of the Immaculate Heart of Mary. We figure anything that Mary has adopted as a prayer intention must be a good thing.

After all, she taught Jesus to pray. As his mother, her prayers will get a hearing.

All of this is, of course, "anthropomorphic." We assume that God responds to human motivations. That might seem a little silly, but we do believe that we are made in God's image.

Besides, what else can we do? It is our nature to see things from a human perspective. God's will is only a partially revealed mystery.

Finally, Janet had a big set of glow-in-the-dark rosary beads. She said they had been blessed by the Blessed Mother at Medjugorje, Bosnia-Herzegovina.

Evidently Mary tells pilgrims they should take it to a priest to be blessed. I was flattered. While I could hardly improve on Mary's blessing, I could see Janet's point that it is still important that the priest pronounce it holy as a representative of Christ and his church.

Not everybody is a walking religious goods store like Janet. But I understand her desire.

She wants to make the whole world into something sacred. That is a good thing.

Christians can't ignore 'scourges of humanity'

In his Easter message Pope Benedict XVI said, "How often relations between individuals, between groups and between peoples are marked not by love but by selfishness, injustice, hatred and violence." And these "scourges of humanity, open and festering in every corner of the planet," are often ignored.

Every day the news is filled with reports of murder, rape, war and every other array of hatred and violence. It's almost impossible to escape the ongoing news of man's inhumanity to man.

So then why is the pope stating the obvious?

Well, when things become so commonplace, when we hear similar reports over and over, we tend to get used to them. Even the most horrible stories — if we're not careful — fail to move us.

And as Pope Benedict observed, we end up ignoring the "scourges of humanity."

One of the worst scourges of humanity is an underreported, ongoing tragedy suffered by many of the world's forgotten children.

According to Human Rights Watch, approximately 250,000 children under 18 and some as young as 8 years old are recruited and forced to serve in state-run armies, paramilitaries and guerilla groups around the world.

Known as "child soldiers," these boys and girls serve as combatants, spies, sex slaves and human mine detectors.

According to Human Rights Watch, "Children suffer higher mortality, disease and injury rates in combat situations than adults. The lasting effects of war and abuse may also remain with them long after the shooting stops.

"Both girls and boys may be stigmatized and traumatized by their experiences and left with neither family connections nor skills to allow them to transition successfully into productive adult lives."

In 2006 the U.S. State Department listed Burundi, Chad, Colombia, Democratic Republic of Congo, Ivory Coast, Sri Lanka, Sudan and Uganda as countries using child soldiers in government forces or government-linked militias.

Yet the U.S. government continues to give military assistance to these nations.

A bill designed to significantly improve this misguided foreign policy and provide concrete means to help countries end their reliance on children as soldiers is sitting in the U.S. Senate gathering dust.

The Child Soldier Prevention Act (S1175), if passed into law, would provide funding designed to assist offending governments to disarm, demobilize and rehabilitate child soldiers from government forces and government-sponsored paramilitaries.

Having signed the U.N. Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the Involvement of Children in Armed Conflict, which sets 18 as the minimum age for forced recruitment or participation in hostilities, the United States has an obligation to do everything within its power to stop the unspeakable practice of using child soldiers.

No matter how much Catholics disagree on the issue of military spending, we should all certainly be able to agree that the use of child soldiers is an intolerable practice that cannot be ignored.

With just a little time and effort here, we can help advance Pope Benedict's goal of replacing selfishness, injustice, hatred and violence — with love.

Extra! Extra!

Committed believers can bring about needed revolution

One of the better methods to escape boredom while creeping through chronic traffic congestion morning and night is to read and then reflect upon the thoughts expressed on the bumper stickers of nearby cars.

This might be described as the "lectio divina" of today's urban roadways, readings that spark a thought that leads to further contemplation.

By these ubiquitous banners, vehicle owners proclaim many things: what they would rather be doing; the breeds of dogs they prefer; their view on Darwin and evolution; their son's or daughter's status on the middle school's honor roll; the fate awaiting those who follow too closely or their various fatalistic views of life often expressed in scatological terms.

Some are like potato chips — two bites and they are gone and forgotten. Others are like chili, returning in a minute of two with an aftertaste not easily forgotten.

Such was the case recently.

"May all who are hungry be fed," a bumper sticker proclaimed. What a nice thought, so pleasant, warm and giving. Then the aftertaste.

"May all who are hungry be fed."

Fed by whom?

That nice — and safe — statement wishing the poor well exemplifies the contrast between passive Christianity, something we belong to, with active Christianity, being what we are.

The countercultural revolution that Christianity must bring about in the world can come only by the active involvement of committed believers.

But to accept this is to accept several hard facts: Jesus wasn't kidding. The Sermon on the Mount is not poetry, but an imperative. "Thy kingdom come" is not an expression of longing, but a statement of absolute certainty.

Accepting the invitation to be Christian is not accepting membership in a moral uplift society; rather, it is making a commitment to be a disciple.

That bumper sticker served as an examination of conscience...the Christian imperative is a directive: feed the hungry, give drink to the thirsty, clothe the naked.

Or as a once popular bumper sticker said: "Just do it."

Generosity and renunciation

Happiness resides in giving over taking

Many years ago, I knew two young men who were discerning a call to priesthood. Both decided to test their vocations by entering different religious orders.

Unlike a diocesan priesthood, each order would eventually call the men to a vow of poverty.

I mention "poverty" because it relates to my observations of them, both great guys, as they prepared to enter religious life.

One of them was very thrifty. Before he entered, he methodically sold his possessions at garage sales.

He really wouldn't need the money, I thought, going off on this pilgrimage of renunciation. But maybe he was hedging his bets.

The other guy gave everything away. He had accumulated a lot of quality clothing when he worked for a haberdasher during college. He distributed it all to cousins and friends.

It didn't seem to occur to him — or he didn't care — that if he didn't stay, he could use some of those possessions later.

My 16-year-old brother was visiting me at the time, and this friend handed him a pair of fine shoes.

"Wow," my baby brother said, "this has been a great trip." He didn't have much money and those shoes were a big deal to him.

Well, as it turned out, neither of the young men became priests. Both of them went on to marry and raise fine families. Luckily for me, one of them, the one who gave his fashionable clothes away, became my husband.

I share this memory because the attitudes people bring to money and possessions are such a fascinating part of who they are.

What makes us thrifty, sometimes to the point of hoarding, and what makes us open-handed?

CBS News recently reported on a study that purports to show that people who spend money on others are happier than people who spend money on themselves.

Of course, as Christians, this shouldn't surprise us. Christ called us to serve others and he assured us that the poor in spirit were blessed. True happiness follows the way of generosity and renunciation. At least that's what we aspire to.

Still, it's tough to conquer our inherent desire for security and possessions.

My mother, a child of the Great Depression who saw her father lose his farm to creditors, was unable to overcome her need to hang on to money, although she was far more generous with her children than with herself.

Being truly my mother's daughter, I can identify with the friend who had the garage sales. I know he's a devoted Catholic, and I'm sure he's generous with time and money.

But I bet he calculates it well, watches every penny and keeps the receipts for his taxes.

I can identify with all of that.

Meanwhile, there are nights I lie awake worrying about finances while the man who shares my bed mutters "it's only money" and falls asleep.

Do we become happier because we give? Or do happier people give more?

Regardless of the answer, and regardless of the attitudes about money we grew up with, our faith calls us to constantly challenge ourselves to give more.

And if the end result of doing that is happiness, how can we go wrong?

Statistically speaking

Survey assesses Catholics' beliefs, practices on Mass, sacraments

By NANCY FRAZIER O'BRIEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — As the U.S. Catholic Church prepared to welcome Pope Benedict XVI, a new survey found big differences among Catholics of different generations about the importance of the sacraments in their lives.

Asked which sacrament was most meaningful in their lives, 39 percent of respondents named baptism, 26 percent said marriage and 25 percent named the Eucharist. Among those who said they attended Mass weekly or more often, 52 percent said the Eucharist was most meaningful in their lives.

The study also divided respondents into four generations in relation to the Second Vatican Council: pre-Vatican II, comprised of those born before 1943; Vatican II, born between 1943 and 1960; post-Vatican II, born 1961 to 1981; and millennial Catholics, born after 1981.

While those of the first three generations chose the Eucharist as their most meaningful sacrament, 43 percent of the millennial Catholics said marriage was the sacrament most meaningful to them.

The survey of 1,007 self-identified adult Catholics was commissioned by the U.S. bishops' Department of Communications and conducted by the Center for Applied Research in the Apostolate at Georgetown University in Washington. A 178-page report on the results was released April 13.

The margin of error for the survey was plus or minus 3.1 percentage points.

The survey found that for each succeeding generation the percentage who had made their first Communion and first confession and received the sacrament of confirmation declined.

While 95 percent of Catholics in the pre-Vatican II generation and 91 percent of the Vatican II generation said they had been confirmed, only 79 percent of post-Vatican II Catholics and 69 percent of millennial Catholics said they had received the sacrament of confirmation.

The percentage of Catholics who had made their first Communion ranged from 99 percent of pre-Vatican II Catholics to 85 percent of millennial Catholics. For first confession, the range was from 98 percent of the oldest generation to 84 percent of the youngest generation.

Only 2 percent of Catholics across all generations said they participated in the sacrament of reconciliation once a month or more, 12 percent said they did several times a year, 12 percent said they did once a year, 30 percent said less than once a year and 45 percent said they never made a sacramental confession.

The CARA report, titled "Sacraments Today: Belief and Practice Among U.S. Catholics," summarized responses to a wide range of questions about Catholics' attitudes toward and participation in the Mass and the sacraments, their knowledge of the Catholic faith, their views on church leadership and teachings, and whether they pray the rosary, carry religious objects or have pictures of Mary hanging in their homes.

Archbishop George H. Niederauer of San Francisco, who authorized the study as chairman of the U.S. bishops' Committee on Communications, said the results would offer guidance to church leaders.

"It reveals good will, healthy attitudes toward neighbor and an openness to the church among young Catholics," he said in a news release. "Yet it also points out a need for greater efforts in education for both adults and young people."

A statue of Our Lady of Beauraing stands in a grotto at St. Bernard Church in Talkeetna, Alaska. The statue, cast by World War II soldier George Herter, contains a splinter of a hawthorne tree brought from the original shrine to Mary in Belgium. The tiny 100-family parish is staffed by volunteers but welcomes thousands of tourists and mountain climbers.

Pioneer spirit helps run rural Catholic church in Alaska

TALKEETNA, Alaska (CNS) — Nearly every parishioner at the rugged little Catholic church in Talkeetna is actively involved in running the rural Alaskan parish.

And no one is paid.

Nestled at the foothills of the largest mountain in North America, St. Bernard Church depends on of about 35 dedicated families.

Led by volunteer parish administrator Renamary Rauchenstein, the parish is reminiscent of Alaska's pioneer days, or even the time of the early church.

Parish decisions and responsibilities are decided once a month in town-hall-style meetings.

"It's been wonderful; not every parish can do this," Rauchenstein said. "Ninety percent of the people are involved in over 10 different committees."

"It's a small parish, a small town, but Renamary is a great leader," echoed parishioner Suzy Kellard.

The two women liken their church to an extended family. When someone hears of a parishioner in need, people rally to help out, either through supplying meals, prayers or delivering Communion.

Kellard describes a volunteer spirit that would likely be the envy of many parishes. And the helping hands reach far beyond the borders of Talkeetna.

"About a quarter of what we make here (collections, fundraisers) goes to outreach," Rauchenstein said.

The parish holds an annual bazaar to help raise money for other ministries in the Anchorage Archdiocese like the Mary Magdalene House and the Brother Francis Shelter, she said. Kellard and her daughter also help the less fortunate in the Upper Susitna Valley through a parish-run food bank.

"Between here and Trapper Creek, we serve over 100 to 130 families," she said.

The small church also takes on a giant task each summer, playing host to literally thousands of tourists and mountain climbers who come to the small town for its most famous landmark — the 20,000-foot Mount McKinley. During this time, tourists flock to the church to attend Mass or quietly pray.

Parishioners said many climbers attend church to pray before attempting to reach the summit of Mount McKinley, the highest peak in North America.

"St. Bernard is actually the patron saint of mountain climbers," Rauchenstein said. "We have an ice axe in the church dedicated to St. Bernard from one man who successfully summited the mountain."

Rauchenstein credits the parish's volunteer spirit to the work of Sister Louise Tibbets, a member of the Sisters of the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary who served the church more than 20 years ago.

"She taught us all," Rauchenstein said. "She could see the writing on the wall, and knew we would have to take care of ourselves, but she inspired us to know that we could do this."

"People just started coming forward," Kellard agreed, while attributing part of the community atmosphere to Rauchenstein's leadership. "Once people stepped forward, they enjoyed it and planned their Sundays around (volunteering)!"

Pittsburgh bishop testifies for Marriage Protection Amendment

PITTSBURGH (CNS) — Bishop David A. Zubik of Pittsburgh was among those who testified on behalf of Pennsylvania's proposed Marriage Protection Amendment at a hearing April 10 at the Allegheny County Courthouse.

More than 200 people packed the chambers of the Allegheny County Council to hear the often-spirited debate.

"That marriage must be considered truly sacred seems to elude us," Bishop Zubik said. "We have reached the point of a laissez-faire view of marriage, a concerted effort to expand its definition so vaguely that marriage essentially becomes meaningless."

"At a time when we should be engaged in doing all we can to strengthen marriage, and strengthen especially the family, we are facing cultural forces that want to so water down the definition of marriage that it could apply to any human relationship, or to no relationship at all," he said.

The bishop's testimony came before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

The bill, S.B. 1250, would amend the state constitution to read: "No union other than a marriage between one man and one woman shall be valid or recognized as marriage or the functional equivalent of marriage by the commonwealth."

To date, 27 states have amended their constitutions to protect marriage. Supporters of the Pennsylvania proposal say it is needed to protect marriage between one man and one woman from redefinition or the legalization of "civil unions."

Among the arguments against S.B. 1250 was that it would contradict legislation passed by the city of Pittsburgh that granted domestic partnership rights.

Testifying with the bishop in support of the amendment was Rita Ferko Joyce, general counsel of the diocese. She said the Catholic Church supports the amendment because of the beliefs and traditions that marriage and family are central social institutions that must be supported.

FROM THE VATICAN

Pope cites Vatican official's 'zeal and passion' to protect family

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Cardinal Alfonso Lopez Trujillo, president of the Pontifical Council for the Family, led church efforts to safeguard and promote a Catholic view of marriage and family life with untiring "zeal and passion," Pope Benedict XVI said.

The 72-year-old Colombian cardinal died April 19 at a Rome clinic, where he had been hospitalized since early April with a respiratory infection.

The pope presided over the final commendation and farewell during Cardinal Lopez Trujillo's funeral Mass in St. Peter's Basilica April 23.

"We cannot help but being grateful for the tenacious battle he conducted to defend the truth about familial love and to spread the 'Gospel of the family,'" the pope said, and called Cardinal Lopez Trujillo a "tireless pastor" who generously served the church and "the Gospel of life."

The cardinal, who served as archbishop of Medellin from 1979 to 1991, had been president of the family council at the Vatican for nearly 18 years.

As president, Cardinal Lopez Trujillo denounced proposals in several countries that would authorize same-sex marriage and adoption by same-sex couples.

He helped local churches oppose legislation to legalize abortion or make it easier to obtain and called promotion of contraceptives a form of "biological colonialism" by drug companies and wealthy nations. He described drug addiction as a modern "form of slavery that oppresses the whole world."

Cardinal Lopez Trujillo was convinced that the family risks destruction and that the church must lead an "evangelical struggle" to defend it.

On several occasions, he praised the administration of U.S. President George W. Bush for its opposition to abortion and its positions on a range of pro-life and family issues.

Vatican official: Relics of Padre Pio remind Catholics saints were people

SAN GIOVANNI ROTONDO, Italy (CNS) — Venerating the relics of St. Padre Pio is a reminder that the saints were real men and women who lived for God, said Cardinal Jose Saraiva Martins, prefect of the Congregation for Saints' Causes.

Cardinal Saraiva Martins celebrated Mass April 24 at San Giovanni Rotondo before officially unveiling the new, crystal tomb in which Padre Pio has been reburied.

Pilgrims will be able to view the body of the Capuchin friar, who died Sept. 26, 1968.

In his homily, Cardinal Saraiva Martins emphasized two things: the meaning of death and the significance of venerating relics.

"Facing the mystery of death, we are called to understand that that which we see does not sum up everything about human existence," he said. "The body is here, but Padre Pio is not just a body. In fact, he who lived in full union with the crucified Jesus now lives in absolute communion with the risen Jesus."

Venerating the body of Padre Pio, he said, believers are called to remember.

"Looking at his mortal remains, we remember all the good he accomplished in our midst through this body. The relics of those who sleep in the Lord — and of the saints in a special way — invite us to look toward the future. They call us to renew our faith in the resurrection of the flesh."

The Capuchins of San Giovanni Rotondo said the body will be on view at least until September, but perhaps for as long as a year before the crystal will be covered.

Padre Pio's body was exhumed in a service that began late at night March 2 to verify the state of the body and to allow technicians to ensure its long-term preservation.

The friars had said the body was in "fair condition," although the skull and parts of the upper body showed serious signs of decay.

The Capuchins hired Gems Studio, the London-based firm that makes figures for Madame Tussaud's Wax Museum, to create a silicone mask — including a short moustache and ample beard — for the body.

Bishop and president

Supporters of Paraguayan presidential candidate retired Catholic Bishop Fernando Lugo Mendez celebrate his victory outside the Pantheon of the Heroes in downtown Asuncion April 20. Bishop Lugo, 58, retired from the Diocese of San Pedro in 2005. The Vatican suspended him from exercising his priestly ministry when he decided to run for president, but rejected his request for laicization after more than 30 years as a bishop and priest. The Paraguayan bishops' conference made no official statement after the elections, but the Paraguayan newspaper ABC quoted Bishop Adalberto Martinez Flores of San Pedro, secretary of the Paraguayan bishops' conference, as saying that the conference "accepts and acknowledges the victory of (Bishop) Lugo as president-elect of Paraguay."

Church group collects, donates items to U.S. soldiers

MOORESVILLE — The S.W.A.T. team accepted a mission and accomplished it with much success.

The Special Works and Task (S.W.A.T.) team at St. Therese Church in Mooresville recently collected and donated a minivan full of items to the USO of North Carolina.

The USO is a nonprofit organization whose mission is to support U.S. troops. The area branch is headquartered in Charlotte.

Donations included hygiene items, race team memorabilia, decks of cards, books, food and paper products.

The project began in February after a presentation by a parishioner, retired Air Force Lt. Col. Kathleen Green, who is now a high school health occupations education teacher.

Green showed S.W.A.T. team members a slide show about the Iraq war and provided a list of things needed by soldiers.

At the next meeting in March, "We decided to follow through with the list," said Mary Ann Frohman, team chairwoman.

Team members contributed many of the items, she said, but to reach their goal, they sent a list to other parish groups and placed announcements in the parish bulletin.

A room in the church was used to store donated items collected after Masses April 5-6. A USO van came April 8 to pick up the items. The Army Reserve at Fort Bragg near Fayetteville, N.C., plans to take any items the USO cannot use.

S.W.A.T. originated as the Altar Guild and was renamed in 1983.

"Kinship, friendship, laughter and hard work are the hallmarks of our group," said Frohman.

Previous projects to benefit the parish include a rummage sale, Lenten soup lunches, publishing a cookbook, providing meals and gift baskets, and an annual craft bazaar.

Conference explores benefits of sharing God's gifts

met to discuss the value of giving one's time, talent, and treasure for the benefit of others and the good of the church.

This was the second year the Diocese of Charlotte has hosted one of the conferences sponsored by the Atlanta Province.

The Atlanta Province is made up of the Archdiocese of Atlanta, along with the dioceses of Savannah, Charleston, Raleigh and Charlotte.

"The importance of stewardship is that it is one very real and concrete way that we respond to the call to be disciples of Jesus," said Barbara Gaddy, associate director of development for the Diocese of Charlotte.

The goal of the conference was "to educate parishioners and help them better promote stewardship as a way of life," she said.

"Jesus has already shown us that the greatest purpose in life is to give ourselves away, to share our abundance," said Msgr. Mauricio W. West, vicar general and chancellor of the Diocese of Charlotte, in his opening remarks at the conference.

"All that we are, all that we have is a gift — a gift to be shared in love," he said.

"The focus of the development office is to be a resource to parishes in a number of different areas," said Jim Kelley, director of development for the Diocese of Charlotte and board president of the International Catholic Stewardship Council.

"In the area of stewardship, we want to help parishes do a more effective job of spreading stewardship as a way of life among their parishioners," he said.

The keynote speaker for this year's conference was Bishop J. Kevin Boland of Savannah, who spoke on the topic, "The Heart of Stewardship."

Members of stewardship committees and pastoral councils, along with priests, deacons and other lay volunteers from throughout the Atlanta Province, attended the event.

More than 360 people attended this year's stewardship conference, making it the largest regional stewardship day in the country, according to the Diocese of Charlotte's Office of Development.

The conference included six breakout sessions on topics such as infusing stewardship into the life of the parish; blending multiple cultures in the parish; and forming, strengthening and sustaining parish stewardship committees.

Msgr. Anthony Marcaccio, pastor of St. Pius X Church in Greensboro, spoke about the vibrant ministry of stewardship at his parish in his presentation entitled, "Putting it all Together: Bringing the Principles of Stewardship into all Aspects of Parish Life."

"The great success we have had with stewardship flows from a profound appreciation of God's blessings," said Msgr. Marcaccio, who credits the achievements of his parish to the integration of stewardship in all aspects of their community.

According to the diocesan Office of Development, the benefits of stewardship often show up in numerous aspects of parish life.

For example, one parish found that five years after implementing stewardship in its community, the parish offertory nearly doubled, the number of volunteers ministering in the parish increased by more than 300 percent and weekday Mass attendance was up 200 percent.

"These are the kinds of fruits that most parishes find after they have been promoting stewardship annually over about a five-year period," said Gaddy.

Roundtable discussions provided an opportunity for stewards from around the region to network and share ideas.

"The part of the conference that I found most helpful was getting together with other stewards from other parishes and finding out what they're doing," said Jennifer Shinn, volunteer ministry coordinator at St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte.

What the conference does every year "is provide a new excitement and a new energy for stewardship committees and people on pastoral councils," said Gaddy.

The conference concluded with Mass concelebrated by Bishop Peter J. Jugis of Charlotte and Bishop Boland.

"Stewardship is an important concept for our spiritual growth as Catholics, both as individuals and as parishes," said Bishop Jugis in a letter to stewards who attended the conference.

"In a spiritual sense and temporal sense, adopting stewardship as a way of life changes people and changes the life of the parish as a whole," he said.

Cardinal Edward M. Egan welcomes Pope Benedict XVI to St. Patrick's Cathedral for the celebration of Mass April 19 in New York.

Illuminating the 'splendor of the church'

Pope urges U.S. church to 'put aside all anger' and unite

BY JOHN THAAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK — Pope Benedict XVI urged the Catholic Church in the United States to move past divisions and scandal toward a "new sense of unity and purpose."

The pope, celebrating Mass in St. Patrick's Cathedral April 19 with bishops, priests, religious and seminarians, once again addressed the damage and suffering caused by the clerical sex abuse scandal and called for a time of purification and healing.

More generally, he said it was time to "put aside all anger and contention" inside the church and embark on a fresh mission of evangelization in society.

The pope was celebrating the third anniversary of his election, and he arrived to congratulations from New York Cardinal Edward M. Egan and an ovation from the 3,000 people who packed the cathedral. Many of them held aloft cameras or even stood on pews for a glimpse of the pontiff.

"We are greatly honored that you begin your fourth year as universal shepherd here with us," the cardinal said.

The setting was New York's 130-year-old Gothic cathedral, built with "the pennies of the poor," as Cardinal Egan said. In his homily, the pope used the building's architectural harmony as a metaphor for the church's inner unity.

Just as the cathedral's stained-glass windows flood the interior with splendor, he said, the beauty of life in the church can really only be understood and experienced from the inside.

Yet sometimes "the light of faith can be dimmed by routine, and the splendor of the church obscured by the sins and weaknesses of her members," he said.

"For all of us, I think, one of the great disappointments which followed the Second Vatican Council, with its call for a greater engagement in the church's mission to the world, has been the experience of division between different groups, different generations, different members of the same religious family," he said.

The pope said it was important for all in the church to open themselves to points of view that "may not necessarily conform to our own ideas or assumptions."

This is the way to hear what the Spirit is saying, he said.

The pope said all those in the cathedral were "called to be forces of unity within Christ's body." A first step, he said, is to seek inner reconciliation through penance.

He noted that he had already spoken several times during his U.S. trip about the suffering caused by priestly sex abuse. Today, he said, he wanted to assure the priests and religious of his spiritual closeness as they respond to the continuing challenges of the scandal.

"I join you in praying that this will be a time of purification for each and every particular church and religious community, and a time for healing. I also encourage you to cooperate with your bishops, who continue to work effectively to resolve this issue," he said.

The pope said the church must be a "beacon of hope" in today's world, and that means promoting a culture of life.

"The proclamation of life, life in abundance, must be the heart of the new evangelization," he said.

"This is the message of hope we are called to proclaim and embody in a world where self-centeredness, greed, violence and cynicism so often seem to choke the fragile growth of grace in people's hearts," he said.

The church, he said, must work in a society that "sometimes seems to have forgotten God and to resent even the most elementary demands of Christian morality." At the same time, the church's leaders and its pastors should also make it clear to people that the faith is more than a set of rules, he said.

"Perhaps we have lost sight of this: In a society where the church seems legalistic and 'institutional' to many people, our most urgent challenge is to communicate the joy born of faith and the experience of God's love," he said.

The pontiff pointed to the late Father Michael J. McGivney, founder of the Knights of Columbus, as a model of pastoral vision and zeal. His sainthood cause recently took a step forward at the Vatican.

Many of those in the cathedral said just seeing the pope inspired them.

"Watching him coming into the church -- his peace, serenity, the way he greets people, his whole manner of being -- says he is a man of God," said Sister Ann Kuhn, superior general of the Sisters of St. Joseph of St. Augustine, Fla.

Sister Kathrine Marie, a Sister of Life of New York, said the pope's presence was even more powerful than his words.

"What he does makes you want to be faithful," she said, "so that same light shines forth in you, as it does in him."

Pope departs on 'Shepherd One'

M. Egan of New York; Bishop William F. Murphy of Rockville Centre; Archbishop Pietro Sambi, apostolic nuncio to the U.S.; and Bishop Nicholas DiMarzio of Brooklyn, whose diocese includes the airport.

Also in attendance were New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg and Vice President Dick Cheney and his wife, Lynne.

"It has been a memorable week, and Pope Benedict XVI has stepped into the history of our country in a special way," Cheney said.

"You've encountered a nation facing many challenges, but with more blessings than any of us could number," he said. "You have seen a country where the torch of freedom, equality and tolerance will always be held high, a country where you — a herald of the Gospel of Jesus Christ — will always be welcome."

After pointing out that the pope was ordained a priest almost 57 years ago, Cheney said, "You might have found it hard to imagine then that you would stand before all humanity as a teacher, a statesman and a shepherd of more than a billion souls. That is what God has called you to do."

The pope said that one of the high points of his six-day trip to Washington and New York was visiting the United Nations to mark the 60th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, a document he discussed in his April 18 address to the General Assembly.

He also specifically mentioned his April 20 prayer at ground zero, saying it "will remain firmly etched in my memory."

A three-hour program of music and prayer reflecting the diverse ethnic makeup of the Brooklyn Diocese preceded the papal entourage's arrival around 8 p.m.

Participants recited the rosary in English, Polish, Italian, Tagalog and Korean. Attendees were encouraged to come in colorful costumes. Embroidered Guatemalan blouses and striped Polish circle skirts mixed with military uniforms and the elegant capes and feathered hats of the Knights of Columbus.

"It's great to have the opportunity to come see him," said Linda Amasiani, 42, of the Brooklyn Diocese's Nigerian Apostolate. "He's reaching all religious groups and ethnicities."

Four elementary-school-age children whose families are from Ecuador, Germany, Trinidad and Korea presented Pope Benedict with a replica of a stained-glass window from the Cathedral Basilica of St. James in Brooklyn.

"He ended by saying 'God bless America,' and that was just a beautiful moment at that point. In those words he expressed everything he felt for America and for the American people," said Auxiliary Bishop Dominick J. Lagonegro of New York.

The pope departed on the Alitalia Boeing 777 dubbed "Shepherd One," and landed at Rome's Ciampino airport around 10:30 a.m. (4:30 a.m. EDT) April 21.

'Justice will bring about peace'

Pope, at U.N., says no government or religion should limit human rights

BY CINDY WOODEN AND BENEDICTA CIPOLLA
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

UNITED NATIONS — Neither government nor religion has a right to change or limit human rights, because those rights flow from the dignity of each person created in God's image, Pope Benedict XVI said.

In his April 18 speech to the U.N. General Assembly, the pope insisted that human rights cannot be limited or rewritten on the basis of national interests or majority rule.

But he also said the role of religions is not to dictate government policy, but to help their members strive to find the truth, including the truth about the dignity of all people even if their religious views are different.

U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon welcomed the pope and met privately with him before the pope addressed the General Assembly.

In his public welcoming remarks, the U.N. leader said, "The United Nations is a secular institution, composed of 192 states. We have six official languages but no official religion. We do not have a chapel — though we do have a meditation room."

"But if you ask those of us who work for the United Nations what motivates us, many of us reply in a language of faith," he said. "We see what we do not only as a job, but as a mission. Indeed, mission is the word we use most often for our work around the world — from peace and security to development to human rights. Your Holiness, in so many ways, our mission unites us with yours."

The pope acknowledged that common ground not only in his speech, but also in a brief homage to U.N. staff members and peacekeepers who have lost their lives in the line of duty.

Before leaving U.N. headquarters, he stopped before the war-scarred U.N. flag that had flown outside the U.N. headquarters in Baghdad, Iraq, in 2003.

Placed above the words "Fallen in the cause of peace," the flag has become a memorial, particularly to Sergio Vieira de Mello, the U.N. envoy to Iraq who was killed in Baghdad in August 2003.

Before addressing the General Assembly, the pope signed a visitor's book, writing in Latin: "Erit opus iustitiae pax (Is. 32:17) 18.IV.2008 Benedictus XVI." The Latin quote from the Book of Isaiah is translated in the New American Bible as "Justice will bring about peace."

In his address to the General Assembly, the German-born Pope Benedict said he came to the United Nations as a sign of his esteem for the organization, founded after the devastation of World War II when several governments ignored the fact that human beings were created by God and that the basic principles of right and wrong are written in the heart of each person.

"In consequence," he said, "freedom and human dignity were grossly violated."

The pope, always a strong supporter of the United Nations and its efforts to avoid conflicts and end wars, insisted that when one country has a problem with another, it must not act unilaterally, but seek the assistance of the United Nations.

"This is all the more necessary at a time when we experience the obvious paradox of a multilateral consensus that continues to be in crisis because it is still subordinated to the decisions of a few, whereas the world's problems call for interventions in the form of collective action by the international community," he said.

As expected, Pope Benedict paid tribute to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted 60 years ago.

The pope said the document — proclaiming the equality of all people, the basic right to life and to freedom, liberty of conscience and the free practice of religion — was the result of "a convergence of different religious and cultural traditions."

The traditions, he said, were determined to ensure that concern for and protection of the human person was the center of attention in the workings of societies, governments and institutions.

"The rights recognized and expounded in the declaration apply to everyone by virtue of the common origin of the person, who remains the high point of God's creative design for the world and for history," the pope said.

"They are based on the natural law inscribed on human hearts and present in different cultures and civilizations," he said.

Pope Benedict said an attempt to deny that human rights have a foundation in the way God created human beings and that they are common to all people creates a real risk that they will be limited "in the name of different cultural, political, social and even religious outlooks."

The pope said it is essential that people and governments recognize they are not the creators of human rights and they cannot limit them.

Religious freedom is an essential human right, he said, and when exercised as a search for truth, religion can promote a broader recognition of human rights.

"A vision of life firmly anchored in the religious dimension can help to achieve this since recognition of the transcendent value of every man and woman favors conversion of heart, which then leads to a commitment to resist violence, terrorism and war and to promote justice and peace," the pope said.

Pope Benedict said interreligious dialogue contributes to global peace and the defense of human rights when it brings believers together in their search for truth.

The task of religions, he said, "is to propose a vision of faith not in terms of intolerance, discrimination and conflict, but in terms of complete respect for truth, coexistence, rights and reconciliation."

While religions have an obligation to promote recognition of human rights, they also must defend the rights of their members to bring the values of their faith to bear on the decisions they make as citizens.

"It is inconceivable, then, that believers should have to suppress a part of themselves — their faith — in order to be active citizens," he said. "It should never be necessary to deny God in order to enjoy one's rights."

The pope asked the United Nations and the world's governments to make special efforts to defend religious freedom in societies where extreme secularism tends to push believers out of the public sphere and where one religion has been adopted as the national religion and other believers suffer discrimination or oppression.

The pope also told the United Nations that upholding all human rights for all residents of a country is a measure of that country's progress in working for the common good.

In addition, he said, "the promotion of human rights remains the most effective strategy for eliminating inequalities between countries and social groups and for increasing security."

When dignity is attacked and when people live in hardship and despair, he said, they become "easy prey to the call to violence."

After speaking to the General Assembly, the pope met privately with its president and the president of the Security Council. Then he returned to the General Assembly hall, where he addressed members of the U.N. staff.

Pope preaches message of hope built

urged the Catholic Church in the United States to move past divisions and scandal toward a "new sense of unity and purpose."

It is time, he said, to "put aside all anger and contention" inside the church and embark on a fresh mission of evangelization in society.

Repeatedly during his April 15-20 stay in Washington and New York, he made it clear that he believed the "genuinely religious spirit" of the American people had not been extinguished and could be strengthened.

Tailoring his message to each group he met, Pope Benedict urged the people of the United States to resist the temptations and trends of modern society, maintaining their traditional values, defending human rights and reaching out with solidarity.

The Vatican billed the trip as a visit to the United Nations — particularly to help mark the 60th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights — and as a pastoral visit to the United States.

Pope Benedict spent three hours April 18 at the United Nations, addressing the General Assembly and U.N. staffers separately and holding private meetings with the organization's top officials.

He told the General Assembly that fundamental human rights "cannot be applied piecemeal" and cannot be denied or diminished because of "different cultural, political, social and even religious outlooks."

And, he said, when human rights are violated it creates a breeding ground for violence.

"Indeed, the victims of hardship and despair, whose human dignity is violated with impunity, become easy prey to the call to violence, and they can then become violators of peace," he said.

Hours before he left April 20, Pope Benedict celebrated an afternoon Mass in New York's Yankee Stadium.

"In this land of religious liberty," he said, "Catholics found freedom not only to practice their faith, but also to participate fully in civic life, bringing their deepest moral convictions to the public square and cooperating with their neighbors in shaping a vibrant, democratic society."

He urged U.S. Catholics "to move forward with firm resolve to use wisely the blessings of freedom in order to build a future of hope for coming generations."

"Throughout his entire pastoral visit, it was evident that the Holy Father has a great love for the Catholics of the United States, and that we have a great love for him," said Bishop Peter J. Jugis of Charlotte.

"Jesus told St. Peter, 'Feed my sheep,' and that is exactly what the Holy Father did for us — he nourished us with the love and the truth of Christ," said Bishop Jugis.

Meaning, freedom through Christ

Bishop Jugis was among the U.S. bishops to meet with Pope Benedict in Washington April 16. The pope told them secularism and materialism can influence the way people live out their faith, causing those who worship on Sundays to act contrary to church teaching the rest of the week.

Some people think they can pick and choose what they believe, the pope said.

"We've seen this emerge in an acute way in the scandal given by Catholics who promote an alleged right to abortion," he said.

While Pope Benedict carefully avoided appearances of taking sides in a U.S. election year, in his April 16 speech at the White House, he said it was important to preserve the traditional role of religion in American political and social life.

Religious values helped forge "the soul of the nation" and should continue to inspire Americans as they face complex political and ethical issues today, he said.

"Democracy can flourish, as your Founding Fathers realized, only when political leaders and those whom they represent are guided by truth and bring the wisdom born of firm moral principle to decisions affecting the life and future of the nation," Pope Benedict said before holding a private meeting with President George W. Bush.

The visit to the White House was the first official event on his calendar, and it coincided with his 81st birthday, when he heard dozens of versions of "Happy Birthday" sung in his honor.

of St. Pius X Church in Greensboro, attended the welcoming ceremony on the South Lawn of the White House.

"President Bush in his address stated, 'people usually spend their birthday with friends.' When he said that, I was struck by that which I already knew — despite all our shortcomings, the universal church has a huge friend in the Catholic Church in America," said Msgr. Marcaccio.

"Regardless of the relativism and materialism of our culture, there is tremendous good will among people of faith in America," he said. "The Holy Father's visit seems to have brought this sentiment of communion out of people this week."

Also during the trip, the Pope celebrated the third anniversary of his April 19, 2005, election.

That evening, at a boisterous rally with some 25,000 young people on the grounds of the New York archdiocesan seminary in Yonkers, Pope Benedict not only fueled the youths' enthusiasm, he warned them of the dangers of thinking freedom could be divorced from responsibilities and from the truth about God and human beings.

Pope Benedict offered a personal reflection on his own youth in Germany, which he said was "marred by a sinister regime that thought it had all the retreat into individualism” is seen in Christian denominations just as it is in the world at large.

The Christian faith is not a matter of picking and choosing what to believe and what to discard from the Scriptures and Christian tradition, he said.

Walking away from tradition has split denominations and makes it increasingly difficult for Christians to give a united witness to a world in search of meaning, the pope stated.

Upholding moral categories

Celebrating Mass April 17 at brand-new Nationals Park in Washington, the pope urged U.S. Catholics to renew their missionary energy at a time when U.S. society is at a moral crossroads.

He warned of “signs of a disturbing breakdown in the very foundations of society” and said people need the church’s message of hope and fidelity to the demands of the Gospel.

“The world needs this witness. Who can deny that the present moment is a crossroads, not only for the church in America but also for society as a whole?” he asked.

Brett Keeter, a parishioner of St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte, attended the papal Mass.

“I was very impressed by his knowledge of our country’s history and the respect he has for the unique role the United States has played as a defender of individual liberties throughout the years,” said Keeter. “However, he challenged everyone to remember that true freedom is found only in atotal surrender to Christ — not through materialism or many of the so-called ‘freedoms’ we think of today.”

Meeting with Catholic educators that evening, the pope said the Catholic identity of a school or university cannot be equated simply with the orthodoxy of course content, but is broader and means ensuring “that each and every aspect of your learning communities reverberate within the ecclesial life of faith.”

A primary role of the church and, therefore, of church educational institutions is “upholding the essential moral categories of right and wrong.”

Without that moral guidance, he said, “hope could only wither, giving way to cold pragmatic calculations of utility that render the person little more than a pawn on some ideological chess board.”

The need to uphold traditional moral values and to stress the fact that truth is not determined by individual preference or majority vote was not a message reserved for U.S. Catholics.

Dr. William Thierfelder, president of Belmont Abbey College, in Belmont, N.C., was in the second row during the meeting with educators.

“You could feel the Holy Spirit in the room. At that moment, everyone in the room was on board with what he was saying,” Thierfelder said.

“It was so powerful and so good, you almost can’t process it at the moment you hear it,” he said.

Building bridges

Meeting about 200 representatives of Islam, Jainism, Buddhism, Hinduism and Judaism in Washington April 17, he encouraged all people of faith “to persevere in their collaboration” to serve society and enrich public life.

The pope said it was not enough for religious leaders to get together to find ways to ensure that their people get along with each other.

“The broader purpose of dialogue is to discover the truth,” he said.

“By bearing witness to those moral truths which they hold in common with all men and women of good will, religious groups will exert a positive influence on the wider culture and inspire neighbors, co-workers and fellow citizens to join in the task of strengthening the ties of solidarity,” the pope said.

The pope met separately April 17 with the Jewish participants in the interreligious meeting to offer his best wishes for their upcoming celebration of Passover. The next afternoon he visited Park East Synagogue in New York.

There, the pope said he felt especially close to Jews on the eve of Passover as they “prepare to celebrate the great deeds of the Almighty and to sing the praises of him who has worked such wonders for his people.”

He was welcomed at the synagogue by Rabbi Arthur Schneier, 78, an Austrian-born Holocaust survivor, who called his historic visit “a reaffirmation of your outreach, good will and commitment to enhancing Jewish-Catholic relations.”

“As pope, one of his titles is ‘pontifex maximus’ — rendered from Latin as ‘bridge builder.’ I think his visit is building bridges among Catholics; among Christians and people of faith,” said Msgr. Marcaccio.

“The Holy Father’s meetings — not just the huge gatherings but those with political leaders, educational and faith leaders, and victims of abuse — are evidence of his desire and ability to build those bridges,” he said.

Msgr. Marcaccio recalled seeing the pope bless and kiss a baby in the crowd.

“In that sentimental snapshot, I saw him as St. Peter’s successor, the symbolic bridge from the apostolic age to the generation yet to be,” he said.

answers.” Nazism “banished God and thus became impervious to anything true and good,” he said.

When freedom disregards absolute truth, relegating it instead to the private sphere of the individual, relativism takes hold, he said.

Truth is neither an imposition nor a simple set of rules, Pope Benedict said. “Ultimately truth is a person: Jesus Christ.”

The pope also spoke about the dangers of individualism April 18 when he presided over an ecumenical prayer service. He said he was concerned that in a world marked by a greater sense of global unity and interdependence, the feeling of “fragmentation and a

Book helps Romanian Christians mark anniversary of communist takeover

BY VICTOR GAETAN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

BUCHAREST, Romania — Christians in Romania are marking the 60th anniversary of the country's communist takeover with resolve and a book commemorating their persecution.

"Sixty years ago, by law, the communists tried to destroy the church," recalled Archbishop Ioan Robu of Bucharest. "They confiscated our property, jailed our priests, closed our seminaries and schools, shuttered our printing operations, threatened to arrest — then expelled — the Holy See representative to Romania, and instituted an atheist ideology.

"Instead of burying us, the church is thriving today, but we remind ourselves constantly about what we lost," the archbishop said in the book's introduction.

As part of a commitment to remember the communists' suppression of religion starting in 1948, several Romanian Christian churches produced "The Martyrs of Christ in Romania Under the Communist Regime," on sale for the past 10 months.

The 812-page book is a joint project of the Romanian Orthodox Church, the Latin-rite Catholic Church and evangelical churches. It was financed by the Catholic St. Gerhard Foundation in Stuttgart, Germany.

Leaders of the Romanian Catholic Church, an Eastern rite, decided to continue research and postponed the inclusion of their martyrs until the publication of the next volume of the book.

The work includes the biographies of 135 of the thousands of Christians who gave their lives for their faith under the communist regime in Romania.

The first post-communist attempt to catalogue the bravery of Christian leaders in Romania, the book is the result of four years of research in Romanian and foreign archives. The research team included representatives from the various Christian churches.

Father Helmut Moll, a German historian, developed the criteria for martyrdom based on the Bible and Christian liturgical tradition.

The requirements were that the Christian had experienced a violent death, that persecutors were motivated by hatred of religion and Christianity, and that the martyrs accepted death as God's will.

Romanian martyrs — including bishops, priests, monks, nuns and laypeople — were executed, hanged, frozen, stabbed, buried alive, starved of food and water, and tortured in jails.

The martyrs died while captured or soon after being released from detention.

Archbishop Robu wrote in the preface to the book, "The acceptance of Christ, even with the price of one's life, has become a common legacy of Catholics, Orthodox and Protestants, and the documentation presented here proposed that we maintain this common heritage."

The issue of Christian martyrdom under communism has been especially contentious in Romania since the 2006 release of a report by the Presidential Commission for the Study of the Communist Dictatorship in Romania, known as the Tismaneanu Commission.

Commission President Vladimir Tismaneanu has come under attack for anti-Christian bias and for having an activist communist background.

The commission's report presents the Orthodox Church as a pillar of the secret police and the Communist Party. It ignores the murder of thousands of Christian clerics and believers under communism, the confiscation of church property and the destruction of churches.

In response to the Tismaneanu report, Latin- and Eastern-rite bishops have prepared summaries of the persecution of the Catholic Church under communism. This includes murder, ongoing harassment and the intimidation of Catholics as well as the destruction of churches.

The summaries will be compiled as a "report of the faithful" to cover the "unscientific, biased" gaps in the Tismaneanu report, said a priest familiar with the working draft.

We must take on greater roles for God

BY JEFF HENSLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

The 50 days of the Easter season allow us to appreciate, ponder and savor the reality of Jesus' resurrection.

Easter is truly the turning point of human history. Thinking about the meaning of God having power over all things, even death, is worthy of our full attention. This time also prepares us for the coming of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost, and this week's preparation is very specific.

Just before his Ascension into heaven, Jesus tells his disciples that they "will receive power when the Holy Spirit comes upon" them, and they "will be [his] witnesses in Jerusalem, throughout Judea and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth."

The Ephesians passage gives more definition to just what they will be proclaiming when Paul writes of "the surpassing greatness of his power for us who believe, in accord with the exercise of his great might, which he worked in Christ, raising him from the dead and seating him at his right hand in the heavens, far above every principality, authority, power, and dominion: ..."

Taking on this view of the world changed Jesus' disciples from their indecisive ways into men who traveled to the far corners of the world to tell others that Jesus had been raised from the dead.

But first they had to wait for the Holy Spirit and then be obedient to Jesus' command to proclaim this good news, that he had conquered death, and his Father had proclaimed him Lord.

When I first came to my adult faith three decades back, I experienced a profound reorientation of my life. Instructions in the Catholic faith, a Life in the Spirit Seminar, then service on my parish liturgy committee and in the pro-life movement, displaced the regular companionship of my unbelieving young adult friends.

New friendships with Christians and new activities filled my time and became my passion.

I still have those old friendships, but they ceased being my primary relationships, the ones that formed my values and view of the world, as my life became reoriented around the truth of the Resurrection.

It's been 34 years since what were for me pivotal times, the times of my own personal Pentecost. I have no regrets. Preparing for the coming of the Spirit is worthy of our best efforts.

Catholic students at Virginia Tech record CD for hope, healing

BY PAULINE HOVEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

BLACKSBURG, Va. — By noon on April 16, 2007, Bryan Schamus, a member of the Newman Community at Virginia Tech, knew that at least 22 people had been killed on campus.

He quickly gathered with other student leaders of the university's Catholic campus ministry to figure out how to respond to the tragedy, which would later become known as the deadliest school shooting in U.S. history. By the end of the day, 33 students and faculty, including the gunman, had died.

A Mass of healing at the Newman Center that evening "was jam-packed with maybe close to 200 people," Schamus recalled.

People of all faiths had gathered for mutual support, consolation and comfort. What participants found were uplifting, youthful voices singing about hope and love overcoming fear.

For Schamus, and all those involved in the project, the past year has been a journey of transformation culminating in the creation of a CD of those songs to be released April 16 in memory of the lives lost at Virginia Tech.

Called "Voices of Hope," the CD is a message of hope, faith and transformation.

"Instead of being victims, we're witnesses of the real power of God that helps us to stand up, to walk and to live," said Schamus, now a senior and director of the CD. "If there's any community in the world that needs to be at the cross right now, it's us."

Father John Grace, Virginia Tech's Catholic campus minister, couldn't agree more. "When I got here, I heard a lot of stories about what happened and the response of the Catholic community to that violence," said Father Grace, whom the Richmond Diocese assigned to the campus shortly after the tragedy.

"Over and over I heard from people their appreciation of the ability to gather together at Newman, and the meaningfulness and comfort people drew from the music at that gathering," he said.

Since the tragedy occurred in the midst of the Easter season, students chose appropriate songs that communicated love, hope and comfort.

"Given what they were facing, it was very, very powerful," Father Grace said. "And as I listened to the songs, it struck me that this is an important piece of their journey, and I thought it would be significant for other people too."

Two professional songwriters aided in the effort. One evening, Schamus sent an e-mail to songwriter David Kauffman, telling him they were singing his contemporary arrangement of Psalm 46, called "Be Still," every night, and what an impact it was having.

Kauffman, publisher of Good for the Soul Music, immediately sent 100 CDs to Schamus and asked if he could travel from his home in San Antonio to lead them in a night of prayer and song.

Then David Haas, a well-known writer of Catholic hymns, who wrote three of the songs selected for the CD, came to Virginia Tech to perform a one-night concert.

When Schamus asked if he could record their music, the songwriters supported him 100 percent.

"The response was unbelievable," he said. "All three publishers (GIA publications, OCP and Good for the Soul Music) of the 10 songs we recorded gave us royalties free, and they did it quickly and willingly and were excited to be a part of it."

In reliving the experience, Schamus himself had to come to terms with the tragedy.

"What I look at now is how we've all been given free will, we all make decisions," Schamus said. "The 'God moment' comes afterward when people rush in to help and to save others. For instance, I thought about what causes a rescue squad to keep pushing against a chained door to get through when they know there's someone with a gun on the other side?"

"And for us as a music ministry and as a Catholic group, we had free will in how we wanted to respond to this tragedy," said Schamus, who plans to pursue a graduate degree in pastoral ministries.

"We decided the answer is not to pretend it never happened but to take it head on," he said.

Even freshmen like Marie Volger, who was not yet a student at Virginia Tech at the time of the shootings, have experienced the impact.

"There's such a strong purpose in this CD, and the idea that no pit is so deep that God is not deeper still is very appropriate," said Volger, who plays piano on the CD and is a parishioner of Sacred Heart of Jesus Church in Winchester.

"There's been a deep sense of healing. The end result for me is an affirmation of the sense of community here," she said.

Traveling icon now in Charlotte

Our Lady of Charity blessed by Pope Benedict XVI

CHARLOTTE — An icon of Our Lady of Charity is now on display at St. Matthew Church in Charlotte.

Blessed by Pope Benedict XVI, the icon had been on display at St. Joseph Church in Kannapolis since February.

During a ceremony at the church April 5, Knights of Columbus Council 12167 presented the icon to Council 10852 of St. Matthew Church.

The framed print is one of three icons currently traveling throughout North Carolina as part of a yearlong Marian Hour of Prayer program sponsored by the Knights of Columbus.

"This Marian prayer program with an image of Our Lady of Charity is a graced opportunity to reflect on the virtue of charity and to make more widely known the beautiful teaching of 'Deus Caritas Est' ('God is Love'), in which Pope Benedict XVI explores the true nature of charity, based on love of God and love of neighbor," said Supreme Knight Carl Anderson in a letter to fellow Knights.

The icon first arrived at St. Joseph Church Feb. 18 and has been part of numerous prayer services and visited by thousands of people.

Typically, each council hosts the icon for a couple of weeks before passing it on to the next parish. The icon's stay at St. Joseph Church was longer than usual because of Lent.

"St. Joseph of Kannapolis was honored to be the first parish in North Carolina to host this magnificent icon on its great journey throughout the United States and the world," said Joe Ordoyne of Council 12167.

At the conclusion of the yearlong prayer program, a report on the total number of prayer services that were held and the approximate number of participants will be presented to Pope Benedict.

S.C. monks seek new support for abbey

The Trappist monks at Our Lady of Mepkin Abbey in South Carolina are discontinuing egg production and searching for a new way to support themselves. They stopped selling eggs after the People for Ethical Treatment of Animals criticized the monks' treatment of chickens.

could continue to make a living.

Suggestions range from growing agricultural products as diverse as bamboo, mushrooms, heirloom corn and wheat, organic vegetables, and beets to be used as an organic road de-icer to pursuing such nonagricultural ideas as licensing beer; book scanning (the process of converting physical books into electronic books) and establishing a public cemetery on the Mepkin property.

The abbey announced in December that it would begin phasing out its 56-year-old egg business, citing pressure from People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals over the treatment of chickens as one of the reasons.

Public protests and a threatened boycott by PETA that started in the summer of 2007 put unwanted pressure on the Trappist monks and interfered with their quiet life of prayer and work.

The end of the egg business meant the abbey had to find a new way to support itself. Sales averaging 9 million eggs a year have generated around $140,000, which is about 60 percent of the abbey's annual income, according to Abbot Stan Gumula.

Abbot Gumula said he was impressed with suggestions the panel generated.

"We hope to find a business that will respect the monastic tradition of working on the land and caring for the environment, and the advisory panel's ideas certainly meet these criteria," he said. "Our land is a wonderful resource, and ... the panel has come up with great ways for us to use it creatively and wisely."

Members of the panel agreed there should be an effort to find new products that can be sold locally so the monastery can maintain its strong connection with neighbors.

Mepkin's eggs have been available in Piggly Wiggly grocery stores for years. Since the abbey's establishment in 1949, the monks also have sold bread, flowers, timber, milk and beef cattle to support their way of life.

"The abbey has a lot of challenges, including an aging workforce and not a lot of working capital to fund a new operation. The abbey is a wonderful resource and it's a shame they're having to face this," said panel member Dennis Atwood, retired chief financial officer for the Diocese of Charleston.

Atwood said he thought the public cemetery idea was a good one. "There's obviously got to be a future demand for that kind of service and a lot of people are going to want traditional burials."

Msgr. James Carter, pastor of Christ Our King Church in Mount Pleasant, said any agricultural venture would need to take into account Mepkin's aging monks and existing resources.

The abbey also needs to consider how to maximize revenue that can be drawn from existing assets, according to Robert Macdonald, a retired museum director from New York who has been a close friend and consultant for the abbey for many years. He said the panel suggested the abbey increase the use of its conference center by businesses and other groups and look into increasing its retreat program.

Other suggestions included expanding the sale of existing abbey products such as fruitcakes and Drizzle, a syrup that can be used over desserts, meats and other dishes.

"The reality is that the abbey will probably be unable to make up the shortfall from the loss of the egg business solely through labor-intensive agricultural ventures," he said.

"The solutions to this situation will be varied. It's going to be a combination of saving money, finding new sources of revenue and increasing the income stream from current resources the abbey already has," he said.

Facing up to the abuse crisis

People of faith must help reform society, says pope

Sex and drugs and rock 'n' roll.

In some media accounts last week, Pope Benedict XVI blamed clergy sexual abuse of minors on the influence of those three all-American vices.

That's an easy — albeit incomplete — answer to the church's scandalous crisis. Neither is it exactly what the pope had in mind when he mentioned the breakdown of society contributing to the tragic molestation of thousands of minors by clergy.

That Pope Benedict's American apostolic journey would address the crisis which has consumed much of the church's energy over the past five-plus years was widely speculated.

Some expected a pro forma apology for the church's role in the abuse and its aftermath. Others feared he might shy away from the topic.

Rather, Pope Benedict faced it head-on, raising the issue with reporters during his flight to the U.S., in his address to the U.S. bishops and again during the open-air Mass in Washington.

At each venue, he called the abuse shameful.

And on April 17 the pope talked with and prayed with several victims of clergy sexual abuse from Boston, center of the current scandal. That event wasn't on the pope's official schedule, though many had both anticipated and hoped for it.

One victim said the symbolism was a step in the right direction. Still others said it was long overdue.

Pro-forma apology for the horror of the abuse? Hardly. Shy away from a face to face with victims? No way.

During his April 16 meeting with bishops, Pope Benedict acknowledged the assessment of Cardinal Francis George of Chicago that some bishops "badly handled" offending clergy and the aftermath.

Clergy who have "betrayed their priestly obligations and duties by such gravely immoral behavior" brought pain to the victims and to the church, Pope Benedict told the bishops.

"As you strive to eliminate this evil, ... you may be assured of the prayerful support of God's people throughout the world. ... It is your God-given responsibility as pastors to bind up the wounds caused by every breach of trust, to foster healing, to promote reconciliation and to reach out with loving concern to those so seriously wronged," he added.

Despite its missteps, the pope approved of the U.S. church's response, beginning in Dallas in 2002, to identify and discipline offending clergy, create safe environments for children, raise awareness of abuse in society and to foster healing of individuals and families shattered by abuse.

Not everyone was pleased, however. Some victims' groups picketed the pope's route demanding censure for bishops who they said were unresponsive to the crisis.

At the April 17 Mass at Nationals Park, 45,000 people heard the pope again acknowledge the pain of the abuse scandal.

"No words of mine could describe the pain and harm inflicted by such abuse," Pope Benedict said in his homily. "Nor," he said, "can I adequately describe the damage that has occurred within the community of the church."

But what about sex and drugs and rock 'n' roll?

In his messages the pope recognized the perils and promises of the larger society in which the church functions.

He said the question of abuse must be "addressed ... within the wider context of sexual mores," asking, "What does it mean to speak of child protection when pornography and violence can be viewed in so many homes through media?"

In other words, we're a society awash in images counter to Christian values.

The Catholic Church is hardly alone in facing the problem of sexual abuse. It exists in schools, sports, families and even other faiths. But while that doesn't diminish the church's shame, it highlights the challenge facing people of faith and values.

The pope is correct: Society has a role in forming values, perhaps especially sexual ones. It is a challenge for people of faith, those like the pope who have hope in Christ, to help reform society.

The pope and the president: Meetings public and private

Two leaders discuss long list of moral, religious considerations

In the movies, the white-robed pope and dark-suited president stand smiling, hands clasped, in front of the entrance to the Oval Office of the White House as it is revealed that all differences have been resolved and perfect harmony has been reached.

That is in the movies.

In reality, there was little expectation that Vatican opposition to the Iraq invasion repeatedly expressed by this pope and his predecessor would receive any greater acceptance in the waning nine months of the current administration.

In fact, the visit was preceded by a Vatican official's statement to make quite clear the visit of Pope Benedict XVI to President George W. Bush in no way indicated Vatican support of the U.S. administration's foreign policy.

"The pope and the Holy See cannot renounce with one visit all the Holy See's positions of rejecting war, always encouraging dialogue to smooth over disagreements and fostering cooperation," said Cardinal Renato Martino, a longtime Vatican diplomat.

The papal-presidential visit April 16 was more of an opportunity for the pope to take advantage of an audience to deliver the Gospel message highlighted by his concise presentation of freedom.

"The preservation of freedom calls for the cultivation of virtue, self-discipline, sacrifice for the common good and a sense of responsibility toward the less fortunate," he said.

What was said in the public ceremony may be more meaningful and longer lasting than what occurred in their private talk.

The pope's message might well have been directed at those who will become the nation's next leaders and to those who will elect them.

"Concern for the greater human family will continue to find expression in support for the patient efforts of international diplomacy to resolve conflicts and promote progress," said Pope Benedict.

And he had something to offer to the "I'm personally opposed but can't impose my morality" type of politician in this election year.

Freedom, he said "also demands the courage to engage in civic life and to bring one's deepest beliefs and values to reasoned public debate."

The event began with Bush welcoming Pope Benedict on the White House lawn with a statement that reflected several of Pope Benedict's most important ideas, including the dictatorship of relativism that threatens traditional values. The president drew applause when speaking of the sanctity of human life.

"We need your message that all human life is sacred," Bush said. But at almost the same time a half dozen blocks away, the U.S. Supreme Court issued its ruling rejecting the latest challenge to capital punishment.

The two met privately in the Oval Office for 20 minutes; a joint statement issued after the meeting said the two had discussed a long list of moral and religious considerations including the respect and dignity of the human person; the defense and promotion of life, matrimony and the family; the education of future generations; human rights and religious freedom; sustainable development and the struggle against poverty and pandemics.

It said the pope and president had devoted considerable time to the Middle East, a growing Vatican concern for the "precarious state" of the Christian community in Iraq, and expressed support for the sovereignty and independence of Lebanon.

That was a lot of ground to have been covered in only one-third of an hour.

Perhaps things were said in the Oval Office not often heard there: the denial that might makes right; a plea for a sharp reduction in military spending and using funds for peaceful development.

But the meeting did provide President Bush an opportunity, for it was he who once said he could look into eyes of an individual and see the soul of that person.

On April 16 he would have seen — and hopefully appreciated — the soul of a pope prophetically proclaiming peace.

The pope speaks to educators

They must engage students' intellect, encourage them to choose the good

If you mine the text of Pope Benedict XVI's speech to Catholic educators given at The Catholic University of America April 17, you will find concepts that provide a framework for appreciating how "integral" education is to the mission of the church. That mission, the pope said, is "to proclaim the good news."

A Catholic educational institution participates in the proclamation of the good news by being "a place to encounter the living God who, in Jesus Christ, reveals his transforming love and truth."

Truth, said Pope Benedict, "means more than knowledge: Knowing the truth leads us to discover the good."

Catholic schools at all levels go beyond the communication of knowledge to the discovery of what is good; hence the importance of educating the will. It is the will that chooses the good.

"While we have sought diligently to engage the intellect of our young, perhaps we have neglected the will," said Pope Benedict.

He sees a "reluctance" on the part of many modern people to entrust themselves to God. Entrusting oneself to God involves an act of the will, and this, he said, is a "complex phenomenon and one which I ponder continually."

When education fosters an encounter with the living God, it is hoped that the encounter will "elicit" in the student "a desire to grow in the knowledge and understanding of Christ and his teaching."

The word "understanding" is important here. While proclamation elicits a response of faith (I believe), explanation elicits a response of reason (I understand).

School liturgies, devotions and celebrations participate in the proclamation that leads to (or deepens) faith. Classroom lectures and library research participate in the explanation that leads to (or deepens) understanding.

It is important to bear in mind, remarked the pope, that "the truths of faith and of reason never contradict one another."

The Catholic identity of a school "is not dependent upon statistics," said the pope; it does not depend on the number of Catholic students or faculty. Nor can it "be equated simply with orthodoxy of course content."

Pope Benedict added that Catholic identity is really "a question of conviction"; it requires "that each and every aspect of your learning communities reverberates within the ecclesial life of faith."

That says something not explicitly spelled out about the tone, culture and dominant values of the place.

"Is the faith tangible in our

universities and schools?" he asked.

Expressing "profound gratitude" for all that is done at all levels of Catholic education in the United States, Pope Benedict then spoke directly to college and university faculty: "I wish to affirm the great value of academic freedom. In virtue of this freedom you are called to search for the truth wherever careful analysis of evidence leads you."

"Yet it is also the case that any appeal to the principle of academic freedom in order to justify positions that contradict the faith and the teaching of the church would obstruct or even betray the university's identity and mission; a mission at the heart of the church's 'munus docendi' (duty to teach) and not somehow autonomous or independent of it."

There will surely be disputes from time to time over issues of autonomy and independence, but this was a positive speech. Grateful acknowledgment was made for the "crucial role" Catholic education plays in the life of the church.

There was also a plea to religious brothers, sisters and priests not to abandon the school apostolate; and to all Catholic educators to give "public witness to the way of Christ" and to reach out especially to the poor.

The pope's visit: It was very Catholic!

Parish Diary

FATHER PETER
DALY
CNS COLUMNIST

In my parish there was an elderly lady who stopped on her way out of Mass to give me her evaluation of the liturgy. If she liked it she said, "That was Catholic!"

I was thrilled to attend the papal Mass in Washington, and my parishioners at St. John Vianney were very excited. We had 175 tickets distributed by lottery.

The sight lines from my seat in left field were poor. The canopy over the altar platform blocked my view of the jumbo TV. I could barely see the pope between the heads in front of me, but the sound system was great, and the choirs were just to my left.

The music was perfect. It was a mixture of styles and tempos. It ran the spectrum of liturgical music from Gospel to Gregorian chant, meringue to Mozart. Its variety reflected the diversity of the Catholic Church in America.

In Washington we have a large African-American Catholic community. The Gospel choir started us off with the great spiritual "Plenty Good Room in My Father's Kingdom." They were right. There was plenty good room for every race, nation, people and tongue.

The liturgy was basically Pentecost. There were lots of Holy Spirit songs, including several versions of "Veni Creator Spiritus" ("Come Holy Spirit"). I love that prayer, especially the part about "renewing the face of the earth."

The best rhythm was at the preparation of the gifts when the choir sang in Spanish "Ven Espiritu Santo" by Jaime Cortez. It had a complicated Afro-Caribbean-Latin drum beat. Even an aging Irishman like me could not sit still. I did my "white boy" dance.

As the bishops entered, the choir sang "Ave Verum" by Mozart. I always cry when I hear it. This time was no exception.

The pope entered the stadium to the great German hymn "Grosser Gott," known to us as "Holy God We Praise Thy Name." Everybody sang. With 45,000 voices, the Spirit was definitely "in the house."

After Communion, Placido Domingo sang "Panis Angelicus." The stadium fell silent. Priests around me welled up with tears. Even the pope stood and gave Domingo an ovation and blessing.

The pope struck exactly the right tone in his homily. He was encouraging and correcting, pastoral and probing. His mention of the victims of child abuse by the clergy was necessary. It was an important step toward healing an open wound.

The fact that he spoke in Spanish as well as English was an appropriate recognition that the U.S. Catholic Church is increasingly Latino.

When I walked out of the stadium, I was transformed. And I thought of that elderly lady from my first parish and said, "That was Catholic!"

Incomplete answer on Friday abstinence

In the April 18 issue of The Catholic News & Herald, Father James Dietzen responded to a question regarding Friday abstinence ("Friday again days of abstinence?"). His response was incomplete in terms of the Catholic Church's current discipline, and could very easily lead your readers into error.

Pope Paul VI's apostolic constitution on penance, "Paenitemini," issued in 1966, did indeed give greater freedom to individuals to choose, outside of the Lenten season, what form of penance they wished to perform. In 1983, the Code of Canon Law was promulgated by Pope John Paul II in which the current law of the church regarding days of penance was formally set out.

Three canons are most applicable:

— Can. 1249: All Christ's faithful are obliged by divine law, each in his or her own way, to do penance. However, so that all may be joined together in a certain common practice of penance, days of penance are prescribed.

On these days the faithful are in a special manner to devote themselves to prayer, to engage in works of piety and charity, and to deny themselves, by fulfilling their obligations more faithfully and especially by observing the fast and abstinence which the following canons prescribe.

— Can. 1250: The days and times of penance for the universal church are each Friday of the whole year and the season of Lent.

— Can. 1251: Abstinence from meat, or from some other food as determined by the Episcopal Conference, is to be observed on all Fridays, unless a solemnity should fall on a Friday. Abstinence and fasting are to be observed on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday.

As you can see, all Fridays are indeed days of penance and should be days of abstinence. Outside of Lent, however, the faithful are free to determine some other act of penance if they choose not to abstain from meat.

— Father John Putnam, judicial vicar and pastor of Sacred Heart Church, Salisbury

Pure Fashion values needed for men, also

I have been reading with interest the articles that have appeared in The Catholic News & Herald and local newspaper on the Pure Fashion show in Charlotte ("Models of the 'Great Designer,'" April 18). As a Catholic woman, I find it interesting that this movement seems to be limited to young women. I'm wondering if there is a similar program for young men. I haven't seen evidence of one anywhere

Letters to the Editor

but perhaps I've missed it.

The quote from the Charlotte chair of this program was telling and gave rise to my concern: "The seeds of modesty begin at home. It's never too early to start teaching our young girls the importance of living a life of dignity."

I agree that the teaching of all values is the responsibility of parents and should begin at home. But I strongly disagree that young girls are the only ones who need to be taught about "living a life of dignity."

From what I've observed as an adult over the last 10 to 15 years, young men could benefit from a similar message and program. In my view, integrating this message for young people, men and women, seems to be the healthiest approach.

Otherwise young women are continually singled out as those who need "help" or "correction" and this impacts their thinking as adults. That is an unrealistic and unjust burden for young women — as well as adult women.

We need to stop that thinking in its tracks.

—Eileen Crusan Marvin, N.C.

Zimbabwean church leaders: Opposition voters targeted for torture International intervention is needed, they say

BY BRONWEN DACHS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

CAPE TOWN, South Africa — Zimbabwe's Christian leaders have called for international intervention in the country's crisis, saying that those accused of voting for the opposition in March 29 elections are being tortured, abducted and murdered.

"We warn the world that if nothing is done to help the people of Zimbabwe from their predicament, we shall soon be witnessing genocide similar to that experienced in Kenya, Rwanda, Burundi and other hot spots in Africa and elsewhere," said the Zimbabwe Catholic Bishops' Conference, the Zimbabwe Council of Churches and the Evangelical Fellowship of Zimbabwe in an April 22 statement from the capital, Harare.

Noting that they recently "issued statements commending Zimbabweans for the generally peaceful and politically mature manner in which they conducted themselves before, during and soon after the elections," the leaders said recent reports from their churches throughout the country gave cause for alarm.

"Organized violence perpetrated against individuals, families and communities who are accused of campaigning or voting for the 'wrong' political party ... has been unleashed throughout the country, particularly in the countryside and in some high-density urban areas," they said.

"People are being abducted, tortured, humiliated by being asked to repeat slogans of the political party they are alleged not to support, ordered to attend mass meetings where they are told they voted for the 'wrong' candidate and should never repeat it in the runoff election for president, and, in some cases, people are murdered," they said.

The church leaders urged the people of Zimbabwe "to refuse to be used for a political party or other people's selfish end, especially where it concerns violence against other people, including those who hold different views from your own."

Commending Zimbabweans for turning out to vote and "for exercising your democratic right peacefully," the church leaders urged their members "to maintain and protect your dignity and your vote."

The church leaders expressed their "deep concern over the deteriorating political, security, economic and human rights situation in Zimbabwe," where official results of the presidential and parliamentary elections have yet to be released.

Movement for Democratic Change leader Morgan Tsvangirai says he won the presidential election and that his party took a majority of parliamentary seats.

President Robert Mugabe, 84, and his supporters are preparing for a runoff as well as challenging some of the parliamentary results.

The church leaders urged Zimbabwe's electoral commission "to release the true results" of the elections, noting that "the unprecedented delay in the publication of these results has caused anxiety, frustration, depression, suspicion and in some cases illness among the people of Zimbabwe" at home and abroad.

"A pall of despondency hangs over the nation, which finds itself in a crisis of expectations and governance. The nation is in a crisis, in limbo, and no real business is taking place anywhere as the nation waits," they said.

The church leaders appealed to the Southern African Development

Community, the African Union and the United Nations "to work toward arresting the deteriorating political and security situation in Zimbabwe."

The church leaders said that, "as the shepherds of the people," they were appealing for an "immediate end to political intimidation and retribution arising from how people are perceived to have voted."

Youth militia and military base camps "that have been set up in different parts of the country should be closed," they said.

"The deterioration in the humanitarian situation is plummeting at a frightful pace," the church leaders said, noting that the cost of living "has gone beyond the reach of the majority of our people."

Zimbabwe has the world's highest inflation rate — more than 100,000 percent — an unemployment rate of more than 80 percent and severe shortages of basic foods and fuel.

"There is widespread famine in most parts of the countryside on account of poor harvests and delays in the process of importing maize from neighboring countries. The shops are empty and basic foodstuffs are unavailable," said the leaders.

"Victims of organized torture who are ferried to (the) hospital find little solace as the hospitals have no drugs or medicines to treat them," they said.

Zimbabwe's Jesuits said that if the concepts of national sovereignty and noninterference "prevent the people of Africa from coming to the aid of their oppressed, abused, starved brothers and sisters, then we must question the value of such concepts, inherited from 19th-century colonial powers, and redefine them according to our" present needs.

"The real people of Africa, men, women and children, their welfare, health, education, work and shelter must be the center and focus of all political endeavors and (hold) the attention of statesmen," they said in their April 17 newsletter.

CHARLOTTE — Sunday, April 27, was a day of joyful celebration at Our Lady of Consolation Church and at the center of it all was a humble man in a brown habit.

This spring marked the 50th anniversary of his ordination to the priesthood for Capuchin Franciscan Father Jude Duffy.

The parish celebrated with a reception in the parish hall following the 11 a.m. Mass.

“As I look back, it doesn’t seem like 50 years,” said Father Duffy, who has been the pastor at Our Lady of Consolation Church in Charlotte since 1999.

SOLDIER SIBLINGS

Members of the Sosa family, Elvira (mother), and siblings Robert, Rosemary and Oscar pose at their home in Chicago in 2007. The three siblings serve in the U.S. military. Robert and his brother are in the Army and Rosemary is in the National Guard.

Catholic brothers, sister serve their country as another waits in wings

CHICAGO (CNS) — Elvira Sosa never saw herself as a military mother. No one in her family, or her husband Pedro's family, had ever served in uniform.

So when her middle son, Robert Sosa, told her he had enlisted in the Army four years ago, she didn't believe him at first. Then her older son, Oscar Sosa, decided to join his brother in the service. Most recently, her daughter, Rosemary Sosa, enlisted in the National Guard.

Even the baby of the family, 7-year-old Adrian, has announced he wants to be a soldier like his brothers and sister.

Elvira said she copes with the threat of her children being in harm's way by spending a lot of time in prayer. A parishioner at Nativity of the Blessed Virgin Mary Church in Chicago, the mother of five said, "I am a nervous wreck, but I have my faith."

Robert now is 23 and home after completing his active service. His unit spent a year stationed in Iraq, patrolling the streets of Sadr City in Baghdad.

"It had its ups and downs," he said. "It was an experience dealing with the people out there."

He was just returning from his overseas deployment when Oscar finished basic training. Oscar, now 27, enlisted two and a half years ago, while his brother was stationed in Iraq.

He is now stationed at Fort Drum, N.Y., after completing a 15-month stint in a region south of Baghdad, where he was a radio-telephone operator.

"I was going to sign up after high school," Oscar said while home on leave. "My parents convinced me not to, to try school. I signed up when I was 24."

When he did, he went with his parents' reluctant blessing.

"I never said, 'Don't do it,'" Elvira said. "It's a bad time to do it, but you never know what's going to happen."

While her sons were in Iraq, Elvira refused to watch the news on TV. But she did communicate regularly with both young men via a webcam, a camera connected to their computers.

"I would just leave the computer on, and whenever they buzzed, I'd go running," she said. "I'd always ask them if they remembered to bless themselves before they went out."

She also sent along holy cards, medals and rosaries, gifts from the extended family.

They apparently had an effect, because Oscar said he was never scared.

"I knew if I died I was going to heaven," he said.

Daughter Rosemary left for basic training in February. She's doing well, according to her mother.

Oscar is due to be discharged Sept. 11 of this year, but both he and Robert will remain eligible to be called up as part of the Army Reserve.

Now out of the service for nearly a year, Robert has found it difficult to adjust to life as a civilian, with no one telling him when to get up, when to work out or what to do. He hopes to start taking college classes soon, and get a job.

Senate passes bill that bars discrimination based on genetic testing

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A bill passed April 24 by the U.S. Senate barring health insurers and employers from discriminating against individuals because of their own or their family's genetic information has won praise from the Secretariat of Pro-Life Activities at the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

Deirdre McQuade, assistant director for policy and communications in the secretariat, said the Genetic Information Nondiscrimination Act will protect born and unborn children as well as children in the process of adoption.

"This bill helps protect and empower families to welcome and nurture some of the most vulnerable members of their family," McQuade said.

"The bill protects vulnerable populations from discrimination, whether those groups are ethnic, racial or gender-based, or based on their vulnerable size and location, namely in utero or in the lab somewhere," she said.

Approved unanimously, 95-0, in the Senate April 24, the legislation would prevent insurers from using genetic data to set premiums or determine enrollment eligibility for anyone.

The bill also bans the use of genetic information by employers in hiring, firing or promotion decisions.

The House version of the bill passed April 25, 2007, in a 420-3 vote.

Minor differences in the two bills must be reconciled before the legislation is sent to President George W. Bush for signing. The House was expected to vote again on a revised measure the week of April 28.

Lawmakers promoted the bill as a major advance in civil rights. Sponsors said that although hundreds of genetic tests are available some people may not take advantage of the exams out of fear the information would be used against them.

FROM THE VATICAN

Iranian Muslims, Vatican reps say faith is never against reason

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — While faith sometimes calls for belief in something that goes beyond a person's ability to understand, faith is never against reason, said participants in a Vatican-Iranian Catholic-Muslim dialogue.

Six representatives of Iran's Islamic Culture and Relations Organization met with a six-member delegation of the Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue in Rome April 28-30 to discuss the relationship between faith and reason.

The topic was a key theme in Pope Benedict XVI's September 2006 speech in Regensburg, Germany, in which he offended many Muslims by quoting a 14th-century Christian emperor's criticism of Islam and raised questions about the relationship between faith and reason in Islam.

The Vatican-Iranian dialogue participants met briefly with Pope Benedict April 30 after his general audience.

"Faith and reason are both gifts of God to mankind," said a final statement issued by the participants in the April meeting. "Faith and reason do not contradict each other, but faith might in some cases be above reason, but never against it." The participants also said, "Faith and reason are intrinsically nonviolent."

However, they acknowledged, both faith and reason sometimes have been manipulated to promote violence.

More generally, members of the dialogue pledged to continue working together to promote "genuine religiosity," spirituality and morality and to ensure their followers respect the religious symbols of the other.

And, they said, "religious traditions cannot be judged on the basis of a single verse or a passage present in their respective holy books."

The April meeting was the sixth encounter of the Vatican-Iranian dialogue group; the next meeting will be held in Tehran, Iran, in 2010.

All are invited to join. For more information on upcoming events, contact Irene Brunner at (704) 483-1210.

Vatican says Christians, Buddhists should work jointly on environment

VATICANCITY (CNS) — Christians and Buddhists should work together to promote respect for the earth and a safe, clean environment, said the Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue.

In a message for the feast of Vesakh, a commemoration of the major events in the life of Buddha, the Vatican council urged Christians and Buddhists to work together to contribute to the public debate concerning climate change and sustainable development.

The Vatican released the message April 29 as many Buddhist communities were preparing to celebrate Vesakh May 12-18.

The message, signed by the council's president, Cardinal Jean-Louis Tauran, and secretary, Archbishop Pier Luigi Celata, said Christian and Buddhist traditions respect creation and "have a common concern to promote care for the environment which we all share."

All people should be concerned with the future of the planet including "matters of grave concern" such as climate change, environmental preservation and sustainable development, it said.

Governments, industries, and grassroots groups have recognized that there are "ethical implications present in all economic and social development," and they are paying more attention to biodiversity, climate change and protecting the environment, it said.

While religious leaders have been adding their voices to the public debate, it said, Christians and Buddhists can work together to "be harbingers of hope for a clean, safe and harmonious world."

"Christianity and Buddhism have always upheld a great respect for nature and taught that we should be grateful stewards of the earth," said the message.

The only way to ensure efforts to protect the environment will never be sullied by human greed or hindered by special interests is to help people understand the relationship between "the divine Creator, creation and creatures."

The message asked Christians and Buddhists to collaborate more on environmental projects and remind people of their individual responsibility to care for the earth through public education and "our good example" as caring stewards.

The message said initiatives focusing on "recycling, energy conservation, the prevention of indiscriminate destruction of plant and animal life, and the protection of waterways" are some things that would "foster good will and promote cordial relationships among peoples."

Vatican dismisses newspaper's report that pope is sick

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican has dismissed a French newspaper report suggesting that Pope Benedict XVI is suffering from poor health.

"Certainly the pope is a man of 81 years, but he is well and is carrying out all his tasks, as everyone can see on live TV," Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, the Vatican spokesman, said April 26.

Father Lombardi said the newspaper report was all the more surprising because it came immediately after the pope's successful six-day trip to the United States.

An article published April 25 in Le Figaro said the pope looked fatigued at times during his U.S. visit. It's no secret, the newspaper said, that the pope has a "fragile heart."

Father Lombardi said the pope already had resumed his regular schedule, and is scheduled to make several more trips inside and outside Italy this year.

In July he will travel to Australia for World Youth Day.

Catholic Daughters Court 1759 celebrates 50th anniversary

SALISBURY — Catholic Daughters of the Americas Court 1759 of Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury recently gathered to celebrate the court's 50th anniversary.

The celebration was held at the home of Frances Edwards in Salisbury April 20. Representatives from courts in Greensboro, Statesville and Durham attended.

The court's 25th anniversary also had been held in Edwards' home, when her mother owned the house. Edwards said she has fond memories of seeing many women at her home working on Catholic Daughters projects.

During the 50th anniversary celebration, 50-year anniversary pins were presented to charter members Charlotte Taylor, Bobbi Womack, Thelma Boulus and Mary Frances Roueche.

Other 50-year members not in attendance were Charlotte Gardner, Ann Ramsey and Ruth Boone.

Mary Ann Grabasky, Catholic Daughters North Carolina state regent, presented the court with a set of crystal vases, along with a certificate commemorating the 50th year of the court.

Gerri Butler was also recognized as a long-time member, officer and past state regent of Catholic Daughters, who had traveled from Charlotte to represent Charlotte 1759 when it first was established.

Founded in 1903, the Catholic Daughters of the Americas is one of the largest national organizations of Catholic women in the world.

The Salisbury court reaches out to parishioners and the community, and has been a key supporter of the church through serving bereavement meals, hosting receptions, making handmade quilts for shut-ins and providing financial support for a variety of other parish projects.

Breaking ground at St. Mark Church

New church to be completed by June 2009

BY DAVID HAINS
SPECIAL TO
THE CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

HUNTERSVILLE — With ceremonial shovels in hand, Bishop Peter J. Jugis and clergy and laity of St. Mark Church in Huntersville broke ground for a new church.

The brief groundbreaking ceremony April 25 included a Scripture reading and remarks by Msgr. Richard Bellow, pastor, and Bishop Jugis.

"Let us pray that God will bring this construction to a successful completion and that his protection will keep those who work from injury," said the bishop.

Parishioners have been raising funds for the new church since 2004. The new $8-million church building will seat 1,400-1,600 people for Mass.

Currently a Mass is celebrated in the gymnasium of the Msgr. Joseph Kerin Family Life Center.

The parish of St. Mark was founded in 1997 and currently has more than 3,000 registered families.

The new church is scheduled to be completed by June 2009.

think of the good times."

Born in Kingston, N.Y., Jan. 31, 1927, Father Duffy felt the call to the priesthood early in life.

He first entered the Capuchin Franciscan order in Staunton, Va. in 1952.

"One of the great joys has been becoming a Capuchin Franciscan," said Father Duffy. "It is a loving fraternity that supports us in all the things that we do."

He was ordained to the priesthood March 1, 1958 at Immaculate Conception Church in Bronx, N.Y.

"Father Jude has been one of the most respected friars throughout our province," said Capuchin Franciscan Father Remo DiSalvatore, pastor of St. Thomas Aquinas Church in Charlotte.

"He broke a lot of barriers," said Father DiSalvatore, who joked about how Father Duffy was one of the first non-Italian friars in the province.

But in all seriousness he added, "They placed a lot of responsibility on his shoulders."

Father Duffy was elected as the first provincial minister of the newly formed Province of the Stigmata of St. Francis, at their first meeting in 1970.

"He is a great mentor because he shows you how to live the Gospel day by day, by his own actions," said Capuchin Brother Lombardo D'Auria, a post-novitiate friar in residence at the parish.

"He follows what St. Francis said, 'preach the gospel, if necessary use words,'" said Brother D'Auria.

The reception honoring his 50 years of priesthood included a musical performance by the parish Perpetual Hope Choir, liturgical dance and a presentation of gifts from parish committees and organizations.

"Father Jude has been the epitome of selflessness and humility," said Nanette Lide, youth minister and parishioner at Our Lady of Consolation Church.

"It is evidence of his calling and we at Our Lady of Consolation are truly grateful that he said 'yes' 50 years ago," she said.

Father Duffy is equally appreciative of his years at the parish.

"Serving here has been the pleasure of my life," he said. "The people are filled with faith."

His parishioners are grateful for his dedicated service.

"I am very proud to call him our shepherd," said Lide, "He has truly been a faithful servant."

75 percent of Americans surveyed read Bible passage in last year

Europe, the percentage of Bible readers ranged from a low of 20 percent in Spain to a high of 38 percent in Poland.

The study, commissioned by the Catholic Biblical Federation, began with 13,000 interviews in the United States, the United Kingdom, Germany, the Netherlands, France, Poland, Russia, Spain and Italy in November 2007.

The president of the federation, Italian Bishop Vincenzo Paglia of Terni, Narni and Amelia, presented the initial results of the survey April 28 during a Vatican press conference and said a second stage of the survey was being conducted in Argentina, South Africa, the Philippines and Australia.

The majority of people in the first nine countries — including 90 percent of Polish respondents — said the Bible is an important source of truth, but more than 50 percent of those interviewed in each country said the Bible was difficult to understand.

Bishop Paglia said, "Despite secularization and little openness to religious experience ... the sacred Scriptures are looked upon with great respect by everyone."

But the fact that the majority defined the Bible as difficult to understand challenges the church to help people learn to read it and see how it applies to their lives, particularly through improved homilies, the bishop said.

Luca Diotallevi, the Rome sociologist who coordinated the survey's working group, said that, while the study found the Bible to be important in the lives and cultures of those interviewed, there was a huge difference between Bible reading in the U.S. and in the other countries.

The most relevant factor in promoting

Bible reading, he said, was having a Bible in one's home; 93 percent of the U.S. residents interviewed said they had one and 56 percent said they had given someone a Bible as a gift.

He said he was struck particularly by the elements that seemed to predict a higher level of individual reading of and praying with the Scriptures; reading, reading books with a religious theme — including fiction — participating in religious services and being involved in a church-related group were the most predictive factors.

Praying often, believing the Bible contains important truths and identifying oneself as Christian did not correlate as closely with reports of actually reading the Bible on one's own, he said.

The differences, Diotallevi said, "indicated that reading the Bible is a habit one acquires through imitation," rather than simply conviction.

In the nine countries, he said, "the sense that God is near is anything but extinct and religious practice is anything but marginal."

"The Bible is seen by the vast majority of the population as a source of truth, as the source of a message that has something to do with one's life," he said.

The other interesting thing, he said, is that those who took a "fundamentalist" approach to the Bible, affirming that it is the "direct word of God" and must be taken literally, were not those who knew the Bible best.

And, Diotallevi said, the U.S. residents who reported reading the Bible most often did not have a significantly greater knowledge of its contents than those who did not read the Bible often.

Biblical knowledge was tested by asking these questions: Are the Gospels part of the Bible? Did Jesus write one of the books of the Bible? Was Paul or Moses a figure from the Old Testament? Which of the following wrote a Gospel: Luke? John? Paul? Peter?

Pope Benedict XVI talks with Julie Malik at the former site of the World Trade Center in New York April 20. Malik, was among four survivors of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks who spoke with the pope during a prayer service at Ground Zero.

Meeting pope at Ground Zero brings tears to Sept. 11 survivor

BY DENNIS SADOWSKI
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Looking into Pope Benedict XVI's eyes as she genuflected in front of him during his visit to the former World Trade Center site, Julie Malik knew the pope understood what she had experienced on a disastrous September morning more than six years ago.

"I remember thinking, 'You're here. You're here to help us. You took your time to understand,'" Malik said of the April 20 meeting.

Malik, 57, was one of four survivors of the Sept. 11, 2001, attack in lower Manhattan who met the pontiff during his visit to Ground Zero. Four rescue workers and 16 people who lost family members in the disaster also met the pope at the site.

"There's one word I can think of to describe (the meeting) and that is 'amazing,'" Malik said. "His eyes are so penetrating. He just stares in your eyes."

Meeting Pope Benedict came as a surprise to Malik, a member of the Church of the Incarnation in New York's Washington Heights neighborhood. Her pastor, Msgr. Gabriel La Paz, had written to the Archdiocese of New York telling them she had survived the disaster.

Even so, when the call came to her home from the archdiocese, Malik said she thought it was someone playing a joke.

"Then they told me I was going to meet the pope," she said. "I said, 'Uh huh. I'm going to meet the man? Get out of town.'"

After the pope left the site, Malik looked at two of the other survivors: a woman she knew from another New York parish and a man who worked in the Pentagon not far from where a jetliner also crashed on the morning of Sept. 11.

"We turned and looked at each other. I think it was the fact that we were all survivors, we all started hugging and crying. It's a different feeling. We were there (when it happened)," she said.

Sept. 11, 2001, began like every other workday for Malik. She met a co-worker outside the south tower and they made their way to the 91st floor offices of the engineering firm Washington Group International.

She was preparing for her day as the receptionist in the elevator lobby when other workers came running toward her saying something had happened at the north tower.

No one knew it at the time, but the first jet had crashed into the tower. She looked out a window herself.

"I remember thinking 'This isn't a mistake. This is scary,'" Malik said.

Although she doesn't specifically recall what happened in the next few moments, Malik said co-workers later told her she was giving them instructions to get their personal items and get out of the building.

She was on the ground when the second plane hit with a thunderous roar just below her firm's offices. Not all of her co-workers survived.

She left the area quickly, long before either building collapsed.

Malik said meeting the pope was important to her healing, especially because she was laid off from the engineering firm last fall after more than 20 years on the job. She now works for a company in New York's garment district.

"People forget we were there," she said. "Yes, families lost someone and I don't mean to demean that, but we were there too. We lost friends too."

Pope says trip to U.S. was opportunity to give, receive hope, faith

than sin and death, animated a moment filled with emotion, which I passed in silence in the abyss of Ground Zero, where I lighted a candle, praying for all the victims of that terrible tragedy," the pope said.

The pope began his general audience by publicly thanking the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops and President George W. Bush for inviting him, and all those who greeted him with affection and offered prayers for the success of his visit.

Particularly when celebrating his third anniversary as pope with an April 19 Mass in St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York, he said "it was a moving moment in which I experienced in a tangible way all of the support of the church for my ministry."

Addressing the 20,000 people who had gathered in St. Peter's Square for the audience, the pope said he set out on the trip "to confirm Catholics in the faith, to renew and increase brotherhood with all Christians and to proclaim to all the message of Christ our hope."

Speaking in German without his prepared text, the pope said that everywhere he went in the United States "I was able to experience the fact that the faith is alive, that Christ is there today among the people, that he shows them the way and helps them to build the present as well as the future."

The pope told the German speakers that God gave him an opportunity to try to strengthen the faith of others, "but at the same time, I was strengthened and came back strengthened."

In his main audience talk, Pope Benedict said that the United States, from its founding, was built "on the foundation of a felicitous joining of religious, ethical and political principles, which still today constitutes a valid example of healthy secularity."

The United States, he said, is a place "where the religious dimension in all its variety is not only tolerated, but is valued as the spirit of the nation and as the fundamental guarantee of human rights and responsibilities."

Modern life and global realities continue to challenge the country, he said, and the Catholic Church has an obligation to offer its voice in order to help citizens build a society worthy of the human person and one that uses its resources to help others.

The timing of the trip, he said, was chosen to help celebrate the bicentennials of four archdioceses in the United States: New York, Boston, Philadelphia and Louisville, Ky.

They were erected from the Baltimore Diocese, the nation's first diocese, which was elevated to an archdiocese in the same year, 1808.

"The original small flock has developed enormously, enriching itself with the faith and traditions of the successive influx of immigrants. To that church, which now faces the challenges of the present, I had the joy of proclaiming again Christ, our hope, yesterday, today and forever," he said.

Praising the zeal of the bishops and priests who have led U.S. Catholics over the years and "the fervor and generosity of its faithful," Pope Benedict said the Gospel and Christian values — particularly the value of human life and the centrality of the traditional family — must be strengthened in order to face new moral, ethical and political challenges.

As he did throughout his trip, the pope also spoke at his audience about the clergy sex abuse scandal that rocked the U.S. church.

Pope Benedict XVI waves to the faithful as he arrives for his weekly general audience in St. Peter's Square at the Vatican April 30. The pope said his April 15-20 visit to the United Nations and the United States was an opportunity to give and to receive a witness to the power of hope and faith.

"Thinking of the painful affair of the abuse of minors committed by ordained ministers, I wanted to express my closeness to the bishops, encouraging them in their commitment to bind up the wounds and to reinforce relations with their priests," he said.

Pope Benedict said the "multicultural vocation" of the United States and the active presence of a wide variety of Christian communities and other religions gave him an opportunity to meet with religious leaders to promote closer cooperation among Christians and a dialogue to strengthen peace and religious values with other believers.

At the United Nations, he said, he wanted to help celebrate the 60th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and confirm its enduring value precisely because it is based on "the dignity of the human person, created by God in his image and likeness, in order to cooperate with him in his plan for life and for peace."

Respect for human rights and peace can flourish only where there is justice, "an ethical order valid for all times and all peoples," which can be summarized with Jesus' phrase, "Do unto others as you would have them do unto you."

Father Eric Kowalski, pastor of Holy Angels Church in Mount Airy, celebrates the Mass in the extraordinary form. Assisting is Doyle Caudle, a convert to Catholicism. During the Latin-language liturgy, the altar is against the wall at the back of the sanctuary and the priest and people face the same direction in worship.

Mass at his parish Jan. 5.

"When the Holy Father released the 'motu proprio,' that's when it really began," said Father Kowalski.

In his July 2007 apostolic letter, "Summorum Pontificum," Pope Benedict XVI eased restrictions on the use of the 1962 Roman Missal, which was standard before the new Order of the Mass was introduced in 1970.

The papal decree was issued "motu proprio," a term that reflects the pope's personal initiative in the matter.

The Mass from the Roman Missal in use since 1970 remains the ordinary form of the Mass.

After inserting copies of the "motu proprio" and the pope's letter to the bishops in his parish bulletin, Father Kowalski opened the issue up to his parish and hosted a general meeting to talk about the Mass in the extraordinary form.

"The people were very open and very interested," he said of the approximately 50 parishioners who came to the meeting.

Soon he began offering refresher seminars for those who wanted to work on Latin pronunciation and familiarize themselves with the prayers.

Now, Father Kowalski celebrates the Mass in extraordinary form every Saturday at 6:30 p.m.

"It fits very seamlessly into our liturgical life here," he said.

Parishes now offering Mass in extraordinary form in diocese

By adding the Latin-language Mass to the weekend Mass schedule, it fulfills the Sunday obligation for the 40 to 60 parishioners who typically attend.

In terms of execution, the extraordinary form of the Mass requires a great deal of preparation on the part of the priest.

"It's a bit intimidating at first because you want to do it with attention and devotion and you want to offer it properly," said Father Kowalski, who typically spends about two hours a week preparing for the liturgy.

"It's become a great joy for me," he added. "It really has deepened my own spiritual growth and faith."

Another church in the diocese where the Mass in the extraordinary form is now offered is St. Joseph Church in Asheboro.

For Father Christopher Davis, pastor of St. Joseph Church, the Latin-language Mass was particularly appealing.

"I had studied renaissance and medieval music," said Father Davis. "It was right up my alley and part of my own personal spirituality."

Father Davis celebrates the Mass at his parish every Wednesday at 7 p.m.

One of the things he enjoys most is the structure and silence of the extraordinary form.

"It allows time for contemplative prayer," he said. "You really get that sense of reverential silence upon entering into the mystery of the Eucharist."

He also mentioned the noticeable similarities between the two forms of the Mass.

"To me it's been beautiful to see how much of the 'new Mass' is still retained from the 'old Mass,'" he said.

"You can see the progression of what the church has now and what we can go back to," said Father Davis.

In his letter, Pope Benedict stated, "There is no contradiction between the two editions of the Roman Missal."

"In the history of the liturgy there is growth and progress, but no rupture," he said. "What earlier generations held as sacred remains sacred and great for us, too, and it cannot be all of a sudden entirely forbidden or even considered harmful."

The pope noted, however, that the ordinary form of the Mass must not be neglected.

"Needless to say, in order to experience full communion, also the priests of the communities adhering to the former usage cannot, as a matter of principle, exclude celebrating according to the new books," the pope said.

"The total exclusion of the new rite would not in fact be consistent with the recognition of its value and holiness," he added.

Anyone who remembers the pre-Vatican II form may notice a few changes.

Now, the congregation is more involved in dialogue and responses and the readings are said in English.

"It's just easier for everyone," said Father Davis, who noted that all of the changes have been approved by Pope Benedict.

Father Eric Kowalski, pastor of Holy Angels Church in Mount Airy, follows Doyle Caudle in the exit recessional during the extraordinary form of the Mass.

Later this month, Father Timothy Reid, pastor of St. Ann Church in Charlotte, will begin celebrating the Mass in extraordinary form at his parish.

Father Reid will offer an introduction to the extraordinary form at St. Ann Church on Wednesday, May 21 at 7 p.m. He will begin celebrating the Mass in extraordinary form on Saturdays at 8 a.m., beginning May 31.

Book argues that 'unnecessary secrecy' hurts everyone in church

REVIEWED BY DAVID GIBSON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

"Nothing to Hide" is a book about "unnecessary secrecy in the conduct of church affairs," written by Russell Shaw, a longtime Catholic writer and church social-communications expert.

Shaw believes that, with the exception of the seal of the confessional, "the presumption in the church's day-in, day-out life should favor openness and accountability." In the church, "the burden of proof should rest with those who advocate secrecy in any particular case," Shaw says.

Yet, what concerns him is not "legitimate secrecy of the kind required to protect confidential records and people's reputations." Rather, he is "concerned with the stifling, deadening misuse of secrecy that does immense injury to communion and community in the church."

Shaw appears to write in two modes here: as a historian and as a commentator on church affairs. The second mode shouldn't surprise anyone. Shaw contributes frequent commentary and opinion to the religious press. But, for my money, this book is at its best when Shaw presents the recent history of church social communications; his historical analysis should engage any reader.

Let me point particularly to Chapters 2 and 3 where Shaw investigates secrecy's ebb and flow in the handling of information by church leaders, especially from the time of the First Vatican Council (1869-70) up to our current decade, punctuated as it has been in the U.S. by the clergy sex abuse crisis.

Shaw became a top communications official for the U.S. bishops in 1969. The Second Vatican Council in the mid-1960s "generated enormous journalistic interest in the church," he recalls.

Yet, in his new position he found that "the relationship between the bishops and the media appeared headed for an all-time low." The reasons why make for a compelling reading.

In "Nothing to Hide," Shaw states that he writes as "a conservative Catholic" committed to his church's welfare and convinced that "the abuse of secrecy is bad for it."

Shaw informs readers, however, that many fellow conservatives appear not to share his concern about church secrecy. His writing, he also notes, incorporates "many anecdotes," which "add up to a disturbing picture."

I felt, indeed, that many anecdotes he selected to illustrate his concerns for the church had a distinctly conservative flavor themselves.

"Nothing to Hide" addresses not only secrecy, but what Shaw calls its "cousins." They include "stonewalling, happy talk, deception, failure to consult, the de facto suppression of public opinion, the rejection of accountability, the repudiation of shared responsibility on clericalist grounds."

Shaw is clearly concerned about clericalism. He thinks that "for the clericalist culture, secrecy was the only conceivable response" when the clergy sex abuse crisis erupted; but secrecy "allowed a serious problem to become a disaster for abuse victims, for innocent priests who found themselves tarred with the same brush as their guilty brothers, for confused, frightened bishops and eventually for the whole church."

Special aspects of contemporary social communications arise quite naturally in the course of this book. I found something Shaw said about name-calling of interest, though briefly mentioned.

I've noticed in my own work as a church communicator that name-calling, in certain quarters on both left and right in the church, seems to have come into vogue as a means of dismissing points of view one doesn't share.

Shaw mentions name-calling when discussing Internet blogs. He says, "Every blogger is free to say very nearly whatever he wants, which often means questioning the motives of ideological opponents and calling them names." He suggests this isn't healthy or helpful for the church.

Secrecy is of concern well beyond the church. It is hard nowadays not to notice how often reporters ferret out and reveal information that some institution or other hoped to keep private.

My question, then: To what extent does secrecy even remain an option?

That question receives a response when Shaw quotes a letter from an elderly bishop who, speaking of the church's sex abuse crisis, told him that "when the dam of secrecy finally broke — as it always will — the whole church suffered for its lack of candor."

The bishop said, "More scandals come from attempting to control access to truth than ever came from honesty and openness."

Gibson was the founding editor of Origins, Catholic News Service's documentary service. He retired in 2007 after holding that post for 36 years.

God's spirit can reshape landscapes

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

In April of 1994, a large and powerful tornado ripped through my hometown and the house where I had grown up, forcing my parents to take shelter in a stairway closet while the roof above them was lifted free of the structure and the nearby garage was torn from its concrete slab.

It also tore through the thick stand of mature pecan trees that for decades had divided our property from the neighbors', marking a clear path, making visible what had been previously hidden from view and changing the landscape forever.

The Hebrew Scriptures often relied on the metaphor of wind to signify the appearance of God in this same way. It was with a driving wind that Yahweh parted the waters of the Red Sea and opened up the path to the Promised Land for Israel. And while no rooftops were blown away in Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost, the changes wrought by that tempest were profound. People of all nations were able to hear of the mighty acts of God in their own language.

The previous barriers of religion, language and ethnicity proved to be no match for the "driving wind" of the Spirit, and centuries-old barriers between Jew and Gentile would become obsolete in the wake of its power.

For those first disciples of Jesus, the "landscape" of their world was changed forever as they, in turn, were empowered to carry the Gospel of Jesus Christ to all parts of the known world.

In our world today, global telecommunications and rapid travel have done away with geographic obstacles of distance that were previously insurmountable — and yet in an effort to protect our own "landscapes," we allow barriers to remain among one another, even within our own parishes and neighborhoods.

Fear of change and anxieties about letting those who are "different" into our world occupy our energies and sap our resources, drowning out the declaration of the mighty works of God in our midst.

The psalmist declares that when God sends out his Spirit, the "face of the earth" will be renewed. It is an open invitation to allow our landscape to be changed, through the power of his Spirit.

Questions:

What recent changes have threatened the comfort of your own personal "landscape"? In what way can you welcome these changes as evidence of the movement of God's Spirit?

Pope says music can bring hope to wounded world

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Music can bring hope to a wounded humanity, Pope Benedict XVI said.

At the end of an evening concert held in his honor April 24 to mark the third anniversary of the start of his pontificate, Pope Benedict said there is "a mysterious and deep kinship between music and hope, between song and eternal life."

The musical arts, therefore, have enormous spiritual value and are called to "instill hope in the human spirit so scarred and at times wounded by earthly life," he said.

Milan's Giuseppe Verdi symphony orchestra and chorus performed works by Johannes Brahms, Ludwig van Beethoven and Luciano Berio in the Vatican's Paul VI hall to a large audience that included the pope's elder brother, Msgr. Georg Ratzinger.

Italy's President Giorgio Napolitano, who sat next to the pope during the performance, offered the concert to the pope as a gift.

Pope Benedict told the audience the joy music and song bring is "a constant invitation to the faithful and people of good will to dedicate themselves to offer humanity a future rich with hope."

Any "authentic art" is just like prayer and never represents escapism from reality, he said.

Pope Benedict XVI and Italy's President Giorgio Napolitano attend a concert marking the third anniversary of the pontiff's election at the Vatican April 24.

Rather the arts, like prayer, prompt people to improve the world and cultivate it so that it can bear the fruits of peace and goodness, he said.

Pope Benedict praised Italy's rich cultural and artistic heritage, urging the country to be an example to the rest of the world.

Young people need to learn about "authentic beauty" and have the opportunity to let art "refine their soul and guide them toward the building of a world that is open to spiritual ideals."

Web site chronicles Catholic high school days from long ago

BY BENEDICTA CIPOLLA
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK — If you're a 1943 graduate of Immaculate Conception Academy in Davenport, Iowa, and you lost your class photo, you're in luck.

Rita Piro has a copy.

In March, Piro launched catholicschooldays.com, a Web site documenting U.S. Catholic high schools from about 1900 to the present day.

The bulk of the site is devoted to memorabilia from schools that have closed, like yearbooks, newspaper articles and vintage photographs.

Piro came up with the idea in 2007 after writing a book on the history of her alma mater, the Mary Louis Academy in Jamaica Estates, N.Y., where she chairs the foreign languages department.

"What has struck me the most is that people have all had the same reaction: Their experience has been so different from what is portrayed," she said.

"Catholic school was such an important thing, and they'll say, 'If it weren't for them I wouldn't be the person I am,'" said Piro.

She said she has listed every Catholic high school that existed in 1965, and about 90 percent of those before 1965.

Schools currently in operation have their own section, with links to Web sites and Wikipedia entries.

The "Vintage News and Photos" section includes artifacts from schools both open and closed.

"Nun Better" offers information on female congregations and their habits, and "The Catholic Alphabet" features Latin phrases and Catholic school prayers.

Piro pored through diocesan records, church archives and local newspapers for most of her content.

Examples of her sleuthing include a 1960 Associated Press story headlined "Catholic School Curbs Youths Who 'Go Steady'" and a 1928 article on St. Benedict's Prep School of Newark, N.J., winning the Catholic school football championship.

Piro does not accept advertising, preferring to pay for Web hosting and other expenses herself.

She trolls eBay daily for yearbooks, class rings and other artifacts, even hitting upon an 1898 school newspaper from Roman Catholic High in Philadelphia.

As the site has picked up traffic, with more than 34,000 visitors since its debut March 24, Catholic school alumni have sent in contributions, which Piro photographs or scans and then posts. Some also send in historical information and personal reflections.

Piro said she has received the most material from Pennsylvania and Ohio, with Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, New York, California, Texas, West Virginia and Michigan also making a strong showing.

"They say nostalgia kicks in around 50, 55, so you have a lot of boomers surfing the net," said Piro.

"I have people telling me, 'I put in the name of my high school, and this site came up.' They're happy to know the name of their school is somewhere for the record," she said.

Editor's note: Those with material to contribute may e-mail Piro at oripier@aol.com.

ARCHIVAL ANECDOTA

For the month of May, here are some historical facts about Archbishop John Francis Donoghue, who was the second bishop of the Diocese of Charlotte.

ARCHIVE PHOTO

Bishop Michael J. Begley (left), the first bishop of Charlotte, welcomes then-Bishop-elect (now Archbishop) John F. Donoghue to the Diocese of Charlotte in this November 1984 photograph.

Biographical facts

- Born Aug. 9, 1928 in Washington, D.C.
- Ordained June 4, 1955 at St. Matthew Cathedral in Washington, D.C.
- Consecrated bishop of Charlotte Dec. 18, 1984
- Installed as archbishop of Atlanta Aug. 19, 1993
- Retired Dec. 9, 2004

During his time as bishop of Charlotte

- The number of Catholics in the diocese grew from 70,000 to 94,000, and 24 parishes and missions were added;
- The first and only Charlotte Diocesan Synod was held September 1986-May 1987;
- The Catholic schools in Mecklenburg County underwent regionalization, and MACS (Mecklenburg Area Catholic Schools) was created;
- The Catholic Conference Center in Hickory was constructed;
- St. Lawrence Church in Asheville was elevated to rank of minor basilica.

Coat of arms as bishop of Charlotte

Motto: "To Live in Christ Jesus" (adapted from Philippians 1:21)

Shield: Celtic cross honoring the patron saint of Charlotte cathedral, St. Patrick; crown honoring Queen Charlotte; white cross with fleur-de-lis at each end honoring the bishop's namesake, St. John Vianney, and Mary, the mother of Jesus; ermine on the shield honors Bishop Donoghue's long association with Cardinal Patrick O'Boyle, former archbishop of Washington, D.C.

Interesting facts

Archbishop Donoghue promoted eucharistic adoration wherever he went and, under his watch, perpetual adoration began in the Diocese of Charlotte. It first started at St. Lawrence Church in Asheville, following at St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte.

As archbishop of Atlanta, he practiced what he preached by participating in perpetual adoration at the cathedral every Thursday at 1 a.m.

Perspectives

A collection of columns, editorials and viewpoints

The pope's transforming message of hope

Holy Father reawakens us to realities of faith, God's plan

It has been noted that Pope Benedict XVI has profound respect for the American order. Here's a country that is widely religious and yet respectful of the separation of church and state.

But he also sees a shortcoming:

"Perhaps America's brand of secularism poses a particular problem: It allows for professing belief in God and respects the public role of religion and the churches, but at the same time it can subtly reduce religious belief to a lowest common denominator. Faith becomes a passive acceptance that certain things 'out there' are true, but without practical relevance for everyday life."

The antidote is not to have religion just be a generalized bromide but to be premised upon a full understanding of how nothing in life can be truly divorced from God the Creator and his saving plan.

In other words, faith is not an irrelevancy. It is life itself. What does that practically mean?

1. Being Catholic requires an interior conversion, a submission to Christ. To "think with the church" is neither to memorize dogma in a superficial way nor pick and choose among Catholic beliefs as if they were a political party platform.

Here, the church must be a more regular and engaging teacher proposing with charity a fuller understanding of the magisterium. More than a 15-minute homiletic reflection upon the Scripture reading is required.

Reading groups, a vibrant parish lecture series and parish-based social outreach could all help.

2. While it's always important for a culture to try to have its civil law reflect natural law principles, Catholics for too long have directed their efforts toward changing the membership on the Supreme Court or amending this statute or another as its primary mission.

Overruling Roe v. Wade, while fully warranted under the law of the original Constitution, saves not a single life.

Lives are saved when the beauty of sexual intimacy within marriage is taught, when motherhood is affirmed, when parishes are prepared to openly and warmly support a woman facing the still real cultural stigma of giving birth without marriage, or when the economic needs of a single mother are addressed generously.

When the Gospel is really put into choosing life in a concrete and personal sense, the "dictatorship of relativism" — that argues that men have the power to redefine life — is proven false.

3. "Much remains to be done, particularly on the level of preaching and catechesis in parishes and schools, if the new evangelization is to bear fruit for the renewal of ecclesial life in America."

Yes, yes, yes. Catholic elementary schools still remain the best hope for extending the teaching of the church as a way of life beyond the liturgy.

It is said that without a presence of religious sisters, our parochial schools cannot be sustained, but that overlooks resources both economic and human. The U.S. Supreme Court has long eliminated any constitutional objection to school vouchers.

Where is the nationwide Catholic movement to demand that public resources be allocated to parents directly rather than devoted to the monopoly support of the secularizing public school?

And in terms of human resource, we are an aging population with many of us nearing retirement but still very much wanting to stay in service to our fellow man. How wonderful it would be if Catholic seniors were given multiple opportunities by their parishes to volunteer their time to teach in Catholic schools. As I see it, this would give us one of the finest faculties in the land and in the process strengthen the intergenerational family.

Thank you, Holy Father, for coming to America, reawakening us to the possibilities — no, the practical realities — of a faith-filled hope.

Values for boys, girls

As chairwoman of Pure Fashion in Charlotte, I strongly agree with the April 25 letter to the editor ("Pure Fashion values needed for men, also") that young girls are not the only ones who need to be taught the importance of living lives of dignity — this message is universal and applies to young and old, male and female.

While the Pure Fashion formation program is designed for and focused on young women, the recent fashion show was attended by a wide cross-section of interested individuals from the Charlotte community. Yet, Pure Fashion is not meant to be the answer to everything. It is only a catalyst to address the issue of immodesty in our culture.

Pure Fashion empowers young women and teaches them how to spread

Pope Benedict addresses the nations

Human rights, dignity must be respected

Standing before representatives of nearly every country on earth gathered in the General Assembly Hall of the United Nations, Pope Benedict XVI said, "The promotion of human rights remains the most effective strategy for eliminating the inequality among countries and social groups as well as helping increase safety."

In commemoration of the 60th anniversary of the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the pope said that this declaration reflects the desire "to place the human person at the heart of institutions, laws and the workings of society."

But in reality the human person is very often not at the heart of institutions, laws and the workings of society.

Legalized abortion, crushing poverty, painful hunger, filthy water, environmental degradation, heartless corporations, sweatshop labor and war all point to a national and global mindset that largely views the human person not as "the high point of God's creative design," as Pope Benedict XVI proclaimed in his U.N. address, but instead as a disposable means of corporate greed and governmental apathy.

For this to change, for societies to become truly civilized — where each person's human rights are fully respected and guaranteed — it will take deeply committed action on the part of Catholic Christians and all people of good will.

Pope Benedict reminded the ambassadors that "human rights, then, must be respected as an expression of justice, and not merely because they are enforceable through the will of the legislators."

So what exactly are these human rights?

A good summary of these God-given rights is found in Article 25 of the U.N. Universal Declaration of Human Rights:

"Everyone has the right to a standard of living adequate for the health and well-being of himself and of his family, including food, clothing, housing and medical care and necessary social services, and the right to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, widowhood, old age or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control."

Making a Difference

TONY MAGLIANO
CNS COLUMNIST

When human rights are ignored or denied, not only is the dignity of the human person violated, but additionally, the seeds of terrorism are planted.

The pope highlighted this fact to the ambassadors of the world's governments when he said, "Victims of poverty and desperation and whose human dignity is violated with impunity are easy prey for the call to violence and can become the first people to violate the peace."

Pope Benedict's U.N. speech very much reflected his ongoing teaching that the violence of war must give way to respectful dialogue that leads to the promotion of human rights and global solidarity.

Papal visits are spiritual shots-in-the-arm! But unfortunately, their positive results largely tend to be short-lived. After the euphoria wears off, much of the Catholic Church in the U.S. pretty much returns to a more sedate existence.

Let's not let that happen this time!

On the final day of his U.S. visit, Pope Benedict prayed at the New York site of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. He asked God to "comfort and console us, strengthen us in hope, and give us the wisdom and courage to work tirelessly for a world where true peace and love reign among nations and in the hearts of all."

Amen!

the message of modesty, true beauty and dignity found in Jesus Christ. They embrace the vision that they are important and critical agents for change in our society. All those who participated in Pure Fashion Charlotte 2008 believe that by working together we can impact the world, sowing seeds of virtue and modesty "one outfit at a time."

I encourage the writer to initiate a unique program for young men. From what I've learned over the past two years, there will be a groundswell of support. Hopefully, the dialogue that has begun with young women can continue throughout our families and community.

Becoming Christ-like, especially in old age

Loving God means loving yourself and accepting his plan for you

Many adults have an egocentric philosophy of life. They are loners who become self-contained, putting their own convenience above the well-being of others.

During Pope Benedict XVI's visit in April, he said that freedom of conscience is a good thing, but only as long as we don't allow ourselves to reach the point of going against God's will because of it.

Some people take such good care of themselves that they never think of the Father's will as an essential part of finding peace and happiness, or as an essential component of attaining salvation.

Unfortunately, a selfish life resembles a seed that never breaks open.

We are all self-centered at birth, but God calls us to be generous. Jesus came to lead us out of the stagnation of selfish living. He came to save us from ourselves.

The verb "to save" comes from the Greek and means "to keep safe and whole." Jesus wants us to change our survival strategy into something new and different.

When he said, "In order to save your life, you must lose it," he was saying that a seed must die if it is to flower one day.

Jesus saw everything as coming from the Father, both the good things that happen and the bad. For instance, during his passion and crucifixion Jesus didn't blame Judas or Pilate or the Romans or even the Jews who shouted for his crucifixion.

He did something entirely unexpected; he saw the whole catastrophe as coming from his Father's will.

Jesus announced his purpose when he said, "I have come to do the will of him who sent me." His spirit of obedience was key to his personality. He accepted the bad and the good as part of his mission in life.

Doesn't it follow that if you want to become Christ-like you have to adopt a similar attitude by letting go of your fears and turning yourself over to the Lord?

Make obedience to the Father's will your supreme goal in life. The next time you look in the mirror, ask yourself: Do I see the aging process with all its miseries as part of God's will for me?

Yes, the self-preservation instinct is a good thing, and taking care of your body is very important, but don't let it

Irony Supreme Court action during pope's visit

Catholics must work to abolish death penalty, support culture of life

I woke up on the morning of April 17 knowing this would be an emotional day for me. It was the birthday of my son John and the second day of Pope Benedict XVI's visit to the U.S.

I have felt a special connection to this Holy Father ever since February of 1994 when I met him in Jerusalem at a very special conference for Christians and Jews worldwide. I had the chance to shake his hand, ask him to pray for my deceased son John and then take his photo. I was so honored.

He did not know, of course, that John and his wife Nancy had been shot to death six months earlier by an 18-year-old invader in their home.

So on April 17, after some special prayers, I turned on the TV and picked up The New York Times. I was surprised to see no headlined story or photo of our Holy Father.

Instead I became distressed when I read: "Justices Uphold Lethal Injection in Kentucky Case." What had been challenged in Kentucky was not the killing itself in a death penalty case but whether lethal injection as a killing method constituted cruel and unusual punishment.

The Supreme Court ruled in a 7-2 decision that even if there is much pain, Kentucky — and, thus, of course, other states — can continue using this method for killing death-row inmates.

Chief Justice John Roberts, a Catholic, explained the court's controlling decision, saying, "Simply because an execution method may result in pain, either by accident or as an inescapable consequence of death, does not establish the sort of 'objectively intolerable risk of harm' that qualifies as 'cruel and unusual' under the Eighth Amendment."

Equally disturbing was the quote from another Catholic, Justice Antonin Scalia, responding to Justice John Paul Stevens, who supported the judgment of the court while speaking against capital punishment itself:

"But of all Justice Stevens's criticisms of the death penalty, the hardest to take is his bemoaning of 'the enormous costs that death penalty litigation imposes on society,' including the 'burden on the courts and the lack of finality for victims' families.'"

I wanted to shout out to him what my older sister said about the death penalty: "You can't get peace from something that ugly!"

How different are Justice Scalia's words from those of top Vatican official Cardinal Renato Martino, who spoke last September in Rome on the pastoral care of prisoners.

Spirituality for Today

FATHER JOHN CATOIR
CNS COLUMNIST

become your supreme goal. Don't fight your destiny. Accept your own death and be free of fear.

Better to adopt a spirit of cheerful acquiescence to the whole process than to curse the darkness.

Do yourself a favor: Accept life as it comes, day by day. In the process of keeping yourself healthy, accept your duty to help others along the way. Don't become a recluse. Get out!

Risk exposing yourself to the germs of those less fortunate than you. Otherwise you will be like the seed that never broke open, never died and flowered.

The supreme law says this: Love God and neighbor as you love yourself. To love self, you have to learn to love your body. That means you must accept the aging process as part of God's plan for you. Even when life takes you down the scary road of old age, surrender with a gentle smile.

Pain is good if it helps you to become more aware of the needs of others. Reach out to help them. Accept your destiny with dignity and grace. Be charitable as you bow before the Father, surrendering to his will.

Pope says trip to U.S. was opportunity to give, receive hope, faith

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Reflecting on his recent visit to the United States during his April 30 weekly general audience, Pope Benedict XVI said the trip was an opportunity to give and receive a witness to the power of hope and faith.

The pope began his general audience by publicly thanking the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops and President George W. Bush for inviting him, and all those who greeted him with affection and offered prayers for the success of his visit.

Addressing the 20,000 people who had gathered in St. Peter's Square for the audience, the pope said he set out on the trip "to confirm Catholics in the faith, to renew and increase brotherhood with all Christians and to proclaim to all the message of Christ our hope."

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

My recent apostolic journey to the United Nations and the United States of America was inspired by the theme, "Christ our Hope." I am most grateful to all who helped in any way to make the journey a success.

My visit was meant to encourage the Catholic community in America, especially our young people, to bear consistent witness to the faith, and to carry on the church's mission, especially with regard to education and concern for the poor.

American society traditionally values religious freedom and the need for faith to play its part in building a sound civic life. In my meetings with President Bush, and with Christian leaders and representatives of other religions, I reaffirmed the church's commitment to cooperation in the service of understanding, peace and spiritual values.

My address to the United Nations stressed the importance of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which grounds respect for human dignity in a universally valid ethical order.

In a particular way, my visit to Ground Zero, charged with sober silence and prayer, was a moving testimony to the hope which is stronger than evil and death.

I ask all of you to join me in praying that this visit will bear abundant spiritual fruit for the growth of the faith in America and for the unity and peace of the whole human family.

The Bottom Line

ANTOINETTE BOSCO
CNS COLUMNIST

Appealing for the life of a death-row inmate in Texas, he called the death penalty an "inhumane and ineffective form of punishment that also impoverishes the society that legitimizes and practices it."

I think it is important for Catholics to be reminded that the U.S. bishops have emphasized that we must be a "culture of life," calling for an end to the death penalty.

Another serious reason for ending the death penalty is the possibility that an innocent person may be executed. Since 1973, 127 people have been released from death row because evidence of their innocence was found.

My children and I appealed to the judge not to seek the death penalty for the killer of John and Nancy. For as my daughter Mary testified:

"Anguished cries for vengeance poison our own hearts and minds. ... Hatred doesn't heal. Mercy, compassion, moving on with life, turning toward good people, walking into the light of love as much as possible, that's what victims need."

"And our lawmakers have the capacity to help us do that by abolishing the death penalty and along with it the fantasy that it will make the pain go away."

Bettering the world, 'little by little'

Catholic Worker Movement marks 75th anniversary without fanfare

BY DENNIS SADOWSKI
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Seventy-fifth anniversary or not, lunch still must be served at the New York Catholic Worker's Maryhouse. Hungry people will be waiting, as they are every day.

Jane Sammon knows the routine: hospitality, meals, conversation, responding in whatever way possible to people in need. She's been at Maryhouse for nearly 36 years, arriving in the summer of 1972 from Cleveland to live a life of voluntary poverty and personal sacrifice with a deep commitment to the works of mercy.

It's a way of life many admire but few venture to try.

Maryhouse is a place where the world is made better for people "little by little," as Catholic Worker co-founder Dorothy Day often would say, recalling the example of St. Therese, the Little Flower of Jesus.

It's a place where people are readily welcomed and their human dignity is uplifted. Day wanted a place where Christ would feel at home.

"It's an amazing thing that really has very little to do with us," said Sammon, 60. "It's the grace of God that keeps us going."

Maryhouse on East Third Street in New York's Bowery and St. Joseph House two blocks away on East First Street are the flagship communities of the Catholic Worker Movement, which turned 75 May 1.

The movement today encompasses more than 180 houses of hospitality in the United States including a few small farms. Another 18 houses are in Canada, Mexico, Belgium, Germany, Great Britain, Netherlands, Sweden and New Zealand.

Over the years, the movement has grown considerably, with the number of houses doubling since Day's Nov. 29, 1980, death. The notion that the movement would founder once the hard-driving Day passed away has long since been dispelled.

Author Jim Forest, who worked alongside Day in New York in the 1960s and 1970s and has written extensively about her life, relates a story reflecting her view about the movement's future.

Asked in 1973 if she thought the movement would survive her, Day answered, "Why shouldn't it? It has already survived more than 40 years of me."

From depression to hope

The movement was born on the streets of Depression-laden New York City May 1, 1933, when Day and friend Peter Maurin published and sold — at a penny a copy, the price it's still going for today — The Catholic Worker, a newspaper focusing on the social teachings of the church and advocating for the poor and displaced workers.

As circulation grew rapidly it took just six months for Day and Maurin to establish the first Catholic Worker house of hospitality in a walk-up apartment with space for 10 homeless women. The movement grew quickly in Manhattan and spread across the country.

Today, Catholic Worker houses are as diverse as the people running them. Each house is autonomous with no formal rules except to carry out the works of mercy: feeding the hungry, sheltering the homeless, caring for the sick, burying the dead.

Hospitality takes many forms, from storefront drop-in centers to comfortable places for people to lay their heads at night. Some communities welcome people with AIDS or HIV.

Others accept single mothers and their children or homeless men, many facing addictions or mental illness.

In Stillwater, Minn., Solanus Casey House welcomes homeless mothers and their children in two restored 19th-century houses.

"It's an utterly ordinary thing we do," house founder Tom Loomer told the National Catholic Prayer Breakfast in Washington April 18. "It is called Christianity. It is not original what we do. At least we hope it's not original."

Later, he told Catholic News Service that the community's efforts are hardly social work.

"Social workers are not in the business of passing out love. That's where communities like ours come in," Loomer said.

"So many of the traditional works of mercy have been institutionalized and taken over by professionals or by the government. We don't simply direct them to the county to stand in line and get a number. To do it personally, that's Dorothy Day's philosophy of personalism," he said.

It's the philosophy of personalism — taking personal responsibility for someone in need — that guides each Catholic Worker community.

Joe May Sr., a Catholic Worker who helps run the Peter Maurin Center in Akron, Ohio, said being in touch directly with the people being served has its benefits.

"You don't have bureaucracy," he said, citing his community's focus on welcoming Hispanic mothers and their children in three houses of hospitality. "We have to find out from the people what is needed. Before we say what we're going to do, we ask what is needed."

Catholic Workers like Sammon say the work can be done by anyone — Christian or otherwise — who understands the call to be merciful.

"You don't need a Catholic Worker to do what we're doing," Sammon said.

VATICAN CITY — Pope Benedict XVI appealed to the world community to be merciful and generous by offering aid and working to relieve the suffering caused by Cyclone Nargis, which killed tens of thousands in Myanmar.

During his May 7 general audience in St. Peter's Square, the pope called on people to open their hearts "to compassion and generosity so that with the collaboration of all who are able and want to lend help, the suffering caused by this huge tragedy can be alleviated."

When the pope spoke, more than 22,000 people had been killed, 41,000 were missing and 1 million were homeless

From 5:30-6:30 a.m., before many people are even awake, Msgr. John McSweeney prayed the Liturgy of the Hours. Every morning begins with prayer, he said.

"To be efficient, a priest has to be a prayerful person," he affirmed. "I give my day to the Lord. I tell him, 'Whatever happens today is yours. Use me.'"

He then went on to celebrate the 7 a.m. Mass.

"And then the venture starts," said Msgr. McSweeney, pastor of St. Matthew Church

SAINTLY INTERVENTION

Audrey Toguchi holds a picture of Blessed Damien de Veuster at her home in Alea, Hawaii, May 1. Toguchi was cured of cancer nine years ago after she prayed to Blessed Damien, the Belgian missionary who cared for the Hansen's disease patients of Molokai, Hawaii, and who died of the disease in 1889.

Vatican theologians see miracle in Hawaiian woman's cancer cure

HONOLULU (CNS) — Theological consultants to the Vatican Congregation for Saints' Causes have ruled that the cancer cure of a Hawaiian woman was due to Blessed Damien de Veuster's intercession, Honolulu Bishop Larry Silva announced April 29.

The decision represents a major step forward in Father de Veuster's cause for canonization. The final actions required to declare the priest a saint are the endorsement of the congregation's committee of cardinals and bishops and the approval of the pope.

Father de Veuster, the 19th-century Belgian missionary of the Congregation of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary who spent the final 16 years of his life caring for the Hansen's disease patients on the Hawaiian Island of Molokai, was beatified in 1995 in Belgium by Pope John Paul II.

In his announcement, Bishop Silva included the name of the Oahu woman, Audrey Toguchi, whose cancer disappeared a decade ago after she began prayers to Father de Veuster that included pilgrimages to Kalaupapa where the priest worked and died.

It was the first time the diocese had made her name public.

Toguchi, in a May 1 interview with the Hawaii Catholic Herald, Honolulu diocesan newspaper, said that when she first learned she had cancer "I put everything in God's hands."

She decided to pray to Father de Veuster, who had given his own life in service to others.

"Father Damien is not going to let me go," she thought at the time.

The sainthood process generally requires two miracles, one for beatification and one for canonization.

An alleged miracle — usually a healing — must overcome two hurdles. First, medical experts must declare it dramatic and unexplainable. Next, theologians must determine that it was caused through the intercession of the candidate for sainthood.

In Father de Veuster's case, the medical commission of the Vatican's Congregation for Saints' Causes ruled last October that the healing was "unexplainable according to available medical knowledge." In this latest judgment, the theological consultants determined that the cure was attributable to Father de Veuster.

The cure in question involved the disappearance of cancer, without treatment, from Toguchi's lungs in 1999. The case was documented in an article about "complete spontaneous regression of cancer" published in the October 2000 issue of the Hawaii Medical Journal.

According to the article, three malignant lung tumors were discovered by X-ray in September 1998. Upon learning of her condition, Toguchi began praying to Father de Veuster and visiting Kalaupapa.

Before therapy could be applied, an X-ray a month later showed that the tumors had decreased in size.

Monthly X-rays revealed further shrinkage until scans in May and October 1999 could find no sign of the cancer. The doctor's report stated that the "lung metastases disappeared with no therapy at all."

Church recognizes 17th-century Marian apparitions in France

LAUS, France (CNS) — The Catholic Church has officially recognized 17th-century Marian apparitions to a 17-year-old peasant girl in a southern Alpine village in France.

"Three centuries have passed since Benoite Rencurel testified ... about what Christ and Mary, his mother, had revealed concerning God's love for men, as well as his infinite mercy and his appeal for conversion," Archbishop Georges Pontier of Marseille, France, said during a May 4 Mass at the Marian basilica in the town of Laus.

"Here, as in Lourdes, as in La Salette, as in Fatima, we see Mary pursuing her mission to reveal her son and invite us to do all he tells us," he told more than 6,000 people at the Mass.

A decree recognizing the "supernatural origin of the apparitions and of facts lived and recounted by the young shepherdess" between 1664 and 1718 was read at the Mass by Bishop Jean-Michel di Falco Leandri of Gap, France.

In late 2003, Bishop di Falco Leandri set up a panel of seven historians, theologians and psychologists to study the apparitions. In 2006 the panel's findings were sent to the Vatican's Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, which raised no objection to the recognition of the visions.

The apparitions are the first approved by the French church since apparitions to St. Bernardette Soubirous at Lourdes were officially recognized in 1862.

After four months of daily apparitions in 1664, Rencurel said Mary had asked her to build a church and house for priests. She later claimed similar visions while ministering to pilgrims and penitents as a lay Dominican tertiary in her home village.

Numerous cures were later claimed by sick visitors who were treated with a special oil.

Bishop di Falco Leandri also relaunched a canonization process for Rencurel in 2003.

FROM THE VATICAN

Pope says Christians have fundamental duty to work for peace, justice

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Christians have a fundamental responsibility to work for peace and justice, which is tied inseparably to their mission to proclaim the Gospel, Pope Benedict XVI said.

This social aspect of the faith is crucial as humanity faces new and important challenges in the 21st century, including economic justice and environmental protection, he said.

The pope made the remarks May 3 in a speech to members of the Pontifical Academy of Social Sciences. The academy was meeting to discuss Catholic social teaching and the common good.

The pope said the technical aspects of social justice must be understood by Catholics in a framework of faith.

"The responsibility of Christians to work for peace and justice, their irrevocable commitment to build up the common good, is inseparable from their mission to proclaim the gift of eternal life to which God has called every man and woman," he said.

The concept of solidarity, he said, has a special meaning for Christians. It calls upon them to humble themselves, not merely to seek a situation of social parity.

"Jesus commands us to do unto others as we would have them do unto us, to love our neighbor as ourselves," he said.

"In this sense, true solidarity — though it begins with an acknowledgment of the equal worth of the other — comes to fulfillment only when I willingly place my life at the service of the other," he said.

"Herein lies the 'vertical' dimension of solidarity: I am moved to make myself less than the other so as to minister to his or her needs," he said.

The pope said the principle of "subsidiarity" — the idea that social tasks should be handled by the smallest and simplest organization that can do so competently — reflects the natural desire for self-governance.

God made pre-humans into people, Vatican newspaper says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — While apes evolved naturally into pre-human creatures, it was the will and desire of God that turned them into humans, an article in the Vatican newspaper said.

"The formation of human beings necessitated a particular contribution by God, though it remains that their emergence was brought about by natural causes" of evolution, it said.

The article, published in the May 5-6 edition of L'Osservatore Romano, was written by Italian evolutionary biologist Fiorenzo Facchini.

The article said that, "when the biological conditions necessary for supporting a being capable of reflective thought were attained, the will of God, the creator, freely desired it, and man came to be."

The article posed the question: Does this mean that humans evolved from chimpanzees?

"No, it might be better to say that at some point God willed a spark of intelligence to light up in the mind of a nonhuman hominid and thus came into existence the human as a being, as a subject capable of thought and the ability to decide freely," it said.

So rather than picturing it as humans descending from the apes, it said, humans ascended or rose up from the animal kingdom to a higher level, thanks to the hand of God.

As Pope Benedict XVI wrote in 1968 when he was Father Joseph Ratzinger, God wanted to create a being that could know him and be able to turn to him, the article said.

The emergence of the human is neither a casual or accidental event, nor is it something that was "strictly necessary," demanded by God or the evolutionary process, it said.

Evolution could have ended at the pre-human stage, it said, but thanks to "the free choice of God," humans emerged from their pre-human ancestors.

This divine intervention "does not represent an unwarranted intrusion (of theology) in the field of science — as is the case with intelligent design — but is called for in order to explain the presence of man's spirit" which cannot come from or evolve out of the material world, the article said.

The movement from being a creature of the animal and physical world to also the spiritual was a gift from God "even if it came at the end of a natural process of evolution," it said.

Mercy Sister Mary Scullion addresses the 'Homeless Helping Homeless' group following lunch at the Urban Ministry Center May 1. Known for her efforts in assisting homeless in Philadelphia, Pa., Sister Scullion came to Charlotte to assess the homeless situation and offer suggestions for combating the problem.

Sister of Mercy offers ideas to combat homelessness in Charlotte area

BY KRIS REICH

SPECIAL TO THE CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

CHARLOTTE — Two Sisters of Mercy and lay Catholics recently took an in-depth look at homelessness in the Charlotte area.

A group of parishioners from St. Matthew Church in Charlotte joined Mercy Sister Therese Galligan, a pastoral associate at St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte, and her visitor, Mercy Sister Mary Scullion of Philadelphia, Pa., on a tour of shelters and agencies that provide services to the homeless May 1.

That evening to a capacity crowd at St. Matthew Church, Sister Scullion gave her assessment of the homeless situation and passionately challenged area Christians to respond to the crisis at hand.

Social workers estimate there are more than 5,000 homeless in the Charlotte area, with nearly half of them children. Many homeless work but do not earn enough to pay rent.

To combat homelessness in Philadelphia, Sister Scullion in 1989 co-founded Project HOME (Housing, Opportunities, Medical Care, Education), a program that provides housing, employment, education and health care to homeless and low-income residents in Philadelphia.

The program's motto is "None of us are home until all of us are home."

St. Matthew and St. Gabriel churches were among the sponsors of Sister Scullion's visit, the goal of which was to assist the community in providing safe havens for women and children who are homeless, and to end the cycle of homelessness by promoting the identification, development and funding options for safe, affordable housing.

"In the long run, the economics of addressing homelessness issues costs far less than the economics of addressing the fall out caused by homelessness," said Sister Scullion.

"Walking by someone sleeping in a doorway is an assault on our dignity and an assault on that person's dignity. Every human being deserves a place to stay," she said.

Speaking to homeless individuals at Charlotte's Urban Ministry Center, she said, "Homelessness is not acceptable, it's not OK, and it's not your fault."

The privately-funded Urban Ministry Center began 14 years ago after four downtown churches — among them, St. Peter Church — responded to the needs of the city's growing homeless population.

From that initial soup kitchen has come a facility that provides counseling and employment, athletic and substance abuse recovery programs.

The facility's outreach now focuses on three main principles: engage, build trust and change behavior.

"We need to change our society and hold our elected officials responsible for doing their part," said Sister Scullion. "If we want peace, we have to work for justice."

During her talk in Charlotte, she encouraged her Charlotte audience to "challenge the businesses all around you to do their share."

"Instead of complaining about the homeless hanging out at the Urban Ministry Center, challenge them to join you next time you pick up garbage," she said. "It's their neighborhood, too."

COLUMBUS, Ohio — John Eckert, a seminarian for the Diocese of Charlotte, has taken another step toward the priesthood.

Eckert was one of nine seminarians admitted to candidacy for holy orders by Bishop Thomas J. Olmsted of Phoenix during a ceremony in a chapel at the Pontifical College Josephinum April 26.

The rite of admission to candidacy for holy orders is celebrated when a seminarian has reached a maturity of purpose in his formation and has demonstrated the necessary qualifications for ordination.

In the presence of a bishop, the seminarian publicly expresses his intention to complete his preparation for holy orders and his resolve to fully invest himself to that end, so that he will serve Christ and the Church faithfully.

"There are three traits ... that are the distinguished goals for which these candidates strive," Bishop Olmsted said in his homily.

"Holiness of life; true art — the art of loving others as Christ loves us; and universality — being Catholic in identity, life, and mission," he continued. "When you and I live these traits, we bear witness to hope, because we bear witness to Christ."

The Pontifical College Josephinum, as an international seminary, serves an average of 30 dioceses in the United States and abroad. The nine seminarians represented eight dioceses, and they will continue studies at the seminary for two more years before being ordained to the priesthood.

Catholic Charities USA, of which Catholic Social Services of the Diocese of Charlotte is an affiliate, launched a campaign in January 2007 to reduce poverty in the United States by half by 2020.

"Action in our local communities is key," said Hill, pointing out that social change does not begin in Washington, D.C., but ends there in political action. "More Congress people are now calling Catholic Charities USA before voting on issues that affect the poor," she said.

The poverty campaign is the call to work together locally and nationally for those without a voice in politics. National statistics on poverty match a report that states one in five children in North Carolina lives in poverty and that poverty is an epidemic with harmful cognitive, physical and emotional effects.

Monks clear fallen trees from a road in Yangon, Myanmar, May 4 after Cyclone Nargis swept through the previous day, in this picture distributed by China's official news agency Xinhua. Thousands of people are believed to have been killed in the cyclone.

Pope appeals for help for cyclone victims

after the cyclone's heavy rains and winds of up to 120 mph swept over southern Myanmar May 3.

The cyclone damaged at least three major cities, including Yangon, the capital of Myanmar and its largest city.

Earlier, in a telegram sent on behalf of the pope by the Vatican secretary of state, Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, to Archbishop Paul Zingtung Grawng of Mandalay, the pope had expressed deep sadness and "heartfelt sympathy" after hearing news of "the tragic aftermath" of the disaster.

The pope said he was "confident that the international community will respond with generous and effective relief to the needs" of those hit by the cyclone.

In Thailand and India, Catholic agencies prepared relief efforts for neighboring Myanmar, reported the Asian church news agency UCA News.

Father Pibul Visitnontachai, director of the Thai bishops' Office for Emergency Relief and Refugees, told UCA News May 7 that the Myanmar Embassy had just given permission for a church team to go there. He said his request to send representatives was turned down, but he reapplied in the name of Caritas after Caritas Internationalis officials meeting in Rome May 4 resolved to let the Thai church lead its response to the disaster.

Caritas Internationalis is a confederation of 162 Catholic relief, development and social service organizations.

A representative of the Thai bishops and a representative of the Irish Caritas organization, Trocaire, were to enter Myanmar May 8, said Father Visitnontachai.

He said they were to assess the situation in the affected areas and plan a coordinated response with the bishops of the affected dioceses.

Father Visitnontachai said the delegation would take more than $31,450, an initial donation from Thai Catholics.

Meanwhile, he said, the church would conduct a campaign to inform Thais of the situation in Myanmar and raise donations.

Caritas India also planned to send at least two volunteers to Myanmar to assess the situation, said the agency's executive director, Father Varghese Mattamana.

However, the Indian workers were facing visa problems, he told UCA News May 7. Caritas India, he added, wants to send 1 million rupees (US$25,000) as immediate relief.

While he had "no definite" information about the extent of the devastation, Father Mattamana said Caritas was trying to work with German aid agency volunteers who had reached the affected region.

The U.S. bishops' Catholic Relief Services said in a statement May 6 that the Baltimore-based agency "is supporting the emergency relief and response efforts of the Caritas Internationalis network."

"Cyclone Nargis could not have happened in a worse stretch of land. The surge hit in the low-lying coastal areas. With the tidal surge at 12-15 feet, presumably thousands of people living along the delta were simply washed away," said Pat Johns, director of CRS' emergency response team, in the statement.

The Canadian Catholic aid organization Development and Peace said in a statement May 6 that it also had been evaluating the situation and coordinating its relief efforts with Caritas.

The aid agency has been accepting funds to help the victims of the cyclone.

About 1 percent of the population of junta-ruled Myanmar is Catholic. Most of its citizens are Buddhist.

Not an easy read

Survey indicates Bible hard to understand

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The Bible: Most people in Europe and North America have one and some of them actually read it, but more than half of them say it is difficult to understand.

A survey commissioned by the Catholic Biblical Federation found that even those who reported reading the Bible said it was not easy to understand.

Luca Diotallevi, the Rome-based sociology professor who coordinated the survey's working group, said, "This is very important: People described the Bible as difficult whether or not they said they read it."

"The people of God are asking for help reading the Bible," he said in an April 30 interview.

The Catholic Biblical Federation commissioned the survey as part of its preparation for the October world Synod of Bishops, which will focus on the Bible.

During an April 28 Vatican press conference, the federation and GfK-Eurisko, which conducted the survey, presented preliminary results from nine countries: the United States, United Kingdom, the Netherlands, Germany, France, Spain, Italy, Poland and Russia.

The survey results are based on telephone interviews conducted in November with 13,000 adults.

Asked, "In the past 12 months have you read any passage from the Bible?" 75 percent of U.S. adults said "yes."

Their European counterparts were far behind them, but Diotallevi said the results coincide with other surveys on the differences between U.S. and European religious attitudes and practices.

Diotallevi said a few more Protestants than Catholics reported having and reading the Bible, but the difference was so slight that it "was not statistically relevant."

The percentage of Europeans affirming they had read a Bible passage in the previous year varied from a high of 38 percent in Poland to a low of 20 percent in Spain.

But the huge differences all but disappeared when those surveyed were asked whether they considered the Bible's content to be "easy" or "difficult."

Word for word

The spread of those who said it was difficult went from 56 percent in the United States to 70 percent in Germany.

The percentage of respondents who said they had a Bible at home was 93 percent in the United States, 85 percent in Poland, 75 percent in Italy, 74 percent in Germany, 67 percent in both the United Kingdom and the Netherlands, 65 percent in Russia, 61 percent in Spain and 48 percent in France.

The survey designers also tested for what they defined as an individual's "index of biblical knowledge," by asking seven very basic questions, such as "Are the Gospels part of the Bible?" and "Did Jesus write a book of the Bible?"

Diotallevi said the scores of Catholics

"The people of God are asking for help reading the Bible."

and Protestants were not significantly different because, while slightly more Protestants reported reading the Bible, "they have a greater tendency toward fundamentalism, giving what we would consider a wrong answer. For example, many of them maintain that Jesus is the author of the Gospels."

When asked to describe the Bible, the most popular answer in every country except Germany was, "The Bible is the inspired word of God, but not everything in the Bible should be taken literally, word for word."

In Germany, 40 percent chose the phrase about the Bible being inspired, but more respondents — 42 percent — said, "The Bible is an ancient book of fables, legends, history and moral precepts."

Diotallevi described as fundamentalist those who chose the response: "The Bible is the actual word of God, which must be taken literally, word for word."

Poland was the country with the highest percentage of fundamentalists, with 34 percent affirming the statement. In the United States, 27 percent said it was literally God's word and in Italy 23 percent said so.

'Lexio divina'

One statistic bishops are expected to discuss during the synod is the relatively infrequent use of the Bible for prayer, the "lexio divina" promoted by the church.

Survey respondents who said they prayed were asked, "How do you do it?"

While 37 percent of U.S. respondents and 32 percent of Polish respondents said they use the Bible to pray, only 9 percent of people in the United Kingdom, France and Italy reported praying with the Bible and only 6 percent of Spaniards said they used the Bible for their prayers.

In France and in Italy, the top answer was, "I recite words that I know by heart."

In all the other countries, the most popular method of private prayer was using one's own words.

Those interviewed also were asked about their political orientation; in order to have comparable statistics, the survey did not ask people which party they belonged to, but rather to describe themselves as right wing, center-right, center, center-left or left wing.

He said the number of people who read the Bible "was more or less equal" in each of the political categories.

"But on individual issues, reading the Bible was strongly predictive," Diotallevi said.

The statistical breakdowns were not available in late April, but he said those who reported reading the Bible were those most likely to oppose abortion and euthanasia.

Pope to spend 10 days, including 3 of rest, on trip to Australia

SYDNEY, Australia (CNS) — The Catholic Church in Australia and organizers of World Youth Day in Sydney have identified a "serene, beautiful and suitable" place in Australia for Pope Benedict XVI to rest for three full days in July before joining the youth gathering.

While refusing to identify the place for reasons of privacy and security, Sydney Auxiliary Bishop Anthony Fisher, World Youth Day coordinator, said the pope would have "the opportunity to see some of Australia's beautiful flora and fauna."

Passionist Father Ciro Benedettini, assistant director of the Vatican press office, said May 2 the place chosen was near Sydney.

Pope Benedict will leave Rome July 12, stop briefly in Darwin, Australia, July 13 for refueling, then proceed to Sydney, Father Benedettini said.

The pope will spend July 14-16 resting and recovering from jet lag, said Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, Vatican spokesman.

Pope Benedict will be involved in World Youth Day activities July 17-20 and will leave Sydney July 21.

Father Lombardi said the "three days of rest, without doing absolutely anything," would allow the 81-year-old pope to absorb the effects of the trip from Rome, which crosses nine time zones. The total flight time is expected to be about 20 hours.

Rest days are not unprecedented in papal travel. In 2002, when Pope John Paul II went to Toronto for World Youth Day, he spent most of the first four days after his arrival relaxing at an island retreat center.

Waves crash over rocks in the harbor of Sydney, Australia, near the city's famous bridge and opera house April 29. Sydney is set to host World Youth Day July 15-20.

The refueling stop in Darwin is the only stop planned on the way to Sydney, Father Benedettini said.

In late April, the World Youth Day organizers said nearly 123,000 young people had already registered to participate in the July 15-20 gathering.

They are scheduled to welcome Pope Benedict July 17.

The papal welcome will include a greeting from local indigenous leaders and "a colorful reception with flags from all over the world," organizers said.

In the afternoon, the pope will take a cruise in Sydney Harbor, disembarking at Barangaroo, where he will address the pilgrims.

The detailed program for the pope's visit was expected to be released in June.

Pew poll: Americans think more highly of pope after his U.S. visit

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI's visit to the United States in April boosted his image among Americans, including Catholics, according to a recent survey.

Sixty-one percent of the 1,000 people surveyed by the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press and the Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life April 23-30, just days after his U.S. trip, said they view the pope favorably.

In March, 52 percent of those surveyed had the same response.

Among Catholics, the pope's favorable rating rose to 83 percent in April, up from 74 percent in March. The survey included 232 Catholics.

The survey also found that nearly half of the responding Catholics (49 percent) say they have a very favorable opinion of the pope, up from 36 percent in March. Among all Americans, 22 percent of those surveyed said they had a very favorable view of the pope.

The pope also received improved marks for promoting good relations with other religions between March and April, especially among Protestants in the survey.

Nearly half (49 percent) of Protestants who had heard at least a little about the pope said he has done an excellent or good job in his relations with other religions. In late March, just 32 percent of Protestants held that view.

Overall, 70 percent of Catholics expressed a positive opinion of Pope Benedict's efforts to foster good relations with other religions, up from 64 percent in March. Most of the improvement came from among Catholics who attend Mass less than every week. In that group, 60 percent of those surveyed said they felt positive about the pope's interreligious efforts, an increase from 48 percent a month earlier.

The survey also questioned participants about the pope's handling of the clergy sexual abuse scandal. Less than half of Catholics (49 percent) felt the pontiff had done a good or excellent job in the matter. Among those who attend Mass weekly, 60 percent were positive about the pope's efforts related to the crisis compared with 38 percent of those who attend Mass less frequently.

Among Protestants overall, just 39 percent felt positive about his efforts. White evangelicals felt more positive about Pope Benedict's handling of the abuse scandal by a 45 percent to 32 percent margin over white mainline Protestants.

The margin of error for the survey was plus or minus 3.5 percentage points for the total sample and plus or minus 7.5 percentage points for the Catholic subset.

Positive Views

Pope Benedict XVI's visit to the U.S. in April had a positive impact on the public's attitude toward him, according to results of a post-visit poll.

Poll shows pope's visit influenced attitudes toward church, faith

according to a poll commissioned by the Knights of Columbus.

The nationwide poll of 1,013 adults was conducted by the Marist College Institute for Public Opinion in Poughkeepsie, N.Y., April 22-24, just after the April 15-20 papal visit.

Marist conducted a similar poll prior to the pope's visit. Both polls had a margin of error of plus or minus 3.1 percentage points.

According to the newest poll, 65 percent of Americans have a more positive view of Pope Benedict as a result of what they saw and heard during his six-day visit to the United States and 52 percent have a more positive view of the Catholic Church.

The percentage of Americans with a favorable view of Pope Benedict jumped from 58 percent prior to his visit to 71 percent afterward. Similarly, the percentage of those who described the pope positively as a spiritual leader increased from 53 percent to 62 percent.

Poll results also showed that respondents have a higher opinion of the pope as a good world leader — 51 percent now, compared to 41 percent before the visit.

And 56 percent of adults said his ability to promote good relations between the Catholic Church and other religions was good or excellent, up from 40 percent in the previous poll.

When asked what part of the pope's visit was the most meaningful, 39 percent said the pope's meeting with abuse victims.

Fifteen percent were unsure; 14 percent cited the pope's visit to ground zero and 9 percent said the Masses at baseball stadiums. The pope's other events were cited by 7 percent or less of the respondents.

A majority of Americans, 55 percent, said the pope spent the right amount of time during his visit discussing the clergy abuse crisis and 58 percent were satisfied with his apology for the scandal.

But 46 percent of respondents said the church has not done enough to avoid a recurrence of the abuse scandal.

More than a third of respondents said they are more in touch with spiritual values as the result of the pope's visit. And nearly half of respondents said they have a better understanding of the Catholic Church's positions on important issues.

A significant number of Americans are prepared to change their personal involvement as a result of the pope's April visit to Washington and New York.

About 40 percent said they are more likely to lead a moral life and make family a bigger part of their lives and one-third are more likely to participate in elections, community activities and their churches.

Supreme Knight Carl Anderson said the poll results "show clearly" the pope "has presented the Catholics of the United States with a tremendous opportunity."

"Americans are a religious people, and they responded very positively to the message of faith, hope and love that the Holy Father delivered throughout his visit," said Anderson. "It is now up to all of us in the Catholic community to walk through the door he has opened for us and work together to build a civilization of love."

A look at the lives, faith of two diocesan priests

in Charlotte, the largest parish not only in the 46-county Diocese of Charlotte, but also in the southern United States with a impressive 7,100 households.

"I have the responsibility and care of 26,000 people," he noted.

That number includes a paid staff of 56 and 5,000 volunteers involved in active ministry.

"I want a lot of people doing something, not a few people doing a lot," he indicated, adding all they do is "for the glory and honor of God."

His large parish campus, which includes St. Matthew School and the New Life Center, has become a hub of faith-centered services and activities for both Catholics and non-Catholics alike. Mass is celebrated five times on Sunday, three times on Wednesday and twice on other days of the week.

"The primary purpose of this parish is to teach, preach and to help people toward holiness," he said.

Msgr. McSweeney, who turned 66 May 4, is actively aware of all that transpires in his parish and as his morning progresses he can be found moving from meeting to meeting with his parish department and ministry heads, volunteers and parishioners.

He doesn't like to micromanage — "I count on and trust people to do their jobs," he said — but the constant interaction with his flock compels him.

"My primary job, which I take very seriously, is how do I help people to get closer to God," said Msgr. McSweeney, who considers himself like a jigsaw puzzle worker.

"Each person — each piece — is different," he said. "And through consistency and persistence, you get a beautiful picture."

Despite the busyness of his days, Msgr. McSweeney believes constant prayer and reflection helps him to see and create that picture.

"A parish priest needs quiet time to be contemplative of what's going on — in his life and in the lives of those in his parish," he said. "It gives you a deeper sensitivity to what is going on so, as their shepherd, you can pull all those pieces together."

Fruits of faith

It was around 11:30 a.m. that Father Patrick Hoare stood in front of a gym full of students. He held a brown paper bag with the words, "Fr. Pat," boldly emblazoned across one side.

Inside the bag was a pair of sneakers, a visual he would use to illustrate the resurrection during his homily at the Mass he celebrated for students at Charlotte Catholic High School.

It may sound like a strange scenario, but for Father Hoare, it was nothing out of the ordinary.

His day begins around 6 a.m. with prayer. If he is scheduled to celebrate the 7 a.m. Mass at St. Mark Church in Huntersville, he hits the gym afterward. When celebrating the 9 a.m. Mass, he goes to the gym before.

Then it's off to the parish office and a day full of responsibilities and meetings. But the part of the day he always looks forward to most is celebrating Mass.

"It's the one time of the day that I know for sure that I am going to connect with God in a special way," said Father Hoare.

Msgr. John McSweeney, pastor of St. Matthew Church in Charlotte, meets with parish department heads April 24. He likes to micromanage. "I count on and trust people to do their jobs," he said.

"In preparing for Mass, I have to go over the readings and contemplate what they say," he said. "It gives me that moment of quiet time at the beginning of the day to focus on what Jesus is asking me to do."

This particular day, it included — among other things — meetings, a funeral Mass and celebrating Mass for teenagers at Charlotte Catholic.

"Some people are intimidated by youth," said Father Hoare, 41. "(But) I feel like I have a tremendous opportunity to impact the future."

"It's easier to teach a younger person," he added, "even though the fruits of that might not be born for many years."

Father Hoare knows a thing or two about how long it can take a tree to bear fruit. Discerning his vocation to the priesthood was not something that happened overnight.

A native of Pennsylvania, Father Hoare moved to Charlotte in 1995 when the insurance company he worked for opened an office in town.

He recalled thinking, "Maybe the dissatisfaction in my life wasn't a call to the priesthood, but just a call to change my life."

Over the next few years, his spirituality grew. He volunteered as a youth minister at his parish, St. Matthew Church in Charlotte, from 1995 to 2001.

Then he landed his dream job as vice president of his company, a position that required him to move back north, this time to Baltimore, Md. Although he looked forward to career advancement and being closer to his family, Father Hoare was surprised to find he still wasn't content.

"I liked my company. I had no moral aversion to my job," he said. "It was just a realization that I enjoyed working with the church, I loved working with young people."

It was about that time his parish priest, Msgr. McSweeney, encouraged him to consider the priesthood.

Priestly possibilities

Born in Oneida, N.Y., in 1942, Msgr. McSweeney thought he would go into the family business of running funeral homes. But in his late 20s, he felt his heart changing.

"Something was going on in my life. I wanted to give myself to something," he recalled.

At first he wasn't convinced he was being called to the priesthood, even as he enrolled in Holy Apostles Seminary in Connecticut at age 29. He did not pack to stay long.

"I thought when my clothes were used up, I'd leave and go home," he confessed. "But I didn't. A feeling came over me that this was right, and I gave myself to the Lord."

He was ordained as the first priest for the newly-established Diocese of Charlotte by Bishop Michael J. Begley, the diocese's first bishop, on Sept. 29, 1974. Msgr. McSweeney said he came to Charlotte "excited" at being involved in the building process of a mission diocese.

"There is tremendous opportunity to grow in the true sense of the Second Vatican Council ... tremendous opportunity to build the Kingdom of God here," he said.

"The building blocks," he noted, "are the people, not the buildings."

The fledgling diocese has grown tremendously in the last 35 years, with a current estimated registered population of more than 161,000 Catholics.

As Bishop Begley once told him, "Keep out of the way of the Holy Spirit."

St. Matthew Catholic Church presents A Symposium on St. Paul

Pope Benedict XVI has declared June 2008-June 2009 the Year of St. Paul. In preparation for this anniversary year we present the final talk in this series:

May 15: "Greeting the Greeks; Hailing the Hellenists" — Watching Paul as he engaged ecumenical and interfaith dialogue. Fr. Christopher Schreck, S.T.B., Pontifical Gregorian University, Rome; S.S.I. (Licentiate in Sacred Scripture), Pontifical Biblical Institute; Ph.D. S.T.D., Catholic University of Leuven; past Chair, Dept. of Sacred Scripture, St. Charles Borromeo Seminary; author of many articles published in academic journals. Fr. Schreck brings great insight into the New Testament and, specifically, St. Paul.

lived in all aspects of the parish's ministry, he doesn't

If you do, the Lord's church will grow."

Over the next three decades, Msgr. McSweeney served in parishes in Belmont, Charlotte and Waynesville, and served the diocese through a number of roles, including president of the presbyteral council, director of vocations, director of planning and development, executive secretary of the diocesan pastoral council, moderator of the curia, vice chancellor, vicar general and chancellor, and administrator.

"I've served in many parishes, in many roles, and I've had the privilege of seeing the church grow in many aspects and cultures," said Msgr. McSweeney.

"But since day one, knowing Jesus, and helping others to know him, has been the number one goal."

In the late 1970s, while director of vocations, Msgr. McSweeney met a young man at St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte whom he described as having "a good sense of humor ... and a deep sense of faith." He encouraged him to consider the priesthood.

Several years later that man, Peter Jugis, was ordained to the priesthood and in October 2003 was ordained as the fourth bishop of the Diocese of Charlotte.

"To me, with Bishop Jugis' ordination, the Catholic Church of this young diocese is truly coming into its own," said Msgr. McSweeney. "This local church has produced a bishop of its own — it gives this diocese a sense of maturity."

Just a few years prior, Msgr. McSweeney had helped Father Hoare find his calling.

"He was my most recent pastor, and one of the first priests in my adult life to mention the possibility of the priesthood," said Father Hoare.

"He has always been consistent in his support of me," he added.

Family in faith

It was in 2002 that Father Hoare entered St. Charles Borromeo Seminary in Philadelphia, Pa., as a seminarian for the Diocese of Charlotte.

"I didn't feel called to be a priest in Philadelphia," said Father Hoare, who was attracted to the growing population of Catholics in western North Carolina.

"Charlotte was an exciting place to live as a Catholic," he said. "Newly-ordained priests were becoming pastors within two to three years."

Ordained in June 2007, Father Hoare currently serves as parochial vicar at St. Mark Church. It didn't take long for him to become immersed in his priestly duties.

"I think what I like the most is being able to be a part of so many peoples lives at so many special moments in their lives," he said.

"I already feel like I'm a part of the family," he added.

families. Currently Mass is celebrated in the gymnasium of the Msgr. Joseph Kerin Family Life Center. A new church scheduled to be completed by June 2009.

Father Hoare said he has learned a lot from Msgr. Richard Bellow, pastor of St. Mark Church.

"He is very pastoral in the sense of his kindness to people," said Father Hoare. "He is genuinely concerned for everyone. I think he helps me to enhance that."

Father Hoare's experiences as a parish priest have taught him a lot about the people he serves.

"I've learned that faithful, God-seeking people come in all shapes and sizes and all different backgrounds," he said. "Often, the people who say the least are the people you need to listen to the most."

Msgr. McSweeney would agree.

In addition to encouraging vocations to the priesthood, Msgr. McSweeney believes in emphasizing the baptismal call of the laity, and that they need to be given more responsibility in churches.

"I am constantly amazed at the faith dimension and the spiritual journeys of the laity," he said.

As a parish priest, Msgr. McSweeney said he gets the "unique privilege" of sharing the "greatest part of their lives — birthdays, dying and everything in between. I laugh with people and shed tears with them."

He believes in tending to his flock the way a gardener tends a garden. "I nurture and care for it, and plant for the future," he said. "I believe in the future."

Spirit and solace

The future of the priesthood in the Diocese of Charlotte is strong and vibrant. Seventeen seminarians are currently studying for the priesthood, and two will be ordained as priests in June.

There is camaraderie among the priests, especially those who have gone to seminary together.

On his days off, Father Hoare likes to visit with his friends, Fathers Patrick Cahill and Patrick Toole, both parochial vicars at St. Matthew Church. All three were ordained together by Bishop Jugis.

The priesthood, said Father Hoare, "is not a lonely existence."

"The priests I know are not lonely. They have friends and family and people they work with."

He tries also to make a trip to Belmont Abbey once or twice a month.

"The monks are very welcoming," said Father Hoare. "I'll have lunch in the monastery and spend time in the library."

It is nice being able to get away for the day, said Father Hoare, who enjoys the occasional opportunity for solitude.

People might be surprised to know that "I am very shy and would not consider myself an extrovert at all."

The teenagers at Charlotte Catholic might find that hard to believe, but Father Hoare credits God with all that he has accomplished.

"It doesn't really depend on your ability," said Father Hoare. "That's where God kicks in."

It is God, also, Msgr. McSweeney credits with the successfulness of his days.

When he ends his day typically around 9 p.m., Msgr. McSweeney reflects on all that has transpired, and asks God to help him with what is to come tomorrow.

"I do the best I can, in words and in actions, and not just in the church, but day in and day out in the routine of life," he said.

Author Anne Rice talks of losing, regaining her Catholic faith

BY PAT NORBY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ST. PAUL, Minn. — Most people know author Anne Rice for her detailed characterization of vampires and vivid descriptions of their haunts in the streets and homes of New Orleans, where she was born and raised.

But a growing number of people today are reading Rice's second novel about Christ, "Christ the Lord: The Road to Cana."

Her first book on Jesus' early years, "Christ the Lord: Out of Egypt," was published in 2005, several years after she consecrated her life to Christ.

Before that time, Anne (O'Brien) Rice was searching for redemption after her break with the Catholic Church at age 18 and her marriage to Stan Rice, a professed atheist.

"I made the terrible mistake of losing my faith, of just thinking, if I can't live within the confines of the church, if I don't find it possible to do this, if I think the church is wrong, then maybe God doesn't exist," Rice said in an interview from her home in Rancho Mirage, Calif.

"I stopped talking to God," she added. "I stopped asking for his help. I stopped really praying. ... The mistake was rigidity, it was a lack of flexibility, a lack of being able to open up to some new experiences and not make such a violent break with the church."

Although those years were financially fruitful — "Interview With the Vampire" (1976) was the first of Rice's more than 20 works of fiction — she was filled with guilt that was reflected in her characters.

The vampires were a metaphor for the "souls who are away from the light of Christ and live in the darkness of the night," she said.

Over the years, she said, the characters continued to reflect her despair, guilt and search for meaning and faith. The first fictional vampires were set in the 18th century. Then Rice and her characters started working their way back in time.

"When I got to the first century and began to study the origin of Christianity and began to study what was going on in the Roman world at the time, I began to realize that I saw patterns that I could not explain, except that God was working in history," she said.

"I read and wrote myself back into the church through my search," said Rice, although she agonized over theological and sociological questions.

"Then the day came when I thought, 'Look, you believe in (Christ), you love him, you want to go home to your church and you want to go back to the banquet table, (and) you want to receive holy Communion again,'" she said. "That means you're not an atheist, lady!"

She no longer needed to answer questions about how things would work out or why evil existed or why good people suffer. Jesus knew the answers, so she could let go.

She said she had no doubt that Jesus was God when she returned to the Catholic Church in 1998.

Rice was living in New Orleans, three blocks from the boundary of Nativity of Our Lord in Kenner, La., where Father Curtis Thomas was pastor of the mostly blue-collar parish.

Although everyone in the parish knew who Rice was, she was just another faithful parishioner who arrived early to pray before the Saturday vigil Mass and chat with people before she left.

"Once, we said it would be nice if some of you would visit the poor box more often," said Father Thomas, now pastor of St. Bonaventure Church in Avondale, La.

"The next week, a check showed up from Miss Rice. There was no hoop-de-doo or anything. If there was a need and she valued the need she would try to help meet it," he said.

Father Thomas, an admirer of Rice's vampire novels, also has enjoyed her first two "Christ the Lord" books and said they have "wonderful insights into what may have been the environ that Christ, as a young man, was exposed to."

He also said there is nothing counter to church teaching in her fictional characterization of Christ.

Rice has been surprised by some of the criticism she has received. She expected it, somewhat, from Protestants who don't recognize the perpetual virginity of Mary, she said.

But Catholics, too, have criticized her use of the legends about Anna and Joachim, the parents of Mary. Rice said she combined the Eastern Orthodox and Western views of the children she portrays as Jesus' cousins and Jesus' brother, James.

"We know the Lord had brothers and sisters. The Catholics, from the time of St. Jerome, have maintained that those brothers and sisters were in fact cousins," she explained. "But the Eastern Orthodox

We show God's love by what we give

BY JEFF HEDGLEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Years ago I was a clown. Not in the Ringling Brothers sense of the word, but the clown ministry version. I loved my costume: I was kind of a prom date gone wrong with top hat, tails and all.

My time in this ministry was short-lived, and my great costume went into the closet to collect dust. Some time later a friend of mine who was still in the ministry asked if he could have my top hat for his costume.

I was hesitant, thinking maybe I would pull it out for Halloween or some other random event. In the end I said no.

That top hat sat untouched on the top shelf in my office for the next 10 years. Every time I looked at it I remembered my unwillingness to give it away. My attachment to this small material object blocked the love I had for my friend.

Lucky for us, God does not behave like this. John's Gospel tells us that "God so loved the world that he gave his only Son, so that everyone who believes in him might not perish but might have eternal life."

Love is wanting good for another and being willing to do what it takes to bring about this good in the person's life. God demonstrates this definitively in the sacrifice of his Son.

It is God's desire that every one of us spend eternity in union with him. To bring about this desired good meant sending Jesus to earth to suffer and die for our sins.

God was willing to do this. This was the first "big give" (sorry, Oprah).

John 3:16 is not just a great sign to hold up in the end zone of a football game. It is the defining statement of God's love for us. Yet, at the same time, it is also the blueprint for how we are called to love.

God does not ask us to give up our children to save the world, but he challenges us to show our love for God and our neighbor through what we give, be that a lifetime of missionary work or an unused top hat.

It truly is not how much we give but that we give.

Questions:

How would you make John 3:16 come alive for you? (You) so loved (name a person) that (you) gave (a gift) so that this person would have (name the good you want for him/her). What is a good you have received from someone's love for you?

have always believed that James was an older brother, that he was a child of Joseph by a former marriage."

"These ('Christ the Lord') books are absolutely Catholic books, but I hope they speak to all Christians," Rice said. People want biblically correct fiction, especially after "The Da Vinci Code." That was such a debacle, to have that ridiculous novel blown all out of proportion and people actually believing that nonsense."

"I see 'The Road to Cana,' my second novel, as a direct answer to 'The Da Vinci Code,'" she added. "No. Our Lord did not marry Mary Magdalene. No. He was celibate and he was sinless."

Her third book will delve into Jesus' ministry up to the Passion, which will be the focus of her fourth and final book about Christ.

Rice didn't plan to write about the passion when she started the first book on Christ. But her experience with pain and loss has given her insights that have inspired her to continue the series.

Her daughter died of leukemia at age 5. Her husband died of a brain tumor after 41 years of marriage. Her parents are both dead and her older sister, Alice, died in 2007.

Those losses have given her "a deep sense of how important it is to love everyone and to value every single moment and every single day," she said.

Rice, 66, realizes that she is moving toward the later part of her life.

"You watch what people suffer as they die and you see, I think," she said, pausing to gather her composure before adding, "the mercy of the Lord, the Lord's tender mercy."

Fire destroys two buildings at musician Talbot's hermitage

BERRYVILLE, Ark. (CNS) — An April 28 fire destroyed the common center and chapel at Little Portion Hermitage near Berryville.

The hermitage, the home of the Brothers and Sisters of Charity led by musician John Michael Talbot, worked with firefighters from four different fire departments to stop the blaze.

"Everybody was heroic," Talbot told the Arkansas Catholic, newspaper of the Diocese of Little Rock. "People were going into the building to save things."

Damages were estimated to be at least $500,000. The common center housed the hermitage's library, kitchen, archives and offices.

Also destroyed was Talbot's lighting and sound equipment; he was scheduled to leave May 2 for a monthlong tour of Canada.

Both of the buildings that were destroyed were built between 1983 and 1989.

Spared from the flames were hermitage residences, a second chapel and a retreat center located about a half-mile away.

Talbot identified spiritual lessons from the fire.

"God is stripping us so that only what is essential will remain," he said. "We are going to rebuild, God willing. But we are only going to rebuild in stone."

The Brothers and Sisters of Charity, a community of about 25, includes celibate men and women, married couples and their children.

The fire's origin was not immediately known. Talbot said an "electrical spike" was noticed about 9 p.m. that night, two and a half hours before the fire was first detected. An enclosed wood-pellet stove was lit in the chapel, he added.

Church must address role of Internet in identity, community, say experts

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The Catholic Church and particularly its social teaching must begin to grapple with the potential and the problems posed by the Internet, particularly when dealing with questions about personal identity, community involvement and solidarity, several social scientists said.

Members of the Pontifical Academy of Social Sciences, meeting at the Vatican May 1-7, explored how solidarity and subsidiarity can come together to promote the common good.

As part of their discussion, they looked at the role of the market economy and the state in promoting the exchange of goods, but also at the role played by communities and groups that support people, give them identity and teach them how to contribute to society.

For an increasing number of people, computers are the way they connect to the communities where they test and forge their personal identities and where they express their creativity and contribute to the production of goods, several academy members said at a May 6 Vatican press conference.

Margaret Archer, a professor at the University of Warwick in England and co-organizer of the May meeting, said academy members were discussing the "common good" as those things which "are vital for the flourishing of the human person," including respect for human rights and the sharing of gifts and talents.

"Many of the old methods through which people learned to take part in society — to obey, to contribute, to receive — are threatened or gone altogether," she said.

The primary agent of socialization in the past was the family, led by a person's biological mother and biological father; "only 50 percent of the West's population" now grows up with both parents at home, she said.

The other significant agent was a person's specific culture, whether it was a nationality or a religion, she said. But increasingly people do not feel bound by those identities.

"It's more pick and mix now," she said.

And particularly as people live longer, she said, more and more of them are living alone, increasing their distance from traditional forms of communal life.

"Here virtual communities could help," she said. "YouTube and Facebook may not be appropriate for people over 55, but we can develop communities for them."

"We cannot compare virtual reality to what we grew up with if we had two parents, but that reality no longer exists for most people," Archer said. "Virtual communities cannot replace the traditional family, but can it fill some of the space?"

"We may be nostalgic, but we cannot turn the clock back," she said.

As the academy members — economists, sociologists, legal experts and theologians, many of whom are not Catholic — engage in a dialogue with church leaders on social topics, Archer said they notice "gaps in Catholic social teaching because the world is changing so rapidly."

"If you go through the documents, you will find very little on information technology," she said.

Michel Bauwens, a Belgian philosopher and theorist specializing in "peer-to-peer" Internet collaboration, said that "the vision of civil society in the documents is constituted by very formal organizations, which are being substituted by more flexible communities," including those formed by people who meet, socialize, work and share primarily through the Internet.

The philosopher said that cooperative, free projects such as the Linux computer operating system and the Wikipedia Internet encyclopedia are the result of a computer culture that encourages people to participate, work together and make their products available in a form anyone can use and access.

"It runs counter to the overbearing influence of both the market and the state," he said.

"Peer-to-peer work is an exemplar of subsidiarity because each person participates to the degree he or she wants, but to translate that into solidarity is an issue that still needs to be developed," he said.

Archer said, "Solidarity is the huge problem left behind by modernity. There is a huge deficit of solidarity," but increasing connections between and among people is probably the first step toward addressing the problem.

CCHS senior selected as Presidential Scholar

CHARLOTTE — Kristin Hogan, a senior at Charlotte Catholic High School, has been selected as a 2008 Presidential Scholar.

Hogan is one of 139 U.S. high school seniors that have demonstrated academic achievement, artistic excellence, leadership, citizenship and service at school and in their community.

The Presidential Scholars will be honored for their accomplishments in Washington, D.C. June 21-24.

"The 2008 Presidential Scholars shine a bright hope on the future of our country," said U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings. "Not only have these young graduates demonstrated exemplary discipline and achievement in academics and the arts, but they have also exhibited exceptional leadership and service to their local communities."

Hogan, president of the National Honor Society, has taken eight AP classes, founded the Triathlon Club and has been junior and senior student council representative.

Hogan excels in field hockey and track, played varsity basketball as a freshman, traveled to the United Kingdom as part of a People-to-People visit and volunteers as a student counselor and tutor.

and discover their personal discipleship," said Paul Kotlowski, director of the diocesan youth ministry.

"They gathered with the diocesan church to pray with and support one another as young believers," he said.

The Diocesan Youth Advisory Council, comprised of youths from different parishes, chose the conference theme and worked to organize the weekend of events, music, Mass and hero-in-faith-themed workshops, which included topics on religion, salvation and the youths' "superpowers" — their gifts from God.

The conference "helps in getting closer to God and to learn more about our gifts and our ability to bring others to our faith," said Laura Pohlheber, a parishioner of St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte.

"It (the conference) helped me understand more about my religion," said Matthew Pohlheber, Laura's brother.

"I learned what is special about me and my special gifts," he said.

In one workshop, youths explored the similarities and differences of Christianity, Judaism and Islam in "Capes of Different Faiths," presented by Dennis Teall-Fleming, youth minister at Queen of the Apostles Church in Belmont. "Jesus didn't die just for people who believed in him. The plan of salvation is a mystery and known completely only to God."

"Those who have not yet seen the Gospel remain close to God," he said.

Saturday evening, April 26, the youths were treated to a concert by Jesse Manibusan, a Catholic signer and songwriter.

At the closing ceremony on Sunday, April 27, recognition was given to adults Stephanie Gardner and Chris Beal, who have given five years of service to youth ministry.

Other awards were presented to youths and clergy.

The St. Timothy Award, for a youth exemplifying outstanding discipleship, was presented to Molly Sanford, a parishioner of St. Aloysius Church in Hickory.

The Bishop Michael J. Begley Award, for youths involved in social justice and outreach, was presented to Patrick Finegan, a parishioner of St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte.

The Bishop William G. Curlin Award, for an individual or group exemplifying outstanding pastoral care, was presented to Kathy Diener, youth minister at St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte. (Ingeborg Collins, a parishioner of St. Mary Church in Shelby, will receive the award May 11.)

The God and Youth Award, for a parish personnel member who has been generous in their time and talent to youths, was presented to Teall-Fleming.

The Pope John Paul II Award, for ordained men exemplifying love for the youth of the church, was presented to Father James Hawker, vicar for education and pastor of St. Luke Church in Mint Hill.

Father Hawker celebrated the closing Mass. During his homily, he told the youths to "go forth and become heroes, and to do extraordinary things in an ordinary way."

Hugging Mom — in person or in the heart

Mother is name for God on lips, hearts of children

It's three years now since we lost Mom, and while Mother's Day prompts these memories, in truth thoughts of Mom are with me — joyfully — every day.

One never knows exactly what to say to a friend who has suffered the loss of a loved one, especially a mother, but from my own experience I can honestly affirm that God fills the world when she goes with thousands of precious reminders of her presence in song and place and word.

My mom loved Mother's Day, but then she had a child's glee for any holiday, some of which I am convinced she just made up. Holidays replete with her wonderful dinners, board games, long walks and laughter restored the little community of the home.

You never really had to say anything for Mom to know everything. She knew my mind and disposition as I climbed the front steps. There was no hiding your feelings — happy or sad, worried or confident — she knew and knew what to say to lift any burden you carried to her door.

Mom wasn't all talk either. She knew how to get things done, often in far more practical and direct ways than her son, though she would permit me to think that education she worked with me to obtain contributed more than it did.

I don't ever remember seeing my mother depressed or angry. Oh yes, there were those occasions, but I don't remember them. God apparently doesn't permit it. One suspects the Moms' Union in heaven under the stewardship of dear mother Mary saw to this happy bit of situational Alzheimer's.

I do remember Mom and Dad occasionally, well, sparring. Usually over something trivial like whether Dad really agreed to go to that church meeting with her or who forgot the directions for a car trip or who advised taking the last, wrong turn.

Yet, the subtext of any such petty annoyance was unquestioned love.

Mom loved her children with perfect equality, understanding better than any court that equality seldom means the same since there is a uniqueness of spirit that needs constant nourishment.

In doling out the good things in life, whether they be ice cream or pie, if there was not enough, you can bet that Mom would find reason just then to diet or to proclaim disinterest in her favorite treat.

Someone once defined a sweater as that which keeps a daughter warm when Mom is cold. There were no daughters for our mom, but then, as my wife of 35 years touchingly recalls, "Mom always treated me as her special daughter."

Mom died in Holy Week; it was her time. Mom loved God completely, understood him simply, and by accepting his will without resistance she taught her children to do the same.

The English novelist Thackeray once said: "Mother is the name for God on the lips and in the hearts of little children." Older ones too, and we remember well.

Hug your mom today — in person or in your heart. Trust me, she will know either way.

A mother whose life embraces children — and the world

We must care about the poor to be in solidarity with Christ

When the spotlight is put on mothers, not much is said about how we contributed to our church, community, social justice issues, aiding the poor and seeking peace.

Truth is, mothers for a long time have not been limited to a vocation defined by having raised children. We have also worked hard to try to make the world better.

Certainly a mother whose life exemplifies this on a grand scale is Marie Dennis, currently co-president of Pax Christi International and the director of the Maryknoll Office for Global Concerns in Washington, D.C. Maryknoll is a U.S.-based Catholic missionary movement.

I knew little more than Dennis' name until I read her latest book, "Diversity of Vocations." My respect for her soared immediately when I read that she raised six children as a single mother, as I have!

As for the work she has done, she tells you simply, "For most of the past 30 years I have been involved in the work for social justice and peace."

But then if you listen to what she has to say you marvel at her inspiring accomplishments as a single parent of such a big family.

She tells how they lived in an inner-city neighborhood in Washington, D.C., with a small Catholic group called the Assisi Community, which is comprised of religious and lay people striving to live "the Gospel call to work for a more just and peaceful world."

Members put the values of Jesus into practice.

The Assisi Community members were "sharing the dangers and hopes, fears and joys of a largely impoverished part of our nation's capital," Dennis wrote. "The reality of a broken world was on our doorstep."

Yet she affirms, "My children grew in wisdom and benefited enormously from the gift of their experience in the neighborhood."

In fact, her youngest son, who grew up in that community, now describes that experience as one of "tremendous security, of awesome encounters" with people from all over the world who visited the community — "survivors of torture and war, Nobel laureates, authors, theologians, human rights activists, community organizers, social justice advocates."

Marie Dennis was not too long in the Assisi Community when she was asked by Maryknoll to work as the director of its Office for Global Concerns.

"Our goals are clear but very long range: peace on earth, social justice and ecological integrity. We try to educate the U.S. public and decision makers," she explained.

In a conversation I had with this remarkable woman, she told me she got into her life's work when she asked herself: "Who and how am I called to be in this broken world?"

She learned too that at any time "God might spiral us out into unknown areas of life."

A primary concern for her still is poverty. She has seen poverty close up, like how in some places workers produce food and clothing they are unable to buy because they do not make a living wage.

She maintains that we must care about the poor if we are to be in solidarity with Christ's Sermon on the Mount.

Dennis tells of her life, her faith journey really, in her book. And she ends her story by acknowledging that our God is "full of surprises ... inviting us to follow in ways that we don't expect or understand — into places we had not planned to go."

But the bottom line is that we are being "invited to the fullness of life." Dennis is living proof of that.

Christ our hope in defense of life

Most vulnerable are counting on God's love in each of us

I'll remember those sunny spring days for a long time. The skies here in Washington, D.C. were clear and blue. The temperature, perfect, with colorful banners waving in the breeze.

The very daffodils stood tall and fresh — all to welcome Pope Benedict XVI during his first apostolic visit to the United States. It was as if creation itself were giving witness to what his predecessor had called the "new springtime of evangelization" already blossoming in the church.

What fruit might the papal visit now bear as we continue working for the protection of all life?

The theme of the visit was "Christ Our Hope." Throughout his various addresses, Pope Benedict invited Catholics to enter more deeply into relationship with Jesus Christ.

Happiness, peace, freedom and justice cannot authentically derive from any other source, even though the secular influences in culture might have us believe otherwise — that it is possible to live without Christ and still live well.

The Holy Father cautioned against "a growing separation of faith from life: living 'as if God did not exist,'" and exhorted us to remain steadfast in objective truth.

From his homily at Yankee Stadium in New York:

"May you find the courage to proclaim Christ and the unchanging truths which have their foundation in him. They are the truths which alone can guarantee respect for the inalienable dignity and rights of each man, woman and child in our world — including the most defenseless of all human beings, the unborn child in the mother's womb."

Cultivating this kind of faith takes some work on our part. As it says in Hebrews, "faith is the realization of what is hoped for and evidence of things not seen" (Heb 1:11), and so much remains "unseen" in our fight to defend the unborn. Such as:

— When will we have enough justices on the Supreme Court with the wisdom and courage to overturn Roe v. Wade? And when that finally happens, will states be ready to enact laws protecting women and their children from abortion?

— What other cultural and legislative measures will help make abortion unthinkable to men and women alike?

— Will the multigenerational wound of abortion ever start to heal?

— Will the most hardened abortion advocates come to see their deep error and start defending innocent life?

Given all the unknowns, we may sometimes be tempted to discouragement. And yet, we are called to remain bold and joyful in our work, confident that Jesus Christ has already won the war against death.

As the pope encouraged us at St. Patrick's Cathedral:

"The proclamation of life, life in abundance, must be the heart of the new evangelization. For true life — our salvation — can only be found in the reconciliation, freedom and love which are God's gracious gift.

"[O]ur most urgent challenge is to communicate the joy born of faith and the experience of God's love."

The pope's visit surely gave witness to God's love in the world. Let us pray that it will inspire all Christ's followers to do the same — in service to neighbor and enemy alike.

The most vulnerable members of our human family are counting on it.

Christians must persevere in prayer for unity, pope says at audience

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Despite the difficulties and divisions, Christians must persevere in prayer for full unity, Pope Benedict XVI said while the head of the Armenian Apostolic Church looked on.

Just a few days before the feast of Pentecost, the pope shared the stage during his May 7 general audience in St. Peter's Square with Catholicos Karekin II, patriarch of the Armenian Apostolic Church.

The patriarch and a delegation of 18 bishops were in Rome May 6-10 to meet with the pope and Vatican officials, as well as scholars and students at various pontifical institutes.

After the two leaders exchanged greetings before the 30,000 pilgrims in St. Peter's Square, Pope Benedict dedicated the catechesis of his general audience to the theme of Christian unity.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

Today we welcome to our audience, His Holiness Catholicos Karekin II, supreme patriarch and Catholicos of all Armenians, together with a delegation from the Armenian Apostolic Church.

His presence among us, in these days before the solemnity of Pentecost, spurs us to pray more fervently for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon all Christians as we seek to advance along the path of ecumenism.

The Risen Lord sent the Spirit upon his disciples, and from the day of Pentecost, the church has constantly implored the Spirit's gifts, which impel her to proclaim the Gospel before all the world.

The presence and activity of the Spirit remind us that Christ never abandons his church. The Spirit sustains our efforts to overcome division, to persevere in prayer and to work for Christian unity.

Prayer is the heart and soul of the ecumenical movement. Today, let us join in thanking the Lord for the Spirit's work in fostering ecumenical dialogue and inspiring the hope of full unity.

May the gifts of the Spirit lead all Christians to serve the Gospel with generosity and to be a sign of God's love for all humanity. With Mary, let us pray:

"Come, Holy Spirit, fill the hearts of your faithful, and kindle in them the fire of your love! Amen."

The joy of faith

Surrendering to God is gateway to happiness

There are two kinds of faith: natural and supernatural.

Natural faith is the act of believing the information supplied by maps and weather forecasts, for example. Even though we've never met the mapmakers or the weathermen, we take it on faith, natural faith, that they are telling us the truth.

When we demonstrate supernatural faith, we do the same with the words of Jesus. We know he is telling us the truth.

Even though we have never seen him speaking directly to us, we believe by God's grace that the mysteries he taught are the truths of faith: namely, there is a God; we are his creatures; there is an afterlife; Jesus is the divine Son of God; he has come to save and lead us home to eternal life.

We believe the Lord; we are certain he would never deceive us.

Meeting Jesus is a different experience for each one of us. Being human, we have a natural tendency to pick and choose those parts of the Gospel we like, passing over the ones that make us feel uncomfortable.

But Jesus demands total faith. He is like a doctor who says, "If you don't do what I tell you, you will die." He demands obedience for our own good.

Surrendering to the Lord is a religious act. But many ask, "What do we really know about Jesus?"

We know all we need to know.

The late Frank Sheed, a Catholic intellectual of the 20th century, had this to say:

"Jesus was never sentimental, he never wasted words. He said what had to be said, which anyone new to reading the Gospels may take a while to get used to. ... He of all men was not likely to be sentimental about sin. ... He knew what our sinful world would cost him on Calvary."

Once you trust the Lord you begin to gain a greater understanding of the mysteries of faith. For instance, if you believe that God is love, this knowledge will change your life.

If you believe the central mystery of Christianity, namely that Jesus Christ is true God and true man, you immediately know that the God of love has a human face, the face of Jesus who comes into this world to bring you hope and healing.

While you may not be able to explain the mysteries of the deposit of faith, you

Spirituality for Today

can benefit from them nevertheless. The childlike faith of every Christian is the gateway to eternal happiness.

You do not need to comprehend the mysteries of faith fully; all the Lord asks is that you accept them.

Surrendering to natural or supernatural truths on the basis of faith is really quite a reasonable way to live your life.

Some people fear Jesus the same way they fear going to a doctor. Those who are afraid of knowing their true condition tend to trivialize the authority of Jesus.

But those who know the truth, by faith, come to love him with all their hearts. He has both the power and authority to raise the dead, heal the sick and comfort the suffering.

"In him, with him and through him we live and breathe and have our being."

It is just as St. Paul said, "I live, now not I, but Christ lives in me."

Colorful conviction

Swiss Guards show that loyalty to church does not change, pope says

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — In a world of constant change, the Swiss Guards with their colorful traditional uniforms are a sign that loyalty and dedication to the church never go out of fashion, Pope Benedict XVI said.

The pope met May 5 with 33 young Swiss Catholic men who had joined the 110-man corps over the past 12 months. They were to take their official oaths of office the next evening.

Pope Benedict said the corps, formed 502 years ago, was always small, but always dedicated to protecting the pope and his residence.

"After five centuries, the spirit of faith that pushes young Swiss men to leave their beautiful land in order to serve the pope at the Vatican has remained unchanged," he said.

In addition, he said, "the love for the Catholic Church to which you witness with your persons more than with your words" also has remained unchanged.

"Your historic uniforms speak to pilgrims and tourists from all over the world of something that despite everything does not change, that is, they speak of your commitment to serve God by serving the 'servant of his servants,'" the pope told the young men.

Pope Benedict asked the new guards to act as Christians in everything they do and to cultivate a life of prayer.

"Be open, simple and loyal," he said. "Learn to appreciate the differences of personality and character that exist among you because beneath the uniform each of you is a unique and unrepeatable person called by God to serve his kingdom of love and peace."

Pope Benedict told the guards that the corps is not simply a professional military organization, but also is "a school of life" that can help the young men discover their vocations as Christian husbands, priests or religious.

And, in fact, he said he was particularly pleased that long-serving Swiss Guards came to the audience with their wives and children, "who are the most beautiful flowers of your families and remind us of the special love that Jesus had for little ones."

Barber Dominic Spadaro gives a haircut to Ron Alexy, a customer for 37 years, at Spadaro's shop at the Theological College of The Catholic University of America in Washington May 7. Spadaro, 77, has barbered for well-known theologians, nuns and young students alike for 47 years on the campus. He retired May 9.

Barber at CUA retires with many friends after 47 years on campus

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Barber Dominic Spadaro likes to think that barbershop friends are friends for life.

For 47 years in his shop at the Theological College of The Catholic University of America, Spadaro, 77, has barbered for well-known theologians, nuns and young students alike. He has swapped stories, discussed the day's news and shared photos of children — and then grandchildren — with his customer-friends.

He has been a confidant to some and offered advice to others. It comes with his job, especially for someone as familiar as Spadaro has been around the Catholic University campus.

"I get a lot of pleasure from other people's pleasure," he said. "It's a one-on-one kind of relationship. And that's very special."

Spadaro's tenure as a professional barber came to an end May 9, when he cleaned his clippers and folded his crisp striped aprons one last time in his small shop at Theological College and retired to pursue his love of painting, gardening and spending time with family.

For Spadaro, being a barber has been more than just cutting hair. To a certain extent, it's an art, he said. "There's kind of a three-dimensional thing to it," he said. "Painting is a one-dimensional exercise. Even the terminology often used (is of) sculpting hair."

"Every haircut is a challenge. And you never really get used to it even though you do the same person over and over again. It's always a new experience," he said. "My aim is to make them happy. I'm a very painstaking worker."

It's that painstaking approach to just about everything he does that led Spadaro, a member of St. Jane Frances de Chantal Church in Bethesda, Md., to turn to barbering as a career even as his heart was set on becoming an artist.

As a youngster Spadaro would watch and learn from his father, Joseph, who learned the craft of barbering in his homeland of Italy. When times were busy in the family-run shop, Joseph Spadaro would ask his young son to help cut hair.

Spadaro soon took off for Europe to pursue his dream as a painter, but he floated back and forth between Washington and Europe. Every now and then his father would suggest that he return to the barbershop to earn money while he pursued his love of art.

Finally, Joseph Spadaro asked his son to help at the barbershop at Theological College. It didn't take long for Spadaro to realize he could make a better living as a barber than as a painter.

In 1960, the younger Spadaro opened his own shop at Theological College. He has been cutting hair for those who work, study and live in the Catholic community ever since.

It's not unusual as well for old friends from across the country to show up at Spadaro's shop to say hello and get a trim.

When he puts aside his scissors for good, Spadaro will take away memories of the many friendships he has made over the years.

"They're close friendships," he said. "I look forward to their coming here as much as they do getting a haircut. We can talk and visit. The fact that I won't be seeing them is very much felt by me."

Immigration protection extended to workers in Northern Marianas

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Human traffickers were dealt a blow May 8 when President George W. Bush signed a law that extends U.S. immigration law protections to workers in the Commonwealth of Northern Mariana Islands.

An advocate for the workers told Catholic News Service that with the protections immigrants from China and other Asian countries will be less likely to become victims of fraud when they are recruited to work in the U.S. commonwealth, which is a group of 15 small islands just north of Guam.

Good Shepherd Sister Carol McClenon, interim national coordinator of the National Advocacy Center of the Sisters of the Good Shepherd, said a provision of the Consolidated Natural Resources Act will reduce the likelihood that workers will end up in prostitution or in other abusive work situations.

Sister McClenon said the difficulty stemmed from unscrupulous employers who recruit workers for one type of work only to force them into another setting.

The law's provisions will not be fully in place until Dec. 31, 2017, but Sister McClenon said the law allows victims of trafficking who are not U.S. citizens to become eligible for a special visa and other benefits and services that refugees receive.

"I don't believe federalization will stop the problem, but I do believe it will significantly cut down on efforts to deliberately swoosh people in," she said.

The commonwealth has one of the lowest male-to-female ratios in the world, with about 76 men for every 100 women. About 70,000 people live on the islands, according to U.S. census figures, with more than half being non-native workers, most from Asia.

FROM THE VATICAN

Vatican makes Latin-language documents available online

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Latin is online at the Vatican.

Without fanfare, the Vatican's www.vatican.va site has made hundreds of papal and other documents available in a new Latin-language section.

The Latin area went live May 9. Visitors clicking on "Sancta Sedes" (Latin for "Holy See") are taken to a menu of documents arranged by pontificate or Roman Curia office.

Also posted is the complete neo-Vulgate Latin version of the Bible and Latin editions of the Catechism of the Catholic Church, the Code of Canon Law and the documents of the Second Vatican Council.

The papal pages — "Summi Pontifices" — cover the last five popes and include encyclicals and other major texts, as well as a selection of speeches, sermons and messages.

The last entry on the Latin pages provides information about "Latinitas," the Vatican foundation that promotes the use of Latin.

The other languages used by the Vatican Web site are all modern: English, French, German, Italian, Portuguese and Spanish.

In recent years, some Vatican officials have made efforts to revive Latin as the church's lingua franca, but it's been an uphill battle. Fewer and fewer seminarians study Latin, and even many Vatican employees now do not know the language.

Latin has been virtually abandoned at major church gatherings like synods of bishops.

But the ancient language continues to be used at international papal liturgies. Last year Pope Benedict XVI expanded the possible use of the extraordinary form of the Mass, which is celebrated in Latin.

Pope authorizes granting of indulgences for Pauline year events

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Catholics who participate in events connected with the 2008-2009 jubilee year of St. Paul can receive a special indulgence, the Vatican said.

Pope Benedict XVI authorized the granting of a plenary, or full, indulgence in order to highlight the Pauline year and open the way to the "interior purification" of the faithful during its celebration, a May 10 Vatican decree said.

The decree was signed by U.S. Cardinal J. Francis Stafford, head of the Vatican tribunal that deals with indulgences and with matters related to the sacrament of penance.

An indulgence is a remission of the temporal punishment a person is due for sins that have been forgiven.

Pope Benedict established the Pauline year to run from June 28, 2008, to June 29, 2009, to mark the approximately 2,000th anniversary of the saint's birth.

The plenary indulgence is being offered to pilgrims who come to Rome, to Catholics who participate in local events connected to the jubilee year, and to those who may be too ill or otherwise prevented from physical participation.

It can be granted on behalf of the individual petitioner or on behalf of departed souls.

Cardinal Stafford said conditions for the special Pauline year indulgence include the normal requirements set by the church for all plenary indulgences: that the person goes to confession, receives the Eucharist and prays for the intentions of the pope.

The decree explained in detail some specific requirements for the plenary indulgence. It said also that individuals can obtain more than one plenary indulgence during the jubilee year, but not more than one per day.

Vatican astronomer says if aliens exist, they may not need redemption

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — If aliens exist, they may be a different life form that does not need Christ's redemption, the Vatican's chief astronomer said.

Jesuit Father Jose Funes, director of the Vatican Observatory, said Christians should consider alien life as an "extraterrestrial brother" and a part of God's creation.

Father Funes made the remarks in the May 13 issue of the Vatican newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano. He said it was difficult to exclude the possibility that other intelligent life exists in the universe, and he noted that one field of astronomy is now actively seeking "biomarkers" in spectrum analysis of other stars and planets.

These potential forms of life could include those that have no need of oxygen or hydrogen, he said. Just as God created multiple forms of life on earth, he said, there may be diverse forms throughout the universe.

"This is not in contrast with the faith, because we cannot place limits on the creative freedom of God," he said.

"To use St. Francis' words, if we consider earthly creatures as 'brothers' and 'sisters,' why can't we also speak of an 'extraterrestrial brother?'" he said.

Asked about implications that the discovery of alien life might pose for Christian redemption, Father Funes cited the Gospel parable of the shepherd who left his flock of 99 sheep in order to search for the one that was lost.

"We who belong to the human race could really be that lost sheep, the sinners who need a pastor," he said. "God became man in Jesus in order to save us. So if there are also other intelligent beings, it's not a given that they need redemption. They might have remained in full friendship with their creator."

CSS achieves accreditation for international adoptions

Program in 'substantial compliance' with convention standards

CHARLOTTE — Catholic Social Services of the Diocese of Charlotte is in compliance with accreditation standards to ensure proper international adoptions in the best interest of children.

CSS was notified it has achieved Hague Accreditation through the Council of Accreditation as authorized by the U.S. Department of State May 2.

Hague Accreditation attests CSS is in "substantial compliance with the Hague Convention accreditation standards," according to a press release from the Council of Accreditation (COA), an independent, nonprofit child- and family-service and behavioral healthcare accrediting organization.

The Hague Convention is an international treaty created to ensure intercountry adoptions are in the best interest of children and to prevent abduction, exploitation, sale or trafficking of children.

In 1994, the United States signed the treaty and agreed to develop regulations and a monitoring process for adoption service providers in the United States who work with agencies in foreign countries.

Licensed as a child-placing agency since 1948, CSS of the Diocese of Charlotte provides professional domestic and international adoptions based on the highest children welfare standards. The CSS program emphasizes support, preparation and education.

Its international adoption program, based in the CSS Western Region Office in Asheville, places children from several regions in Russia and assists in adopting children from China.

"Achieving Hague accreditation from the Council on Accreditation has been the result of tremendous efforts by social work staff at all three regional offices of Catholic Social Services," said Gerard Carter, CSS Family Life Office director and CSS coordinator for the COA accreditation.

"We are tremendously proud of this achievement because it represents our commitment to providing outstanding international adoption services through adherence to national and international regulations protecting adoptees, their birth parents and adoptive families," he said.

Women's retreat explores hope, healing

CHARLOTTE — Members of the Ignatian Spirituality Team of St. Peter Church in Charlotte recently held a retreat for women.

More than 40 women from parishes in the Diocese of Charlotte attended the retreat May 3, the third retreat for women held at St. Peter Church in the last 12 months.

During the retreat, its theme taken from Mark's Gospel, Ignatian Spirituality Team members Patricia Davies and Kelly Payne led attendees in exploring the meaning of touch in their lives, and the sense of hope and healing experienced by the women in the Gospel.

Jesuit Father Vincent de Paul Alagia, priest in residence at St. Peter Church and director of the Ignatian Spirituality Team, opened the retreat with prayer and closed by celebrating Mass.

The Ignatian Spirituality program was established to promote and foster the spirituality of St. Ignatius in all forms of ministry within the Jesuit-staffed parish. The program consists of various spiritual events and retreats throughout the year that are developed by the parish's Ignatian Spirituality Team.

Noted Catholic biblical scholar and author Scott Hahn speaks during a seminar at Our Lady of Lourdes Church in Monroe May 3.

Scott Hahn discusses faith, Mary, confession

"Jesus is the artist of our redemption."

— Scott Hahn

Mary, confession and the Lord's Prayer.

"Jesus is the artist of our redemption. Mary is his greatest masterpiece," Hahn said. "Love Jesus like Mary does, and love Mary like Jesus does."

Concerning confession (the sacrament of reconciliation), Hahn said, "The more we need it, the less we want it. ... If we don't repent, we begin to resent."

"In the New Testament we have a new grace of forgiveness by Jesus," Hahn added. "That forgiveness is conveyed to the disciples as Jesus tells them in the upper room, 'As the Father sent Me, I send you.' He is giving them the same fullness of authority."

"Our Father" is the centerpiece of the greatest sermon ever preached — the Sermon on the Mount, he said.

"God is not like our Father, he is our Father," Hahn said. "And if God is our Father, we are his family. That is the awesome truth of what it means to be a Catholic Christian."

Parishioners of Our Lady of Lourdes Church worked for months to make Hahn's visit a special event in the history of the parish, which began in 1946.

"This is a big year for us as we are celebrating the 150th anniversary of the apparitions of the holy mother at Lourdes," said Augustinian Father James Cassidy, pastor.

"We invited Scott Hahn and, lo and behold, he accepted," said Becky Wright, parish information technology manager. "We had 512 people registered. It exceeded all our expectations."

The event planners wanted to create a retreat atmosphere for Hahn's visit. Prior to his talk, parishioner June Bullock led attendees in praying the rosary. After the talk, the attendees broke for lunch at picnic tables on the church grounds, many of them discussing Hahn's presentation.

"I could feel the Spirit moving within the church," Wright said.

"It was very inspiring, very moving," said Ashley Smith. "He has a way of speaking that makes you proud to be Catholic, to come alive with what you believe."

Karen Rowan said she had read one of Hahn's books, had seen him on television and was glad to be able to hear him in person.

"Father Jim had requested Dr. Hahn specifically to inspire and confirm us in our faith, and to remind us that we have one mission on earth — to be saints," said Wendy Bigelow.

"His appearance at Our Lady of Lourdes is an incredible gift that elevated our souls to God," she said.

Hahn spent the lunch hour and break time greeting the long line of people wanting to talk to him and have him sign copies of his books. He was clearly pleased by the response, but not surprised.

"Everywhere I go, I see a great spiritual awakening for the church," he said, adding that it spans all age groups and generations.

"There seems to be a great springtime of renewal. It started with Pope John Paul II and is continuing with Pope Benedict XVI," he said. "People are finding out that the church is not legalistic but radically personal."

"Even people who have fallen away from the faith are discovering they don't have to be orphans spiritually," he said. "It's like a coming home."

That touched on a point Hahn told his listeners earlier.

"We are all beggars before God," Hahn said. "He wants to bring us home and make us saints."

Tim Reid is a parishioner of the Baslica of St. Lawrence in Asheville.

Eighth-graders of St. Leo the Great School in Winston-Salem take part in a May crowning ceremony outside of St. Leo the Great Church May 9.

Churches and schools honor Mary during month of May

BY KATIE MOORE
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE—In the Marian Year, 1987, the Holy See issued a document presenting a ritual for honoring images of Mary, the Mother of Jesus, called the "Order of Crowning an Image of the Blessed Virgin Mary."

According to that document, "The queen symbol was attributed to Mary because she was a perfect follower of Christ, who is the absolute 'crown' of creation."

During the month of May, Catholic churches and schools throughout the United States often honor Mary through the ceremonial tradition of May processions and crownings.

This month, several schools and parishes in the Diocese of Charlotte held events in honor of the Blessed Mother.

Our Lady of Mercy School in Winston-Salem held its annual May crowning May 9.

"This is a long-standing Our Lady of Mercy School tradition to honor the Blessed Mother," said Linda Buchmeier mother of three attending the school.

"The eighth-graders lead the school through the ceremonial event," she said.

The students prepared for the May crowning by writing reflections on what Mary means to them and by praying the rosary each day during the month of May.

"The eighth-graders performed research on the series of apparitions by Mary that occurred to young children at Fatima and Lourdes and presented the information to the students," said Buchmeier.

At Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in High Point, the May crowning is a joint effort between the school and the parish. Second-graders from both the school and the faith formation classes at the church lead the ceremony. It is typically held during the week following their first Communion.

Caroline Dau, second-grader at Immaculate Heart of Mary School, was chosen to crown the statue of Mary during a ceremony May 7. A fresh wreath of flowers was placed atop a new statue of Mary in the aptly named Mary's Garden on the church grounds.

"During May, when we honor our own mothers, it's only fitting that we honor the most Blessed Mother and be reminded of Mary's resounding 'yes' to Jesus," said Wanda Garrett, principal of Immaculate Heart of Mary School.

Pope defends church's teaching on artificial birth control

comments as the church prepared to mark the 40th anniversary of the encyclical "Humanae Vitae." Issued by Pope Paul VI July 25, 1968, it affirmed the church's teaching on married love and said use of artificial contraception was morally wrong.

Addressing participants of a church-sponsored conference on "Humanae Vitae," Pope Benedict said the encyclical was a "gesture of courage." He acknowledged that its teachings have been controversial and difficult for Catholics, but he said the text expressed the true design of human procreation.

"What was true yesterday remains true also today. The truth expressed in 'Humanae Vitae' does not change; in fact, in light of new scientific discoveries, its teaching is becoming more current and is provoking reflection," he said.

The pope said the encyclical correctly explained that married love is based on total self-giving between spouses, a relationship that goes far beyond fleeting pleasures or sentiments.

"How could such a love remain closed to the gift of life?" he said.

The pope said the Christian concept of marriage respects the unity of the person, in body and soul. The alternative, he said, is a culture that considers the body an object that can be bought or sold and in which "the exercise of sexuality is transformed into a drug that wants to subject the partner to one's own desires and interests."

"As believers, we can never allow the dominion of the technical to invalidate the quality of love and the sacredness of life," he said.

The pope said this fundamental view of human life and procreation was something that goes back to the creation of man, and thus represents a paradigm for all generations. It is a key part of natural law that deserves universal respect, he said.

"The transmission of life is inscribed in nature and its laws remain as unwritten norms to which everyone should refer," he said.

Any attempt to move away from this principle is destined to remain sterile and without a future, he said.

He said it should also be remembered that true love involves a sense of sacrifice, which is part of a married couple's openness to life.

"No mechanical technique can substitute the act of love that two spouses exchange as a sign of a greater mystery, in which they are protagonists and co-participants in creation," he said.

The pope said he was concerned that adolescents today are not receiving the kind of sexual formation they need in order to make proper decisions and avoid the "risky implications" of their behavior.

He said it does not honor to free and democratic societies when they offer their young people "false illusions" about their own sexuality. Freedom must be tied to truth and responsibility, he said.

He summed up his talk by saying that the 1968 encyclical should be looked at with a broader perspective.

"The teaching expressed in 'Humanae Vitae' is not easy. However, it conforms to the fundamental structure through which life has always been transmitted from the creation of the world, in the respect of nature and in conformity with its demands," he said.

Abortion has not solved problems faced by women, families, pope says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Abortion has not solved the problems plaguing many women and families in the world, Pope Benedict XVI told Italian pro-life groups. Rather, allowing for the termination of a pregnancy has "opened a further wound in our society unfortunately already burdened by deep suffering," he said.

The pope spoke during a May 12 audience at the Vatican with members of Italian pro-life groups.

"Certainly the causes that lead to a painful decision like abortion are many and complex," he said.

But while Catholics promote the sanctity of the life of the unborn, they also should "promote every initiative that supports women and families to create favorable conditions to welcome life and safeguard the family founded on marriage between a man and a woman," he said.

Decriminalizing abortion "not only has not resolved the problems that afflict many women and family members"; it has also caused additional suffering in a troubled world, he said.

He said the church "cannot hide from the different problems that continue to grip today's society," such as the "unfavorable conditions" many young people find themselves in that prevent them from fulfilling their dreams for marriage and a family.

Legislation that helps today's families is needed, he said. Christians have an urgent calling and "binding imperative" to pay witness to "protecting life with courage and love in all its stages," he said.

He praised the pro-life groups and individuals for saving so many lives from death and encouraged them to continue.

Priests work around disruptions to asses quake damage

Wenchuan is less than 60 miles northwest of Chengdu, the provincial capital.

By May 14, government officials reported more than 15,000 people had been killed in the quake, but the death toll was expected to rise. At least 25,000 people were buried under the rubble.

Father Simon Li Zhigang, administrator of the Chengdu Diocese, told UCA News May 13 that he could not reach by phone the priests serving in Wenchuan and Beichuan.

About 100 Catholics live in Wenchuan and several hundred more in Beichuan, he said.

In the Nanchong Diocese, about 150 miles from the epicenter, Sister Wang Yan told UCA News the activities room added to their church building shook for seven minutes and almost everything fell to the floor.

"I thought it was the end of the world," she recalled.

The night after the quake, dozens of laypeople stayed inside a wooden church in Nanchong because they feared sleeping in their damaged brick houses, she said.

In the neighboring Chongqing Diocese, Father Xie Bangyong told UCA News fissures appeared in some old churches after the quake, but all priests and nuns in the city were safe.

Chongqing priests divided into groups to see if parishioners were safe and assess damage to old churches, but it was difficult to contact Catholics in the affected areas, Father Xie added.

Auxiliary Bishop Paul He Zeqing of Wanxian told UCA News the residence for priests and another for nuns in Liangping became unsafe after the quake and was vacated immediately.

"Other churches, all newly built, are not affected," he said.

Bishop He led Catholics in praying for the quake victims during a May 13 morning Mass and urged them to donate to relief efforts.

The Chongqing and Wanxian dioceses are in the Chongqing municipality, formerly part of Sichuan. Jinde Charities, in China's Hebei province, appealed on its Web site for prayers and donations for the quake survivors.

As a Catholic nonprofit organization registered with China's Ministry of Civil Affairs, Jinde provided aid during last summer's flooding in Chongqing and during snowstorms around the Chinese new year earlier this year.

In eastern China, the Shanghai Diocese donated 1 million yuan (US$143,000) for earthquake relief, the diocese's Web site reported.

Bishop Aloysius Jin Luxian of Shanghai directed all parish priests to pray for victims and survivors during special eucharistic adoration sessions May 18 and donate Mass collections that day to the relief effort.

In northeastern China's Heilongjiang province, Bishop Joseph Wei Jingyi of Qiqihar circulated a prayer he wrote asking God to look after the people who were physically and spiritually wounded by the disaster.

In southern China, the Zhongshan-based Tianrun Service in the Jiangmen Diocese used its Web site to urge Catholics to donate medical aid, clothes, tents and money that it would send through the government's civil affairs department or charitable organizations.

At the Vatican, Fides, the news service of the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples, said Catholics in the Diocese of Yi Bin, about 180 miles from Wenchuan, began organizing assistance immediately.

"One of the faithful told us, 'We are followers of Christ; we must witness to Christ in every circumstance, especially at a time like this. We are praying for the peace and safety of our brothers and sisters, for our country, for everyone,'" Fides reported.

Myanmar cyclone victims try to survive amid devastating losses

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

LEIEINTAN, Myanmar — Pascal Than Hlaing is just one of many who are grieving in Leieintan, a village where only one house is left standing and the Baptist and Catholic churches had their roofs torn open.

Than Hlaing mourns the death of two of his three children.

"One of my sons was swept away when the water level was up to his neck," the 31-year-old Catholic father told the Asian church news agency UCA News May 9, referring to his 6-year-old boy.

Cyclone Nargis hammered the Irrawaddy delta region early May 3 as it blew in from the Bay of Bengal, sending a wall of seawater inland for miles.

Several days later, Than Hlaing's 3-year-old son "passed away after he caught a cold."

Now he and his wife are left with their remaining son; they are being sheltered in the Baptist church because their home was destroyed.

A small Catholic Church volunteer group from the Yangon Archdiocese that arrived within days of the cyclone began assisting Than Hlaing and the rest of the 3,000 residents of the village about 75 miles southwest of Yangon.

Leieintan was accessible only by boat, given the trees, downed electricity pylons and other cyclone debris blocking the roads.

The humanitarian disaster littered the partially flooded fields in this and other villages with the decomposing bodies of people and cattle. Other bodies float past in the river.

U.N. officials have said up to 100,000 people are either dead or missing.

The Catholic volunteer group of three laypeople, their parish priest and a priest from Yangon had their work cut out in assessing the enormity of the needs in Leieintan, one of the worst-hit in Yangon archdiocesan territory.

They arrived May 9 and the next day began bringing in food and diesel fuel by boat from Pyapon. The fuel is for running a rice-husking machine in the village and pumping out dirty water from a tank of drinking water.

The church workers also began distributing sacks of rice and clothes.

One of the volunteers, Mary Khin from the Karuna Myanmar Social Services office in Yangon, said she was "shocked" and it "pained" her to see all the dead bodies of people and animals that washed in at night over the delta.

Karuna Myanmar is the local Catholic Church's relief and development organization.

Villagers were trying to come to grips with the tragedy. About 70 were living in the one house left standing, 150 in the Baptist church, and 20 more in St. Joseph's Catholic Church. The rest were staying in the wreckage of their homes.

One woman said her 4-year-old son was washed away by the flood and she and her husband climbed a tree in the dark to stay above the water, which rose to 13 feet. Almost a week later, "our first problem now is food," the 47-year-old woman told UCA News.

On May 8, Archbishop Charles Bo of Yangon hosted the visiting apostolic delegate to Myanmar, Archbishop Salvatore Pennacchio, for a tour of the disaster area. More than 15 villages simply disappeared. About 70 percent of the trees in Yangon were uprooted. All churches, priests' houses and convents have been damaged.

The church in Myanmar has appealed for international aid. The Myanmar Disaster Relief Committee, under the leadership of the Yangon Archdiocese, the local church has begun offering food, clothing, shelter materials and medicine to the affected people.

An earthquake with a magnitude of 7.8 hit China's southwestern Sichuan province. The effects were felt as far away as Beijing and parts of Vietnam.

Author's book examines future of Catholic Worker Movement

BY DENNIS SARDOWSKI
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Although the Catholic Worker Movement in all of its nuances has carried on for 75 years, its future will depend on how community members adapt to a changing world, said Dan McKanan, the author of "The Catholic Worker After Dorothy: Practicing the Works of Mercy in a New Generation," published this year.

"The Catholic Worker is at a crossroad," said McKanan, associate professor and chairman of the theology department at the College of St. Benedict and St. John's University in Minnesota.

"If we are headed into the worst economic crisis since the Depression, then it is a moment for the Catholic Worker to step up and articulate its vision clearly," he said.

The fact that no one person can be considered a leader of the movement today, as co-founder Dorothy Day was between 1933 and her 1980 death, says much about the Catholic Worker's structure, or lack thereof, in McKanan's view.

"It is remarkable that it has gone on for these almost 30 years since Dorothy's death," he said. "There aren't too many movements you can say that about."

That also leaves McKanan with questions about the movement's future.

"The biggest challenge in moving forward for the Catholic Worker is to be a little less reactive and a little more proactive in putting forward a personalist vision for a new society," he said.

"In the early years, the Catholic Worker got a lot of attention because everybody knew the globe was in crisis and (movement co-founder) Peter (Maurin) and Dorothy put forth a very distinctive vision that you could resolve that crisis by bringing people back to the land and caring for others' needs," he said.

McKanan also sees the movement being challenged to "transition to the next generation of leaders."

Catholic Worker houses of hospitality opened during the 1980s have not survived at the same rate as those opening in the two previous decades.

As a friend of the movement, McKanan believes the Catholic Worker must promote a wider range of community models, those that "stir the enthusiasm" of young people who may be attracted to the Catholic Worker life.

"The movement is still leaning on the Vietnam generation," he said. "It will be important for a critical mass in the next generation to make a lifelong commitment to the movement."

We are nourished by Christ's presence in us

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

We sat at the Easter Vigil Mass valiantly trying to stay awake. My friends Tom and Leah, their teenage daughter, Michelle, and I had arrived in this remote Haitian village in the late afternoon after traveling 12 hours.

But it was midnight before the Mass began.

We weren't a bit tired when we first got there because of the excitement of being reunited with our friends. Our church community in Virginia and the parish in Cabestor, Haiti, have had a partnership for a dozen years.

Guided by Tom and Haitian pastor Father Hermann, the parishes together have built three schools and developed several other projects there. In the process, our friendship has become very personal and close.

So when we get together, it's like a family reunion.

Every time a group from our parish visits, our Haitian friends ask by name about members of our church whom they know — even if they only spent a few days with them years ago.

The Virginia parishioners have come to know the Haitians from stories and photos and from Father Hermann's periodic visits to our church.

There is a palpable sense of oneness among the people of both communities, largely because our relationship is based on our shared faith in Jesus — something we continuously talk about and celebrate openly together.

We understand, experientially, this weekend's reading from Corinthians that says we, though many, are one body because we all partake of the same life of Christ.

Whenever I go to Haiti, I am blessed by intense experiences of Jesus, both through old friends and new people I meet each time. We are nourished by his real presence in each other.

In that late Easter watch, we were crowded in among our Haitian brothers and sisters, our skin touching theirs. When Father Hermann offered the eucharistic prayer, he movingly, lovingly reminded us how the blood of Christ flows through his body.

Holding the cup aloft he said, "He took the cup. He remembered Tom, he remembered Leah, he remembered Michelle, he remembered Jean, and he remembered all of us. Again he gave you thanks and praise, gave the cup to his disciples and said, take this, all of you, and drink from it, this is the cup of my blood."

Questions:

How have you experienced being many, but one body, in Christ? How do you — or will you — allow your life to flow into another as nourishment?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"The cup of blessing that we bless, is it not a participation in the blood of Christ?" (1 Corinthians 10:16)

'In the spirit of peace and love'

Pope welcomes Chinese orchestra to Vatican, greets nation's Catholics

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — In welcoming China's Philharmonic Orchestra to the Vatican, Pope Benedict XVI said he was extending a hand of friendship to the Chinese people and greeting the country's Catholics.

The pope also wished the people of China well in their preparations for the upcoming Olympics, calling the games "an event of great importance for the entire human family."

The Beijing-based, state-run orchestra, together with the Shanghai Opera House Chorus, performed for the first time a concert in honor of the pope in the Vatican's Paul VI hall May 8. Led by conductor Yu Long, the 145 musicians and singers performed Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's "Requiem" and a Chinese folk song, "Jasmine Flower."

Some 7,000 people, including top Vatican officials and diplomats, attended the hourlong concert.

Before the performance, Yu said the concert was of "historical significance" and said he hoped it would "help spread a message of peace and love."

"As the leading symphony in China, it is our unwavering belief that music can serve as a powerful instrument to deepen cultural understanding among people of all nations," Yu said.

He said the musical repertoire chosen for that evening "reflects the value of every man and woman in the world, regardless of cultural difference, in the spirit of peace and love."

The pope, an aficionado of Mozart and classical music, sat in a special chair in the middle aisle of the audience hall.

In remarks at the end of the performance, the pope said, "Music and art in general can serve as a privileged instrument for encounter and reciprocal knowledge and esteem between different populations and cultures."

He praised the orchestra's "high-quality musical performance" and thanked the musicians in Chinese at the end of his speech. The pope noted "with pleasure" the orchestra and choir's interest in European religious music.

All different cultures can appreciate music with religious themes, such as Mozart's "Requiem," because all music "transcends the boundaries of every individual culture" and "expresses universal human sentiments," he said.

The pope said the performance also helped put the audience "in touch, as it were, with the living reality of the world of China" and helped them better understand "the history of the Chinese people, their values and their noble aspirations."

Exciting, well-crafted film marred by edgy elements

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — "The Chronicles of Narnia: Prince Caspian" brings C.S. Lewis' revered mythical realm of magic, adventure and talking animals back to theaters May 16.

A follow-up to 2005's successful "The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe," "Prince Caspian" will present a Narnia, as a character says in the film, as a "more savage place than you remember."

Not only have the Pevensie siblings (and the actors playing them) grown a bit older and found themselves wrestling with teenage angst and problems (such as fighting bullies in a World War II-era London Underground station), but the story of "Prince Caspian" — with its slightly darker, edgier tone — seems to be geared toward a more mature crowd.

Granted, the increase in violence quotient is modest, and the film is well-crafted, well-acted and sprinkled with intermittent humor, themes of bravery and heroism and Christian allegory. But it also contains minor ethnic and cultural overtones and a general attitude toward war that some viewers may find problematic.

Courageous individual and communal sacrifice in the service of peace is the ultimate theme, and the costs of war are emphasized. But depicting armed conflict, no matter how honorable, as a feasible — let alone morally justifiable — solution is another matter.

Set one year after the events in "Wardrobe" (but 1,300 years in Narnian time), the siblings are summoned back to Narnia by Prince Caspian. His uncle, Miraz, rules the kingdom following the invasion by his people, the Telmarines, who have forced Narnia's residents into hiding. The Pevensies quickly join forces with Caspian, who pledges to lead a revolt against Miraz. This leads to a climatic battle — with bloodless yet fairly graphic fighting — that will decide the fate of Narnia.

The special effects and scenery are again top-notch, and nature (on the side of the righteous and faithful) plays a key role in vanquishing the enemy. The religious allegory revolves around whether Aslan, the messianic lion, will return to help his beloved Narnians.

The film contains much battlefield violence and deadly hand-to-hand combat, a decapitation, a brawl involving schoolchildren, some intense scenes of child peril and several frightening sequences. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG — parental guidance suggested. Some material may not be suitable for children.

ASHEVILLE — Asheville Catholic School recently became a temporary gateway for those wanting to experience "Arabian Nights."

Students put on a colorful production of "Aladdin Junior" at the school May 1-3.

"Aladdin Junior" is a one-act, seven-scene theatre musical adapted from the animated Disney film "Aladdin." The play is a part of the Broadway Junior Collection by Music Theatre International.

"Aladdin," released in 1992, was based on a version of the story of Aladdin and the magic lamp, one of the tales of medieval Arabian origin in "One Thousand and One Nights."

The Asheville Catholic production featured colorful costumes, and music supplied by religion coordinator Rita Pisano on piano and music teacher Tiffany Gallozzi on clarinet.

"Aladdin Junior" was chosen as this year's student production "purely for entertainment," said Pisano.

"I wanted something the students would recognize. Last year's play, 'Godspell,' was completely new to them," she said.

"Next year, we'll probably do something new to them again," she added.

Tryouts for roles began last fall and were open to any students wanting to participate. Eighth-graders made up the production crew.

Seventh-grader Bryan Head played Aladdin, the street urchin who finds a magic lamp and releases the Genie, played by seventh-grader Abbie Sigmon.

Sixth-grader Clark Wilson played Grand Vizier Jafar, who plots to overthrow the sultan, played by seventh-grader Phillip Dorsey. Seventh-grader Abby Lenderman played Jasmine, the sultan's daughter.

Triad-area women put on 'Nunsense' for high school

KERNESVILLE — Bishop McGuinness High School in Kernersville recently staged a version of the musical comedy "Nunsense" to raise money for its drama department.

With a cast of adults from the Triad Area Catholic Schools community, the production was held at the school April 25-27.

Based on the off-Broadway production, "Nunsense" is about five of 52 surviving religious order sisters who try to raise money to bury the other sisters who died of food poisoning.

"It is a hysterical show with many mishaps along the way," said Tracy Shaw, a teacher at St. Pius X School in Greensboro who starred in the Bishop McGuinness production.

Also starring were Sister of St. Joseph Anne Thomas Taylor, dean of students at Bishop McGuinness; Micki Sharpe, drama program director at Bishop McGuinness; Pat Hernandez, development director at Bishop McGuinness; Elissa Brannen, teacher's assistant at Our Lady of Mercy School in Winston-Salem; and Amy Weckworth, a parent of students in both Bishop McGuinness and St. Pius X School.

Perspectives

A collection of columns, editorials and viewpoints

Relatively speaking, it's all about me

Relativist views lead to decline of moral foundation, says pope

A tourist riding the subway under Manhattan turned to the person next to him and asked, "Can you tell me where I should get off for the Metropolitan Museum of Art?"

"Sure," said the New York native obligingly. "Just watch where I get off and get off two stops before."

This is relativism in its purest form. Relativism is a concept that has acquired recent prominence because of pointed criticism from Pope Benedict XVI.

"Have you noticed how often the call for freedom is made without ever referring to the truth of the human person?" the pope asked at an appearance before 25,000 young people during his recent trip to the United States.

"Some today argue that respect for freedom of the individual makes it wrong to seek truth, including the truth about what is good. In some circles to speak of truth is seen as controversial or divisive and consequently best kept in the private sphere.

"And in truth's place — or, better said, in its absence — an idea has spread which, in giving value to everything indiscriminately, claims to assure freedom and to liberate conscience."

"This we call relativism," the pope said.

Relativism holds that there is no objective truth; therefore, there is no right or wrong. It asserts that there are no absolute truths or values; rather, they are all determined by time, culture, society and persons.

Relativism all but rules out the possibility of common values which makes it profoundly anti-community.

That's why relativism is popular: It's all about me. As a full-of-himself author once said after monopolizing a conversation, "Well, enough about me. What did you think of my book?"

The ability to distinguish right from wrong and the freedom to act on those decisions make the human person different from any other being, the pope said.

That isn't Catholic — or Christian — in origin. In fact, it is not new, having had its origins in Greek philosophy.

Thousands of years ago Plato dealt with the question of all things being relative to individuals, the appearance of things in the eye of the beholder and man being the measure of all things.

Many Americans believe moral truth always depends on the situation, rejecting the idea of unchanging moral absolutes in the name of freedom.

"But what purpose has a 'freedom' which, in disregarding truth, pursues

Extra! Extra!

STEPHEN KENT
CNS COLUMNIST

what is false or wrong?" the pope asked the young people he addressed.

A widespread skepticism about the existence of moral truths and objective moral law brings a crisis of culture. Freedom as personal autonomy is a powerful force in culture.

True freedom is the freedom to search for the truth; it is not unrestrained license.

The irony is this: That which is touted as free actually limits the search for truth because it makes us satisfied with something much less: ourselves.

"Relativist views lead to a decline of the moral foundation," said the pope. "How many young people have been offered a hand which in the name of freedom or experience has led them to addiction, to moral or intellectual confusion, to hurt, to a loss of self-respect, even to despair and so tragically and sadly to the taking of their own life?"

Relativism is popular because it is all about me, and there certainly is nothing more important than me. Advertising tells me that incessantly 24/7.

The "Me Generation" is criticized for its materialism, for its conspicuous consumption encapsulated in their contention that "they who die with the most toys wins."

At least they have a standard of measurement.

Roadmap for a "Journey of Hope"

Pope outlines steps, essentials for bettering world

Pope Benedict XVI was speaking to about 25,000 seminarians and young people on the next-to-last day of his six-day visit to the U.S. when he said, "Walking in the Lord's footsteps, our own lives become a journey of hope."

He might just as well have had all Christians in mind as he mapped out this path of discipleship.

He recalled that St. Peter urged all Christians to "proclaim the Lord Christ" and to "have your answer ready for people who ask the reason for the hope that is within you" (1 Pt 3:15).

This successor of Peter repeated St. Peter's challenge, sharing "some thoughts about being disciples of Jesus Christ."

Pope Benedict described discipleship as "walking in the Lord's footsteps." Take that walk, he said, and your life becomes "a journey of hope."

Twice in the talk the pope urged his hearers to offer "an outstretched hand of hope" to those they meet along the way, and by that simple gesture perhaps "awakening in them a life of faith."

After recalling that his own teenage years "were marred by a sinister regime" (Nazism in Germany) that was eventually "recognized for the monster it was," he went on to say that the "power to destroy ... never triumphs."

We recall this most dramatically, he said, in the season of Easter, and he noted that the conviction that the power to destroy never triumphs "is the essence of the hope that defines us as Christians."

Unbelievers must first see some signs of hope before they will be prompted to ask, as St. Peter said they would, about "the reason for the hope that is within you," the pope said.

By making the "hand of hope" visible in our time, we Christians can help to dispel the darkness of heart and mind in our world.

That darkness sets in, he said, "when people, especially the most vulnerable, encounter a clenched fist of repression or manipulation rather than a hand of hope."

He had in mind those "affected by drug and substance abuse, homelessness and poverty, racism, violence and degradation — especially of girls and women."

Acknowledging that the causes of these problems are "complex," Pope Benedict said they are rooted in "a poisoned attitude of mind" and a certain "callousness of heart."

"Such tragedies also point to what might have been and what could be, were there other hands — your hands — reaching out," he said. "We are tempted to close in on ourselves, to doubt the strength of Christ's radiance, to limit the horizon of hope. Take courage! ... Let your imaginations soar freely along the limitless expanse of the horizons of Christian discipleship."

He then outlined a roadmap for discipleship by calling attention to "four essential aspects of the treasure of our faith: personal prayer and silence, liturgical prayer, charity in action, and vocations."

In personal prayer and silence you can hear God's call, he continued. You can "look about you with Christ's eyes, listen with his ears, feel and think with his heart and mind."

Out of this prayer "hope in action" can emerge. Putting it bluntly, Pope Benedict asked the young: "Are you ready to give all as he did for truth and justice?"

When he turned to vocations, he first praised "the vocation of marriage and family life," and then urged consideration of the call to priesthood and religious life.

In responding to your own vocational call, he said, "Remember that what counts before the Lord is to dwell in his love and to make his love shine forth for others."

Letter to the Editor

Better word needed to describe Latin-language Mass

I cringed when I read the headline, "Back to the 'old Mass,'" (May 2).

The word "old" has many connotations, some of them derogatory. "Latin-language" or "traditional" are much nicer words and more accurately describe the church's Mass of the last 2,000 years. Surely you could have given a better title to the article.

Before we go running to convert others

Effective evangelization begins with our own conversion

What would happen if we prayed for the conversion of Muslims as we once prayed for the conversion of Russia? Presently Muslims outnumber Catholics worldwide, and they are also out-evangelizing us.

In our ecumenical age, how should Catholics approach evangelizing Muslims or members of any other faith group? Do we aggressively pursue them, or is it more proper to respect each other's religion and co-exist in hopes that unity will result?

Cardinal John Henry Newman, a convert to Catholicism himself, once wrote, "Everywhere with Catholics, to make converts is doing something; and not to make them, is 'doing nothing.'" He then gives us his version of conversion.

"To me conversions are not the first thing, but the edification of Catholics is. ... I am afraid to make hasty converts of educated men, lest they should not have counted the cost, and should have difficulties after they have entered the church. ... The church must be prepared for converts, as well as converts prepared for the church."

Cardinal Newman would tell us we should be more active in trying to make converts, but not in the sense of going into Muslim neighborhoods and proclaiming Catholic doctrine.

Our first priority must be to look into ourselves and ask, "How deep is my commitment to Christ and a truly Christian life?"

Pope John Paul II would second this, telling us, "New evangelization is not a matter of merely passing on doctrine but rather of a personal and profound meeting with the savior. ... It is important to recall that evangelization involves conversion, that is, interior change."

Years ago there in an interview with a Vietnamese communist a reporter asked, "How could your people convert to communism when your culture was French Catholicism?"

The man replied, "Because Catholics weren't very Christian; they didn't mirror Christ!"

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

Cardinal Newman and Pope John Paul challenge us to ask, "Do we mirror Christ to the point of attracting non-Catholics? Do we cause them to wonder why we love one another as we do, and what is it we have that they don't have?"

Cardinal Newman's and Pope John Paul II's love for the church ran very deep, and they wanted others to share in it. But they were also realistic in understanding that Catholics aren't all that unified.

Today especially we have many more "cafeteria Catholics" than before who pick and choose but never fully commit to the totality of Catholicism.

There is an old saying, "United we stand, divided we fall." Until we cultivate a deep love for Christ that first inspires us to be one with him and his church, praying for the conversion of Muslims and others will be much less effective.

Effective evangelization begins with our own conversion.

Pope says real dialogue looks for truth, unity

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Real dialogue is not a superficial exchange of ideas, Pope Benedict XVI said.

"The true spirit of dialogue looks not for the things that separate us, but for the truth" whose light will cast aside all that is false and unite on the basis of experiencing what is true, he said.

At his May 14 general audience in St. Peter's Square, the pope spoke about a sixth-century author whose writings have been attributed to a first-century disciple of St. Paul, Dionysius the Areopagite.

Instead of reading from his prepared text, the pope spoke extemporaneously about this "rather mysterious" author who created the "first mystical theology" in the Christian tradition.

The author's work is in essence "a cosmic (hymn of) praise" in which all of God's creatures praise their maker, he said.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

In today's catechesis, we turn to the teaching of a sixth-century author whose writings have been attributed to the first-century disciple of St. Paul, Dionysius the Areopagite.

His two principal works, "The Divine Names" and "Mystical Theology," strive to present a knowledge of God which surpasses rational understanding and culminates in spiritual perfection and transforming contemplation.

Pseudo-Dionysius stresses the apophatic or "negative" understanding born of pondering God's infinite transcendence and otherness. By contemplating what God is not, and by entering more deeply into the rich symbolic language of Scripture, we grow in our relationship with the One who reveals himself in hiddenness.

Contemplation is thus an ascent leading from purification to illumination, perfection and union with God.

In the West, Dionysius' writings influenced the early scholastics and St. Thomas, as well as St. Teresa of Avila and St. John of the Cross.

His vision of a great cosmic harmony reflecting the beauty of the Creator and the love freely bestowed on us in Christ can also inspire our efforts to work for unity, reconciliation and peace in our world.

Becoming a Marian family

Suggestions for developing, deepening love for mother of God

We've written a number of books over the years, but "Encyclopedia of Mary" is the only one we began with an apology.

After several years of researching and writing, we knew there was no way to include all the variations of all the Marian devotions and traditions worldwide.

We also knew — for certain — that Mary is loved. In country after country and culture after culture, people have chosen her as "theirs" and they see themselves as "hers." It's an amazing display of affection and trust that goes back to apostolic times.

The month of May — dedicated to Marian devotion since the 16th century — is a good time to consider how your family can develop or deepen its own love for the mother of God.

Here are a few suggestions:

- Imitate Mary's openness to God's will in her life.
- The Gospel of Luke tells us that God's invitation that she become the mother of the Messiah startled her but she immediately answered yes. Pay attention to where, when and how God is asking you or your family to do something and, imitating Mary, accept that invitation.
- Choose a family Marian devotion or image.

There are countless Marian images and devotions, many with fascinating histories or pious legends. Find one that "fits" and place that sacramental (that image) in your home.

- Ask for Mary's intercession to help your family. Say the rosary as a family, or a decade of the rosary. Add a Hail Mary to grace before dinner.
- Learn more about the four Marian doctrines of the church: Mary as the mother of God, her Immaculate Conception, her perpetual virginity and her assumption.
- Learn, too, about the particular devotion shown to Mary, which isn't "worshipping" her. Only God is worshipped. Only God is adored.
- The theological term used to describe homage shown to the saints is "dulia," and to Mary it's "hyperdulia." Adoration of God is "latria."
- Design a "Mary garden" or at least plant a few "Mary plants."

It was a medieval custom to plant small gardens with flowers, herbs and shrubs associated with Mary. That tradition was revived in the mid-20th century in the United States and Europe.

There are hundreds (yes, hundreds!) of plants that tradition and custom associate with Mary. To name just a few, there's baby's breath (our Lady's veil), columbine (our Lady's slippers), daffodil (Mary's star), forget-me-nots (eyes of Mary), marigold (Mary's gold), rose (emblem of Mary) and tulip (Mary's prayer).

- Set up an outdoor or indoor shrine.
- It doesn't have to be elaborate: a print or statue, a few flowers, a candle. A reminder that your family can turn to "your mother" for help.
- Attend your parish's May crowning. Have your own service at home.
- Make a pilgrimage to a Marian shrine in your area.

The University of Dayton, a Marianist school, is home to the Marian Library and the International Marian Research Institute. As their Web site ("The Mary Page") explains:

"Our goal is to gather and present information about the Virgin Mary and to lead people to a loving knowledge of her. Learning more about Mary, we develop a fuller knowledge of Christ, his church and Christian life."

A pilgrimage toward Christ

Cardinals, bishops to be among Americans at eucharistic congress

BY ART BABYCH
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

QUEBEC CITY — About 40 cardinals and bishops from the United States are among the nearly 500 Americans who have registered for the 49th International Eucharistic Congress in Quebec City June 15-22.

Not surprisingly, said Msgr. Jean Picher, secretary-general of the congress, most who have signed up are from the northeastern United States, an area geographically close to Quebec.

He said in an interview in late April that many of them also have ancestral links to Quebec, founded 400 years ago by Samuel de Champlain and known as “the cradle of French civilization in America.”

“I think this number could easily double in the next few weeks because it’s so easy to travel from the United States to Canada,” said Msgr. Picher. “And we would like very much to have American Catholics share their religious experience with us.”

Archbishop Donald W. Wuerl of Washington will be the first speaker at the opening plenary session the first full day of the congress, June 16.

Archbishop Wuerl is chairman of the U.S. bishops’ Committee on Evangelization and Catechesis and chairman of the board of the National Catholic Educational Association.

The official opening ceremony and the opening of the eucharistic adoration sites are to be held June 15 in the coliseum in ExpoCite, the exhibition complex where most of the congress events and the plenary sessions will be held.

For the weeklong congress the complex is being dubbed “Eucharist City.”

“ExpoCite is a big complex where you have six or seven buildings,” said Sister Doris Lamontagne, a member of the Little Franciscans of Mary and assistant secretary-general of the congress.

“The coliseum will be used in the mornings for the plenary sessions, and we’ll use a small hall near the middle of ExpoCite for the perpetual adoration,” she said.

The youth-inspired Ark of the New Covenant — an icon-covered chest carried on foot to the more than 70 dioceses and eparchies in Canada — will be housed in the chapel throughout the congress.

— Msgr. Jean Picher

The ark’s pilgrimage began in Rome two years ago with a papal blessing and will arrive in Quebec City May 25 for the feast of Corpus Christi.

Sister Lamontagne said that because of the ark’s travels and the publicity it has generated many people have been able to reflect on the importance of the Eucharist and the “presence of Jesus” in their lives.

As a result, the people who come to the Congress “will be an expression of the many other people who will be in touch with this event throughout the week,” she said.

There are still many details to be resolved before the congress begins, “but I think it will be a wonderful adventure,” said Msgr. Picher, who attended the International Eucharistic Congress in Guadalajara, Mexico, in 2004.

The congress is part of the celebration of Quebec’s 400th anniversary and the 350th anniversary of the appointment of Blessed Francois de Laval as Canada’s first bishop.

CHARLOTTE — "It was a regular first day of school," said Sister Helene Nagle, a Sister of St. Joseph, recalling her first day as principal at St. Ann School in Charlotte.

"The students were all dressed up and cleaned up for an exciting day," she said.

And that was just the beginning. During the next two decades, she would experience that feeling of first-day excitement 17 more times with the start of every new school year during her tenure as principal at the school.

When it came to setting goals for that first year, she said, "I knew I needed to learn the environment first."

"You don't come in with ideas," said Sister Nagle. "You want to see how everything operates."

In Brief

Current and upcoming topics from around the world to your own backyard

MASS AROUND THE WORLD

CNS BY KAREN CALLAWAY, CATHOLIC NEW WORLD

David Heimann, pastoral associate at St. Ignatius Church in Chicago, gives a presentation to parishioners about his recent yearlong trip around the world. Heimann, 33, visited 365 different parishes around the globe in 2007 for daily Mass.

Chicago man attends Mass at 365 parishes around the world in 365 days

CHICAGO (CNS) — David Heimann's dream was to spend 365 days in 365 different places, each destination a new opportunity to experience Christ made flesh in our world today.

"Forget about it," his spiritual director told him. "If you can forget about it, then it was nothing, but if it keeps coming back to your heart, then it is something of the Spirit, and we need to pay attention to it."

He could not forget.

Heimann, 33, pastoral associate of St. Ignatius Church in Chicago, has since made his dream a reality, having visited 365 different parishes around the globe in 2007 for daily Mass, with the support of Ad Sodalitatem, a group dedicated to "evoking solidarity in the Roman Catholic Church through prayer, education and development of the poor by building personal relationships with Christians throughout the world."

"I abandoned everything I knew," Heimann said. "I left my fishing nets at the boat. I followed."

Every day, he began with the same simple prayer: "Lord, lead me where you need me to go and show me what you need me to see." And every day he felt his prayer was answered.

On his pilgrimage, Heimann came to realize that true holiness comes from the miracle of Christ's body in the Eucharist, wherever it is celebrated.

"The beauty of the Eucharist is not in how much gold is around our tabernacles but how we have surrounded our hearts with the sanctuary of love we experience in the Eucharist," he said.

It was in this love that he found the consistent comfort of Christ's presence throughout such constant change.

"The Eucharist was the center of the experience — even when I felt lost and abandoned, I always understood the Eucharist," Heimann said. "You can go to a poor village in Zimbabwe and still experience the same love. It was always there."

Heimann said he now better understands "the mystery of the church as being one body yet diverse in its members."

Heimann now realizes that, more than a physical journey, it is the spiritual journey that counts.

"America doesn't do pilgrimage because we think we've already arrived," he said. "We think this is the Holy Land. In doing so we've lost that sense that there's another journey that we must make, one to the center that lives in the heart of every human being."

"This discipline of being a pilgrim is recognizing that our ultimate home is not here — our ultimate home is in heaven," he said.

Catholic leaders decry court ruling striking down ban on gay marriage

SAN FRANCISCO (CNS) — Archbishop George H. Niederauer of San Francisco and other California Catholic leaders condemned the May 15 ruling by the California Supreme Court that struck down the state's ban on same-sex marriage.

In a statement released shortly after the ruling, Archbishop Niederauer said Catholic teaching on marriage is clear and based on the teaching of Jesus Christ, who said God "made them male and female" and "for this reason a man shall leave his father and mother and be joined to his wife."

"At a moment in our society when we need to reinforce the strength of marriage and family, this decision of the Supreme Court takes California in the opposite direction," he said.

Several gay and lesbian couples joined the city of San Francisco and gay rights groups to sue the state government to overturn the ban on same-sex marriage.

The 4-3 ruling — which said that domestic partnerships currently recognized by the state are an inadequate substitute for marriage — would make California the second state after Massachusetts to allow same-sex couples to wed.

Opponents said they would fight the ruling; the court's order was to become final in 30 days.

"This action challenges those in society who believe in the importance of the traditional understanding of marriage to deepen their witness to the unique and essential role that marriage between a man and a woman has in the life of society," Archbishop Niederauer said.

Catholic groups and others are supporting efforts to put a measure on the Nov. 4 ballot to define marriage as between a man and a woman.

FROM THE VATICAN

Vatican to participate in expo on water, sustainable development

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican said it hopes its participation in a world exposition on water will remind people of their responsibility to safeguard and share this "precious gift."

Cardinal Renato Martino, president of the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace, said because water is essential to survival everyone, especially the poor, has a right to it.

Cardinal Martino said that through the Vatican's presence at the June 14-Sept. 14 Expo Zaragoza 2008 the Vatican hopes to remind people "the role of humanity in protecting water will be enhanced."

The cardinal was one of a number of speakers at a May 19 Vatican press conference unveiling plans for the Vatican pavilion at the expo in the northern Spanish city of Zaragoza. The expo is also dedicated to sustainable development.

Organizers said 104 nations and organizations were to be represented at the expo.

Cardinal Martino noted that much of what has been said recently about the earth and its resources has been "gloom and doom."

Such a catastrophic vision of the future "is paralyzing," he said, and therefore the Vatican wanted to "concentrate on water as an integral part of our Catholic faith" and "to look at what people can do while facing these threats" such as global warming and desertification.

The Vatican wants "to celebrate water as a life-giving sign of the presence of God in creation," he said.

Cardinal Martino also announced that July 10-12 the Vatican and the Archdiocese of Zaragoza will host an international congress on ecology.

Congress participants will give talks on intelligent design and people's ethical responsibility toward nature and human life.

Pope encourages Christians to support, engage in missionary work

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Every Christian has an obligation to share the love of Christ with others and the primary means for doing so is to engage in or support the church's missionary activity, Pope Benedict XVI said.

"It is love that must push us to proclaim to all men and women the truth that saves with frankness and courage," the pope said May 17 in a meeting with participants in the annual assembly of the pontifical missionary societies.

The assembly brought together top Vatican officials and the 129 national directors of the missionary societies: the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, the Holy Childhood Association, the Society of St. Peter Apostle and the Missionary Union of Priests and Religious.

While the societies are instruments for the promotion and support of the church's missionary activity around the world, they also are expressions of each diocese's and each nation's commitment to mission, the pope said.

The local church, he said, must be "the place where the Spirit manifests himself with the richness of his charisms, giving each of the faithful the call and the responsibility for mission."

Mission aims to bring all people together into the one body of Christ, preserving and valuing the gifts of each individual person and culture, the pope said. It counters the tendency of divisiveness "rooted in humanity because of sin," he said.

"The mission of the evangelization of humanity remains urgent and necessary," Pope Benedict said.

As with St. Paul, who traveled throughout the Mediterranean preaching salvation in Christ, the pope said "it is the love of Christ" that motivates the desire to share the gift of faith.

The love of Christ is "a love that must radiate everywhere and reach the heart of every man and woman," he said.

Economic toll of health care crisis threatens all, CHA president says

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Adding up the economic toll on the nation caused by the health care crisis, the head of the Catholic Health Association urged the United States to "act in its own best interest and in the interest of its people" to solve the problem.

Sister Carol Keehan, a Daughter of Charity who is CHA president and CEO, spoke on health care reform at the City Club of Cleveland May 16. The club's prestigious Friday Forum has hosted speakers that include U.S. presidents and public figures.

Sister Keehan presented what she called "a very ugly picture of what many people in our country are having to cope with." With the U.S. spending 16 percent of its gross domestic product on health care and other developed countries spending a median of 8.5 percent, U.S. businesses face "a serious competitive disadvantage," she said.

U.S. firms also pay twice as much for health insurance as their foreign competitors, she added, citing a recent study. But that does not result in better health care or reduced mortality in the U.S., she said.

She called the estimated 18,000 unnecessary deaths that result annually in the U.S. because of the lack of insurance or underinsurance "a silent tsunami that we are ignoring every year."

Knightly donation

St. Matthew Knights donate funds to Allegro Foundation

CHARLOTTE — St. Matthew Knights of Columbus Council 10852 recently donated $5,000 to an organization working with disabled children.

Council members presented the funds to the Allegro Foundation from the Knights' L.A.M.B. Foundation of North Carolina April 22.

This is the fifth year Council 10852 has donated to the Allegro Foundation, a nonprofit organization that works on enhancing the quality of life for children with disabilities.

"We are so grateful to the St. Matthew Knights of Columbus for their continued support through the years," said Patricia Farmer, Allegro founder and director.

"Since we are a small nonprofit organization that is not a United Way agency, the steady support of the Knights of Columbus is instrumental in helping Allegro to continue growing," said Farmer. "We feel blessed to have them as a part of the Allegro family."

The L.A.M.B. (Least Among My Brethren) Foundation, a nonprofit public charity that assists the intellectually disabled, is supported by the Knights of Columbus councils throughout North Carolina.

Knights raise funds for the foundation through annual Tootsie Roll sales as well as corporate and individual donations.

A good Rule to live by

Couple celebrates lives of faith as Secular Franciscans

BY JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
CORRESPONDENT

ARDEN — Next month, Barbara and Larry Carter will celebrate a total of 127 years as Secular Franciscans.

Larry, 90, made his permanent Secular Franciscan profession June 15, 1941; Barbara, 84 this June, made her profession June 20, 1948.

Parishioners at St. Barnabas Church in Arden, they are also members of St. Francis of the Hills Fraternity of the Secular Franciscan Order (SFO).

They joined the fraternity, now located in Hendersonville, about a year after its establishment in Maggie Valley in 1987.

"They (Barbara and Larry) encourage everyone just by their presence, and they're attentive to each person," said Patricia Cowan, a charter member of St. Francis of the Hills Fraternity and its current formation director.

"They always see something as new; nothing ever gets old," Cowan continued. "They're just as excited about coming to meetings as they were when they first joined our fraternity. They're just very special people."

Larry credits "the example of my grandmother and my mother" for his entrance into the order.

"I think my mother (who died at age 85) was the oldest one in her fraternity. They were always helping somebody," he said.

That included people from poor neighborhoods. "They would come over to our house, and my mother always fed them," Larry said.

Larry joined St. Elizabeth Fraternity in Southfield, Mich., about two years before he entered the U.S. Army and was sent to Lancashire, England, as a member of an engineer unit attached to the U.S. Army Air Corps.

When off duty, he visited Secular Franciscan fraternities, attending meetings in Taunton, England and Cardiff, Wales.

Secular Franciscans are "supposed to take care of the widows and the orphans," he said, so he and another soldier asked the local parish priest about orphanages. Learning that there were two nearby, both run by Missionary Sisters of St. Francis, he and other members of his unit started visiting the children.

"We'd take trucks full of GIs over to the orphanages, and the kids would really swamp them," Larry said. "A lot of the kids wrote to me after I got home."

Mustering out of the Army in 1946, Larry returned to his pre-war job, sorting industrial diamonds in Detroit, Mich.

He met Barbara at a young people's club in Royal Oak, Mich. At the end of a six-month engagement, they married Feb. 1, 1947.

Getting settled back into civilian life, Larry hadn't been to SFO meetings since coming home, but then he returned to St. Elizabeth Fraternity.

At that time, Secular Franciscans observed their Rule as Pope Leo XIII had updated it in 1883. Under that Rule, if a woman wanted to join the SFO, she had to have her husband's permission. For Barbara, permission wasn't an issue.

"At the time I wasn't sure, I really wasn't, but during the year of formation it really took," she said.

What attracted her?

"First of all, the people in the fraternity," she said. "They were so welcoming, so eager to answer my questions."

Since the SFO Rule was further updated in 1978, Secular Franciscans wear a T-shaped Tau cross as a sign of their commitments to SFO life, but under the 1883 Rule they wore a white cord, with three knots, around their waists under their clothes.

"When we were professed we had to wear the (St. Francis) scapular and the cord," Barbara said. "When I was pregnant, I didn't like that."

Humility and spirit

Barbara and Larry became parents to seven sons and six daughters in 18 years. They have 36 grandchildren and 16 great-grandchildren.

"The most striking part in family life was our (commitment to) poverty — explaining to the kids when they complained that they couldn't have something, 'Look you have everything you need,'" Barbara said.

The antidote for appreciating what they did have, she added, is to "Look around and find someone who doesn't have as much as you do. Being Franciscan, I look at things differently, at what I can forgo, what I don't need."

Larry agrees. He eventually became vice president of his company and could have afforded a luxury car, but he never bought one: "My sister used to ask, 'Why don't you have a big car?' I'd say, 'I don't need that.'"

"And I'd say that our kids are the same way," Barbara added. "Another thing that comes from a Franciscan influence is always being ready to give something to someone who needs it."

Larry volunteered with several credit unions, interviewing people to see how the credit unions could help them. Barbara did volunteer work.

After moving to North Carolina, she taught English to Koreans who attended Mass at St. Barnabas Church.

Why have their Secular Franciscan vocations remained important to them?

"It hasn't changed," Larry said. "I've always felt that call. It's a way of life that Francis followed. It strengthens your faith. I'd say, if you want to be a better Catholic (and) get closer to God, look to St. Francis, his determination. He gave up a rich life, he gave all that up to do God's work."

For Larry, it's Francis' humility. "He could have had everything, but he was just humble."

"Having the courage to embrace the leper," Barbara said, "from then on, he had an extreme love for everybody."

Franciscans forever

Nowadays, the Carters don't drive and they have some health problems, but when a fraternity member or one of their children can drive them, they still attend St. Francis of the Hills fraternity meetings.

"I miss it, not being able to go," Larry said. "If we can get a ride, we go."

Although Barbara has severe back trouble, she doesn't let that keep her away. The examples of St. Francis' later life and Jesus' death on the cross have been especially helpful. She recalls that Francis experienced severe stomach and eye trouble and, after receiving the Stigmata, was unable to walk.

"Reading about St. Francis and St. Clare was very influential," Barbara said. "And now, when I'm in so much pain, I pray to St. Francis. He was in pain, too, and even had to be carried. And our Savior suffered for me, so I should be more than willing to bear a little pain for him."

Fraternity members stay in touch and the Carters receive meeting updates and newsletters.

"It keeps me wanting to be active when I can," said Barbara.

Feminists for Life president praises local abortion outreach

to the priesthood.

Room at the Inn offers pregnancy assistance for unmarried pregnant women and their babies, both born and unborn. The organization recently established its In Good Company college outreach program, and has partnered with Belmont Abbey College to construct a residential facility on campus for pregnant college students.

"Room at the Inn is working to enact a dream of mine, and of Feminists for Life, to have a place on campus that pregnant women need most — with support and services — so they can have their babies and continue their education," said Foster in an interview with The Catholic News & Herald.

Feminists for Life was established in 1972 and works through advocacy and legislation to support pregnant women and their families. It was Foster's work and her organization's materials that motivated Room at the Inn to pursue a college-based residence program, according to Jeannie Wray, Room at the Inn's executive director.

"She inspired our board and staff to look at the situation for college women in this area," said Wray.

Foster is especially proud of Room at the Inn's college outreach in light of a survey commissioned by Feminists for Life, which revealed U.S. college campuses frequently lack the resources for pregnant or parenting students or, if they have them, students are not always aware of their availability.

The survey, "Perception Is Reality," stemmed from the pregnancy resource forums conducted by Feminists for Life, based in Alexandria, Va., over the past 11 years.

Foster moderated the first of these forums at Georgetown University in Washington, D.C., in 1997 in order to evaluate resources on and off the campus.

"This survey confirms everything I have been told during the last decade," Foster told Catholic News Service. "Even when students who are not feeling the pressure of an unplanned pregnancy try to look for resources, either they can't find them or the resources are inadequate or expensive."

"Perception is reality," she added, noting that a "perceived lack of resources" can drive a pregnant woman to have an abortion or drop out of college.

The survey, released April 23, drew participants from 117 of the 400 colleges and universities nationwide with pro-life student groups. Fifty-eight percent of the schools surveyed were state schools, with an equal representation (21 percent each) of private and religious colleges.

Although some campuses offer information on pregnancy resources through posters and brochures, many of the survey respondents said they had not seen these materials.

According to the study, some colleges and universities have gone a step beyond simply providing resources and also are creating supportive academic environments for pregnant and parenting students through flexible class scheduling.

Abbot Placid Solari, chancellor of Belmont Abbey College, reached out to Room at the Inn a few years ago to offer assistance in expanding its programs. The monks of Belmont Abbey later donated the land upon which the residence will be built.

Room at the Inn hopes to build a facility that will house up to 15 women — both maternity and after-care clients. The women will be able to stay at the residence for up to two years after giving birth.

"This will allow them to finish their education and help keep them from getting locked into the cycle of poverty," said Wray.

The college also will offer a full scholarship to a mother in the program.

"President (William) Thierfelder understands the statistics and the need for a facility in this area for pregnant students to choose the life option," said Wray.

Materials promoting the college outreach program already have been placed in seven regional colleges.

Foster told those at the Room at the Inn reception that she was grateful for all their efforts.

"You will impact lives here or at some other college campus that will follow what you are doing here," she said.

FROM THE COVER

Sister Helene Nagle, a Sister of St. Joseph and principal of St. Ann School in Charlotte, stands in the doorway of a fifth-grade classroom May 12. After 17 years as principal she will retire in June.

Sister Helene Nagle retires at 17 years as principal

Ask just about anyone these days and they'll tell you that Sister Nagle has St. Ann School running like a well-oiled machine.

"Sister Helene has been an instrumental part in the success of St. Ann School," said Linda Cherry, superintendent of diocesan Catholic schools. "Her prayerful, caring, loving demeanor has molded the family atmosphere that exists at St. Ann."

She gets to school every day around 6:15 a.m., opens the building, feeds the fish, and waters the plants. Then she heads over to the church for the 7 a.m. Mass.

"That I value," she said. "That makes my whole day."

And after that, "There really is no typical day," she said.

"I plan for the week and often those plans go to the greater need," said Sister Nagle, adding, "One phone call can change your day."

This June marks the end of her 17-year term as principal at St. Ann School.

"I'm retiring from this job to pick up something else," said Sister Nagle, who will stay in Charlotte following her retirement. "I'll miss the school schedule and everything that goes with it. I've been in schools for 50 years."

Originally from Philadelphia, Pa., Sister Nagle grew up attending Catholic schools administered by the Sisters of St. Joseph. In 1956, at the age of 18, she entered the order.

She earned a bachelor's degree in elementary education from the College of Chestnut Hill in Pennsylvania and two master's degrees — one in education administration from Catholic University of America in Washington, the other in psychology and family counseling from the College of Chestnut Hill.

Over the years, her assignments have included teaching positions and principalships at schools in Pennsylvania, Virginia, Maryland and North Carolina.

Her first position in the Diocese of Charlotte was teaching seventh and eighth grades at St. Leo the Great School in Winston Salem.

When she started at St. Ann School in 1991, the school was kindergarten through eighth grade, there were 600 students and there was a waiting list for every classroom. Now the school is kindergarten through fifth grade with enrollment just under 200.

She has seen many changes during her years as an educator.

"The kids, teachers and parents all have different needs than when I started 50 years ago" she said.

"When I first started teaching, the classrooms had 70-plus students," said Sister Nagle. "Now, the smaller the classrooms the better."

She often compares her role as principal to a series of one-act plays.

"I'm always living in that element of surprise," she said.

But one thing is certain — faith has played a fundamental role in each and every school day.

The entire school gathers for prayer on Monday mornings. And every day Sister Nagle prays for her students and what they will be doing 10 to 15 years from now. It's something she is known for.

When former students come back to visit, "They ask if I'm still praying for them," she said. "They don't forget."

Former student Jonathan Jerome credits Sister Nagle for instilling in him a strong set of morals and values during his youth.

"She laid the framework for my future education and future as a young Catholic," said Jerome, a parishioner of St. Matthew Church in Charlotte who is studying theology at Catholic University of America in Washington.

"If it weren't for her, I don't know if I'd be where I am in my faith life today," he said.

Jerome said he also remembers Sister Nagle's innate ability to keep students in line.

"She'd give you that look and you'd know you were out of place," he said.

But that's not to say she takes herself too seriously.

"She has a great sense of humor," said Nancy Russo, guidance counselor at St. Ann School for the past 13 years. "She could have so much fun with the kids and then be so spiritual with them."

"We're a school that laughs a lot," said Sister Nagle.

In terms of her plans for the future, she said she would like to spend more time working at the parish and visiting the sick.

"Our community slogan is 'ready for any good work,'" said Sister Nagle. "The Lord will show me what the right thing is, I have faith in that."

"Whatever I'll be doing," she said, "I know it will be with people."

Staff Writer Katie Moore is an alumna of St. Ann School and was in first grade during Sister Nagle's first year as principal.

"Democracy can only flourish, as your founding fathers realized, when political leaders and those whom they represent are guided by truth and bring the wisdom born of firm moral principle to decisions affecting the life and future of the nation."

— excerpt from Pope Benedict XVI's address during the welcoming ceremony at the White House, April 16, 2008

Dear brothers and sisters in Christ,

I hope that the beauty of spring and your Marian celebrations during this month of May have drawn you closer to our Risen Lord.

Every four years, the U.S. Catholic bishops call upon the Catholics in our nation to reflect very seriously on the tremendous responsibility we have as participants in our nation's political life. The title of this year's statement is "Forming Consciences for Faithful Citizenship: A Call to Political Responsibility from the Catholic Bishops of the United States."

To assist in disseminating this statement, the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops has developed a Web site that contains statements from the U.S. bishops and the Vatican on the political responsibilities of Catholics, prayer and worship materials, educational programs, youth resources, family discussion guidelines, and clip art and logos to assist in publicizing the U.S. bishops' statement.

I encourage you to visit the Web site, www.faithfulcitizenship.org (en Espanol, www.ciudadanosfieles.org) which includes the entire text of the faithful citizenship statement.

This edition of The Catholic News & Herald includes a condensed version of the U.S. bishops' statement.

As the statement explains, the U.S. Catholic bishops "do not intend to tell Catholics for whom or against whom to vote. Our purpose is to help Catholics form their consciences in accordance with God's truth."

Each Catholic has the responsibility to properly form his or her own conscience in preparation for the important role of being a participant in the democratic process.

As Catholics we believe the Catholic Church, through its teachings, plays a critical role in helping Catholics to form their consciences. A properly formed conscience, that has weighed carefully the moral and social teachings of the Church, is a firm foundation upon which "Catholics are better able to evaluate policy positions, party platforms, and candidates' promises and action."

We are called to promote the common good by affirming the value of every human life and combating threats to human life and human dignity. When we promote the common good we must acknowledge that the direct and intentional destruction of innocent human life is always wrong, and always to be opposed.

We are required to act against policies that diminish, disregard or violate the dignity and rights to which all humanity is entitled. The most vulnerable and weakest of our brothers and sisters have a claim on our attention, our assistance and our prayers.

As you prepare yourself for involvement in the political process, I ask you to examine concurrently the teachings of the Church, the positions of candidates on the many issues that directly impact human life and dignity, and the integrity and performance of the women and men who seek your votes.

Thank you for your attentiveness to the message of "Forming Consciences for Faithful Citizenship: A Call to Political Responsibility from the Catholic Bishops of the United States."

May Mary our Mother, patroness of the Americas and Queen of Peace, intercede for us as we seek to be faithful witnesses to the moral and social teachings of Christ and the Church.

Sincerely yours in Christ,

+ Peter J. Jugis

Most Reverend Peter J. Jugis
Bishop of Charlotte

The Challenge of Forming Consciences for Faithful Citizenship

In anticipating, and trying to ward off, Catholic voter confusion, the U.S. bishops wrote a 10,000-word document on political responsibility, "Forming Consciences for Faithful Citizenship," overwhelmingly approved during the bishops' fall meeting in 2007.

The document is part of a series that has been issued before every presidential election for more than 30 years. "Faithful Citizenship" outlines for voters in 2008 seven key themes: right to life and dignity of the human person; call to family community and participation; rights and responsibilities; option for the poor and vulnerable; dignity of work and the rights of workers; solidarity; and caring for God's creation.

The following is a summary of "Faithful Citizenship."

Our nation faces political challenges that demand urgent moral choices. We bishops seek to help Catholics form their consciences in accordance with the truth, so they can make sound moral choices in addressing these challenges. We do not tell Catholics how to vote. The responsibility to make political choices rests with each person and his or her own formed conscience.

WHY DOES THE CHURCH TEACH ABOUT ISSUES AFFECTING PUBLIC POLICY?

The Catholic Church's obligation to participate in shaping the moral character of society is a requirement of our faith, a part of the mission given to us by Jesus Christ. Faith helps us see more clearly the truth about human life and dignity that we also understand through human reason.

As people of both faith and reason, Catholics are called to bring truth to political life and to practice Christ's commandment to "love one another" (Jn 13:34). According to Pope Benedict XVI, "charity must animate the entire lives of the lay faithful and therefore also their political activity, lived as 'social charity'" (encyclical Deus Caritas Est, no. 29).

The U.S. Constitution protects the right of individual believers and religious bodies to participate and speak out without government interference, favoritism or discrimination. Civil law should recognize and protect the church's right and responsibility to participate in society without abandoning our central moral convictions.

Our nation's tradition of pluralism is enhanced, not threatened, when religious groups and people of faith bring their convictions into public life. The Catholic community brings to the political dialogue a consistent moral framework and broad experience serving those in need.

WHO IN THE CHURCH SHOULD PARTICIPATE IN POLITICAL LIFE?

In the Catholic tradition, responsible citizenship is a virtue, and participation in political life is a moral obligation. As Catholics, we should be guided more by our moral convictions than by our attachment to a political party or interest group.

In today's environment, Catholics may feel politically disenfranchised, sensing that no party and few candidates fully share our comprehensive commitment to human life and dignity. Catholic lay women and men need to act on the church's moral principles and become more involved: running for office, working within political parties, and communicating concerns to elected officials.

Even those who cannot vote should raise their voices on matters that affect their lives and the common good.

HOW DOES THE CHURCH HELP CATHOLICS TO ADDRESS POLITICAL AND SOCIAL QUESTIONS?

A WELL-FORMED CONSCIENCE

The church equips its members to address political questions by helping them develop well-formed consciences.

"Conscience is a judgment of reason whereby the human person recognizes the moral quality of a concrete act. . . . [Every person] is obliged to follow faithfully what he [or she] knows to be just and right" (Catechism of the Catholic Church, no. 1778).

We Catholics have a lifelong obligation to form our consciences in accordance with human reason, enlightened by the teaching of Christ as it comes to us through the church.

THE VIRTUE OF PRUDENCE

The church also encourages Catholics to develop the virtue of prudence, which enables us "to discern our true good in every circumstance and to choose the right means of achieving it" (Catechism of the Catholic Church, no. 1806).

Prudence shapes and informs our ability to deliberate over available alternatives to determine what is most fitting to a specific context, and to act. Prudence must be

panied by courage which calls us to act.

Catholics seek to advance the common good, we must carefully discern which policies are morally sound. A good end does not justify an immoral means. Sometimes Catholics may choose different ways to respond to social problems, but not differ on our obligation to protect human life and dignity and help build a moral means a more just and peaceful world.

GOOD AND AVOIDING EVIL

There are some things we must never do, as individuals or as a society, because they are always incompatible with love of God and neighbor. These intrinsically evil acts are always rejected and never supported. A preeminent example is the intentional taking of human life through abortion. It is always morally wrong to destroy innocent human beings. A legal system that allows for the taking of life to be violated on the grounds of choice is fundamentally flawed. Similarly, direct threats to the dignity of human life such as euthanasia, human cloning, and destructive research on human embryos are also intrinsically evil and must be opposed. Other assaults on human life and dignity, such as genocide, torture, racism, and targeting of noncombatants in acts of terror or war, can never be justified.

RESPECT FOR ANY HUMAN LIFE DIMINISHES RESPECT FOR ALL HUMAN LIFE.

Catholics we are not single-issue voters. A candidate's position on a single issue is not sufficient to guarantee a voter's support. Yet a candidate's position on an issue that involves an intrinsic evil, such as support for legal abortion or the promotion of racism, may legitimately lead a voter to disqualify a candidate from being supported. A candidate's position on intrinsically evil acts also prompts us to recognize our positive contribution to the common good and act in solidarity with those in need. Both doing evil and doing good are essential. Pope John Paul II said, "the fact that only the negative commandments oblige and under all circumstances does not mean that in the moral life prohibitions are more important than the obligation to do good indicated by the positive commandment" (encyclical Veritatis Splendor, no. 52). The basic right to life implies and is linked to other human rights to the goods that a person needs to live and thrive — including food, shelter, health care, education, and meaningful work. The use of the death penalty, hunger, lack of health care or housing, human trafficking, the human and moral costs of war and unjust immigration are some of the serious moral issues that challenge our consciences and call us to act.

MAKING MORAL CHOICES

Political decisions require the exercise of a well-formed conscience aided by prudence. This exercise of conscience begins with always opposing policies that threaten human life or weaken its protection. Those who formulate law therefore have an obligation in conscience to work to correct morally defective laws, lest they be guilty of cooperating in evil and acting against the common good" (U.S. bishops, "Catholics in Political Life"). When morally flawed laws already exist, prudential judgment is needed to determine how to do what is possible to restore justice — even if partially or gradually — without ever abandoning a moral commitment to full protection for all human life from conception to natural death (see Pope John Paul II's encyclical Evangelium Vitae, no. 50). Prudential judgment is also needed to determine the best way to promote the common good in areas such as housing, health care and immigration. When church leaders make judgments about how to apply Catholic teaching to specific policies, this does not carry the same binding authority as universal moral principles but cannot be dismissed as one political opinion among others. These moral applications should inform the consciences and guide the actions of all Catholics.

DOES THE CHURCH SAY ABOUT CATHOLIC SOCIAL TEACHING IN THE PUBLIC SQUARE? (SEVEN KEY THEMES)

A consistent ethic of life should guide all Catholic engagement in political life. This ethic neither treats all issues as morally equivalent nor reduces Catholic teaching to one or two issues. It anchors the Catholic commitment to defend human life and other human rights, from conception until natural death, in the fundamental obligation to respect the dignity of every human being as a child of God. Catholic voters should use Catholic teaching to examine candidates' positions and should consider candidates' integrity, philosophy and performance.

It is important for all citizens "to see beyond party politics, to analyze campaign rhetoric critically, and to choose their political leaders according to principle, not party affiliation or mere self-interest" (U.S. bishops, "Living the Gospel of Life," no. 33).

The following themes of Catholic social teaching provide a moral framework for decisions in public life.

THE RIGHT TO LIFE AND THE DIGNITY OF THE HUMAN PERSON

Human life is sacred. Direct attacks on innocent human beings are never morally acceptable.

Within our society, life is under direct attack from abortion, euthanasia, human cloning and destruction of human embryos for research. These intrinsic evils must always be opposed. This teaching also compels us as Catholics to oppose genocide, torture, unjust war and the use of the death penalty, as well as to pursue peace and help overcome poverty, racism and other conditions that demean human life.

CALL TO FAMILY, COMMUNITY AND PARTICIPATION

The family, based on marriage between a man and a woman, is the fundamental unit of society. This sanctuary for the creation and nurturing of children must not be redefined, undermined or neglected. Supporting families should be a priority for economic and social policies.

How our society is organized — in economics and politics, in law and public policy — affects the well-being of individuals and of society. Every person and association has a right and a duty to participate in shaping society to promote the well-being of individuals and the common good.

RIGHTS AND RESPONSIBILITIES

Every human being has a right to life, the fundamental right that makes all other rights possible. Each of us has a right to religious freedom, which enables us to live and act in accord with our God-given dignity, as well as a right to access to those things required for human decency — food and shelter, education and employment, health care and housing.

Corresponding to these rights are duties and responsibilities — to one another, to our families and to the larger society.

OPTION FOR THE POOR AND VULNERABLE

While the common good embraces all, those who are in greatest need deserve preferential concern. A moral test for society is how we treat the weakest among us — the unborn, those dealing with disabilities or terminal illness, the poor and marginalized.

DIGNITY OF WORK AND THE RIGHTS OF WORKERS

The economy must serve people, not the other way around. Economic justice calls for decent work at fair, living wages, opportunities for legal status for immigrant workers and the opportunity for all people to work together for the common good through their work, ownership, enterprise, investment, participation in unions and other forms of economic activity.

SOLIDARITY

We are one human family, whatever our national, racial, ethnic, economic and ideological differences. Our Catholic commitment to solidarity requires that we pursue justice, eliminate racism, end human trafficking, protect human rights, seek peace and avoid the use of force except as a necessary last resort.

CARING FOR GOD'S CREATION

Care for the earth is a duty of our Catholic faith. We all are called to be careful stewards of God's creation and to ensure a safe and hospitable environment for vulnerable human beings now and in the future.

CONCLUSION

In light of Catholic teaching, as bishops we vigorously repeat our call for a renewed politics that focuses on moral principles, the defense of life, the needs of the weak and the pursuit of the common good. This kind of political participation reflects the social teaching of our church and the best traditions of our nation.

Anne Rice's newest novel follows Jesus to Cana

REVIEWED BY CHARLOTTE MILLER
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

As with her first novel about Christ, Anne Rice has used careful research and scholarship to re-create the first century world of Yeshua (the Hebrew name for Jesus) in "Christ the Lord: The Road to Cana."

This novel begins not long before Jesus' first miracle, the changing of water into wine at a wedding celebration, and, indeed, the wedding in this narrative is more significant for Jesus than we might have imagined.

Like many sequels, this book might not captivate the reader to the extent that the first installment — "Christ the Lord: Out of Egypt" — did.

But the reason is probably not that the novel is less meticulously researched and written than the first, but that the first book intrigued readers at least in part because of the author herself.

The explanation, in an afterword, of Rice's return to the Catholic faith after about 40 years of atheism, a time during which she wrote a number of popular vampire novels, made the first "Christ the Lord" book all the more compelling.

This time readers know the personal context, so the joy and mystery of Rice's faith are more subdued.

Still, this book has much to lure the reader into mind-stretching thoughts about the Lord. As she did with the first book, Rice portrays Jesus as a human being, albeit divine as well.

Actually this book, more than the first, suggests her vision of him as a man.

Jesus himself narrates the text, as he did in the first book, and he acknowledges his divine-human perspective: "What I must know, I know. And what I must learn, I learn."

He recalls that Satan tempted him to "stop time," but he says he "did not come to stop it. ... I came to live it, to surrender to it, to endure it, to discover in it what it was I must do."

He fully accepts his temporary role of living in time rather than in eternity even though, as he says, "I'd always known who I really was. I was God."

Later in the book he reiterates that he is a man, with human desires and temptations.

Unlike the boy Jesus in "Out of Egypt," this Jesus is not a child seeking to understand himself but a man who, while not knowing the details of his future, does understand that he is the promised Messiah.

Some of his family members have a little more difficulty with the concept.

"Christ the Lord: Out of Egypt" was published in 2005 and "Christ the Lord: The Road to Cana" in 2008, so perhaps 2011 will see "Christ the Lord: The Road to Calvary" or some such title. These books are worth the wait.

God's guidelines offer happiness, salvation

BY JEFF HENSLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Obedience. We tend to think there must be an easier way.

We have the end of the Sermon on the Mount here in these readings. Jesus tells us to hear and obey the words of the preceding sermon with its admonishments to have pure hearts, doing our religious works of prayer and fasting so that only the Lord himself sees them, loving our enemies, praying for those who persecute us, not worrying about our material needs.

Then finally he sets out the simplicity of God's law in the golden rule, "Treat others the way you would have them treat you: This sums up the law and the prophets."

This is such a simple set of high standards, not replacing all that God has required of those who follow him, but refining all that has gone before in the law and the prophets.

But why? Why does God make even this summary set of requirements of us? Is this all for his benefit, for some heavenly ego of monstrous proportion that demands obedience for no reason but his own glorification?

Well, no.

I once knew an author of best selling Christian books, Harold Hill who referred to the Bible as "The Manufacturer's Handbook." It doesn't take a lot of imagination to see what he meant.

If the maker of your new car tell you to put water in the radiator and gas in the gas tank, to keep the fluid level up in the master brake cylinder and the windshield washer fluid in the washer tank, you don't express your individuality and free will by doing the opposite of each of these.

You follow the instructions, knowing that the one who designed and built the car knows best what to do to keep the vehicle in good running order.

Want a good and happy life, one that will withstand the winds and the torrent when they come? Build your house on rock. Follow the creator's guidelines.

Only God knows what will make us truly happy in this life and prepare us for the life to come. Live by The Manufacturer's Handbook, and especially pay attention to the beatitudes and the golden rule.

Questions:

How can you spend more time reading the Bible? Can you join a parish Bible study group, pick up a Scripture study guide to read along with, or establish a daily reading habit?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"Everyone who listens to these words of mine and acts on them will be like a wise man who built his house on rock" (Matthew 7:24).

Film schools partner with Vatican for programs on human condition

Programs to help aspiring filmmakers tell more spiritual stories

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The New York Film Academy is partnering with the Vatican and a Mexican film school to offer new programs to help aspiring filmmakers tell their stories from a more human, spiritual dimension.

"Film has extraordinary potential" to delve into the meaning of life, go beyond the superficial, "transcend reality" and encounter the human soul, said Archbishop Gianfranco Ravasi, head of the Pontifical Council for Culture.

The archbishop and others spoke at a May 13 press conference at the Vatican to unveil four initiatives to help future filmmakers get hands-on experience and become more effective in delivering a message about the human condition to their audiences.

The Pontifical Council for Culture, the Pontifical Council for Social Communications, the Higher Education Center for Cinematographic Production in Guadalajara, Mexico, and the New York Film Academy are sponsoring the alternative filmmaking initiatives.

Michael Young, provost and director of education at the New York Film Academy, said a secular filmmaking school partnering with the Vatican should not be surprising because "we see the basic question for all filmmakers is the anthropological aspect."

"We share some of the same core values" with Judeo-Christian tradition, he said, "and we're very interested in this approach to really examine the transcendental questions" in film.

He said film educators do not have "the secret formula" for showing students how to make a film that will have a powerful impact on the audience, but they do try to challenge the students to ask themselves what their perspective of the human experience is and how the story they make in writing, lighting, directing and shooting are going to reflect and enhance their message.

Most "aspiring" filmmakers are absolutely mystified about what their film is really about," he said.

He said these joint programs will help turn students' attention to deeper themes and how they can be expressed, which should help artists produce "more thoughtful work."

Young said when the head of the Mexican film school, Father Javier Magdaleno Cueva, approached him about the programs, he asked the priest what films he thought explored transcendental questions.

"We were expecting something with very heavy religious themes like 'The Passion of the Christ,'" Young said, but instead Father Magdaleno pointed to "The Matrix" and "Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind."

Exploring the transcendental meanings of life is not about "indoctrination or specific religious practices or rules," Young said, "but is asking people to take the time to think about fundamental questions when making their film."

The four joint programs presented at the May 13 press conference were:

— A five-week intensive course in Guadalajara dedicated to "filming the ineffable" or the unseen.

— A master's degree in fine arts in cinematography and anthropological questions run by the New York Film Academy at Universal Studios in Los Angeles.

— An exclusive, one-year, free program at the Higher Education Center for Cinematographic Production in Guadalajara.

— Funding for first feature films exploring the transcendent.

Around the world and into the classroom

School showcases diversity, celebrates culture

BY KATIE MOORE
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — At Our Lady of the Assumption (OLA) School in Charlotte, every day is a celebration of diversity.

"Our school tends to attract families who are new to American culture and are looking for a place that offers an environment where all cultures are celebrated," said Allana-Rae Ramkissoon, vice principal.

This year, that cultural diversity was recognized in a special way with the third annual observance of multicultural week May 12-16.

"Our multicultural festival has become not only the forum for celebrating the 30 or so families who are originally from other countries, but the event at which we highlight the cultural heritage of each family at our school," said Ramkissoon.

In preparation for the festivities, each grade level was assigned a continent to research and study.

"Throughout the year, teachers and students have been learning about countries from the seven continents of the world through art, music, social studies, dance and literature," said Ramkissoon.

The students decorated the hallways of the school to represent the seven continents. Each grade level was responsible for giving a presentation on its continent to the rest of the school.

A multicultural Mass was celebrated Thursday morning, followed by a day of celebration that included an "international market" featuring food from around the globe and multicultural crafts and games. Students were encouraged to dress in costumes representing the different cultures they had studied.

"Our school is very diverse," said Angeline Morales, fifth-grader. "We want to celebrate and appreciate our different heritages."

The students are not the only ones representing a broad spectrum of cultures. The school is comprised of faculty members from Chile and Ecuador and Ramkissoon hails from the Caribbean country of Trinidad and Tobago.

"We feel that this school exhibits the epitome of American culture," said Marwin Gbenyon, parent and co-chair of multicultural week.

Gbenyon, who is originally from Liberia, took the day off from work to volunteer at a craft station during Thursday's festivities. Her station featured traditional African hair braiding.

Other parent volunteers helped by making and serving food at the "international market," assisting with art projects, face painting and even teaching students how to use chopsticks.

"I think this is the best way to celebrate our OLA family," said Mary Morales, vice president of the parent-teacher organization and co-chair of multicultural week.

"For me, the reward at the end is seeing all the kids trying something new," she said.

Parents were invited to come for a final hallway viewing on Friday afternoon. That night, students closed the week with the presentation of a multicultural variety show.

"OLA boasts of a school community that is truly representative of American society," said Ramkissoon. "It is one of the things that set us apart from the other schools."

"It's a small school but we have a lot of cultures," said Meghan Santschi, fifth-grader. "It's amazing how much you can learn."

International festival brings together diverse parish

potluck dinner drew more than 200 parishioners of St. Barnabas Church in Arden May 10. They shared a banquet of cultural foods and entertainment from around the globe during the event at which 26 nationalities were represented.

Aided by Cathie Stout, parish volunteer coordinator, the festival planning committee sought to develop an event that would encourage dialogue, participation and interaction within the parish.

"What I wanted was for people to come and talk to each other; then this would be a success," said Kimberlee Zorich, event chairperson.

During the event, which featured the culinary and entertainment talents of fellow parishioners, the parish hall was filled with laughter, unexpected recognition of commonality and newfound respect for the diversity among the parish.

Father Dean Cesa, pastor, encouraged the committee to incorporate the festival theme into the Pentecost Masses as well. Parishioners read the Petitions first in their native languages — German, Spanish, French, Italian, Polish and Filipino — followed by the English translation.

Parishioner Vince Indelicato emceed the talent portion of the festival and personally participated with an Italian rendition of a Neapolitan love song.

"It was my first time (emceeing) and I was a little leery, but found myself getting very relaxed," said Indelicato. "Everyone was having such a good time; it was hard to get their attention."

Laughter and fun filled the hall as the entertainment became a veritable variety show of local talent.

"All of the performers were parishioners at St. Barnabas Church," said Stout.

A blue grass band played; the Filipino community performed the Subli and Tinikling traditional dances; Marisa Panzer fiddled while her mother, Carole, danced a traditional Irish jig; Gosia Graves read a poem in Polish; and the Spanish-language choir sang songs and read a poem dedicated to the mothers in the audience.

The diverse crowd danced together and mingled in line for food and desert, talking and discovering common ground in their various backgrounds.

"It was nice to see when it was time to break down, everyone stayed to clean up," said Indelicato. "Normally, after an event, there are a few people who stay to put things away, but no one wanted to leave; within 20 minutes everything was all cleaned up."

Afterward, Zorich felt the committee had accomplished its goal of bringing the parish together. She said they hoped the festival will become an annual event.

"People here are like a second family and really care about each other. It is a welcoming community," said Stout.

A place at the table

Difficulties can be overcome to share in church's mission

For me, the most moving segment of Pope Benedict XVI's trip to the United States was his meeting with young people with disabilities at St. Joseph's Seminary in Yonkers, N.Y.

As the Holy Father greeted the young people and their caregivers, tears of delight and gratitude sprang to my eyes.

For many others too, the meeting marked a significant milestone in the lives of Catholics living with life-altering physical and emotional challenges. The pope did more than pay lip service to those who suffer.

With love, respect and dignity he offered a place at the church's table — and challenged each of us to action.

Rather than giving a perfunctory blessing or encouraging everyone to pray for a cure from all pain and disability, Pope Benedict recognized the importance of bringing the chronically ill or disabled into more active roles in the church.

His manner and remarks reflected not pity, but piety, which underscored the importance of treating those gathered as equals in their standing as brothers and sisters in Christ.

In his message at the meeting, the pope also reminded those gathered of their responsibility to serve.

He said, "God has blessed you with life and with differing talents and gifts. Through these you are able to serve him and society in various ways. While some people's contributions seem great and others' more modest, the witness value of our efforts is always a sign of hope for everyone."

It was good to be reminded that all contributions, however "modest," are vital to the parish community's witness to God's love.

Throughout its history, the church has ministered to the sick, championed the vulnerable and taught respect for life. Unfortunately, many church communities, strapped for resources, time and support, have not been able to incorporate the chronically ill into the fabric of regular parish life.

And many people who are chronically ill often get so caught up in their illnesses and disabilities that they lose sight of the possibilities around them for participation in the life of a faith community.

Pope Benedict encouraged those gathered to see beyond their pain, to look with faith to see the "reason for what appears only as a difficulty to be overcome or even pain to be endured."

Our faith, he said, "helps us to break open the horizon beyond our own selves in order to see life as God does. ... Through his cross, Jesus in fact draws us into his saving love and in so doing shows us the way ahead — the way of hope which transfigures us all, so that we too become bearers of that hope and charity for others."

The pope encouraged all gathered to pray. This is an excellent way to bring the disabled into service within home parishes!

Parish prayer groups would do well to invite those who are ill to join them, blending their prayerful voices with their own. Those who are homebound can help grow a parish community's presence on the Internet through online prayer groups and Web page content.

There are many other possibilities that can be encouraged and developed among all parishioners who make the effort to communicate consistently.

I've long dried my tears since watching the pope's visit on TV. What remains, shining brightly, is renewed resolve, enthusiasm and hope.

Illness and pain can be isolating and socially repellant. But all of us have a reason to be, a reason to celebrate. We have a place at the church's table.

Now, let's step up and get busy!

Abortion and the role of conscience

Stopping a beating heart is a departure from God's will

Pope Benedict XVI addressed the controversy between freedom of conscience and abortion on his recent visit to the United States. The pope simply said, "Freedom of conscience is a good thing, as long as it does not cause one to go against the will of God."

He made it clear that the objective norm in these matters is always God's will, not private opinion.

The pope condemned relativism in every talk he gave on his visit to America. Relativists say, "I am free to do whatever I want, as long as my conscience approves it." The church teaches that this view is totally wrong.

Think about it. Would someone have the right to rob banks if his personal conscience approved of the idea? Just try it, and you'll see how quickly the law enforcement establishment will stop you.

Private opinion never supersedes the law.

"Ah, yes," the relativist says, "but abortion is legal."

Perhaps so in the United States, but not in nearly every other country in the world; besides, an unjust law does not make an immoral act moral. We legalized slavery for a long time, but that didn't change the moral nature of slavery. Slavery is always evil.

This brings up the question: May a person receive holy Communion if he or she is personally convinced that abortion, in certain circumstances, is permissible?

No! An erroneous conscience may be a private matter, but when one receives the Eucharist, it becomes a public act.

If the person is a politician who has publicly declared him- or herself to be in favor of keeping abortion legal and the local bishop says nothing when he receives, it could be construed as giving tacit approval to that position. But the matter is deeper than one of mere discipline.

Even though the politician's conscience may be clear, his erroneous private opinion is publicly known, and therefore he is giving scandal by showing defiance of the will of God. For his own

Spirituality for Today

FATHER JOHN CATOIR
CNS COLUMNIST

good, and for the good of the church, it is necessary to ask him not to receive.

What if the politician is privately pro-life but his public position is to keep abortion legal?

This position sounds reasonable from the viewpoint of a misguided compassion, but it is essentially a contradiction. We know there can always be mitigating circumstances in any moral act. Assigning culpability is a different matter.

A woman may be forced to have an abortion against her will, but in itself that does not make abortion "permissible in some circumstances." The abortion procedure always stops a beating heart, even though the guilt of the parents may vary from case to case.

A woman out of her mind with fear would be less culpable than a Hollywood star who calmly has an abortion in order to clear her schedule for a new movie. When full consent of the will is lacking, the subjective guilt of the parents is lessened, but the gravity of the act always remains a serious matter.

Freedom of conscience is not a license to do whatever you want. Those who believe that it is are deluded.

The Ten Commandments set the limits of human freedom as far as God is concerned. Abortion is clearly a departure from God's will.

It is extremely important to understand that we cannot trivialize the reality of objective evil by appealing to conscience. God is not mocked.

Relativism is a false doctrine.

Hats off to all graduates!

Encouragement, optimism needed for big transitions

Let's start with a top-four countdown of "Ways to Spot a Soon-to-Be Graduate" who has completed all assignments and exams):

4. He's busy practicing moving his mortar board tassel from one side to the other.

3. She breaks into deep sighing and spontaneous giggles.

2. Her parents are sighing more deeply and giggling even more.

1. He's certain that from here on out, his life is going to be all smooth sailing.

Hmm. All smooth sailing?

It takes optimism to move from high school to college or from school to "real life." And it takes courage, too. Thank God — really, thank God — that most young people have plenty of both.

Life is nothing if not a series of these rookie seasons." Again and again, we step into new situations feeling awkward, uncomfortable and unsure.

It can help to remember that, not just so we'll cut ourselves some slack when we need it, but so we'll have more compassion and understanding for others who find themselves in that situation.

It's not easy:

For a 5-year-old, used to preschool only a few days a week, to adjust to kindergarten, or for a first-grader to get used to full days.

For a middle-schooler to get into the rhythm of five distinct classes and five distinct teachers. (Not to mention changing classrooms and mastering the combination on a locker.)

For a high school student to stand up to the adult pressures and temptations teens face.

For a college student to start cracking the books without Mom, Dad or a teacher cracking the whip.

For a young employee to get used to a 9-to-5 routine while trying to safely negotiate the Byzantine maze known as office politics.

We're only fooling ourselves if we think receiving that high school diploma or college degree is our last graduation. Over and over, we complete one chapter in our lives and move on to the next.

If there's anxiety when the change is something we choose, something we want, it's not surprising there's a feeling of panic when that new chapter in our life is one we'd prefer to avoid, one we would love to just push away but we know we can't.

Chronic illness strikes. We lose our job. Our child is born with a disability. Our spouse dies. The list is long and varied, and none of us escapes having some of its items on our personal resume.

What can we do when there's no running or hiding from what life has brought us? These are a few suggestions:

Take it day by day. That's how we learn, that's how we adjust, that's how we grow, that's how we cope.

Don't get down on yourself just because you're a rookie. (No one is an instant expert.)

Don't be too proud or too timid to

Christian-inspired art, music are living treasures, pope says

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

VATICANCITY (CNS)—Christian-inspired art, architecture and music are not dead artifacts from the past, but are living treasures reflecting the beauty of God and the joy of being a child of God, Pope Benedict XVI said.

The Christian culture is "born out of faith, born from the heart of one who has encountered Christ" and has felt his truth and love, he said.

As long as this "faith stays alive, this cultural heritage does not die, but stays alive and timely," he said during his May 21 general audience.

The pope focused his catechesis on the life and contribution of St. Romanus the Melodist, a sixth-century poet and composer. He said this patron saint of church singers shows how powerful "symbolic communication" is when it "joins earth to heaven" in the liturgy and "uses imagery, poetry and song to lift our minds to God's truth."

The pope said creativity and innovation that bring in a new Christian culture do not discard Christianity's cultural past, but are part of the same, continuous heritage and represent "one single reality."

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

In today's catechesis we turn to the Christian poetry of Romanus the Melodist. Born in Syria at the end of the fifth century, Romanus received a classical education, was ordained a deacon and settled in Constantinople.

His preaching took the form of chanted metrical hymns known as "kontakia," consisting of an introduction and a series of stanzas punctuated by a refrain. Some 89 of these have come down to us, and they testify to the rich theological, liturgical and devotional content of the hymnography of that time.

Composed in simple language accessible to his hearers, these kontakia are notable for their dramatic dialogues and their use of sustained metaphors.

Romanus was a catechist concerned to communicate the unity of God's saving plan revealed in Christ. His hymns, steeped in Scripture, develop the teaching of the early councils on the divinity of the Son, the mystery of the Incarnation, the person and role of the Holy Spirit and the dignity of the Virgin Mary.

Romanus shows us the power of symbolic communication which, in the liturgy, joins earth to heaven and uses imagery, poetry and song to lift our minds to God's truth.

Wills, estates and stewardship

Planning ahead can help ensure lasting lesson of our faith

You have spent your entire life working, saving and preparing for the next major event, including marriage, children, college costs and retirement. Most of us never feel we have enough for tomorrow's emergencies.

What do you do then, when you don't need this accumulation of assets any longer? If you want to be proactive, you become involved in planning your estate and how you will distribute your estate over wealth.

In the big picture, we all want our heirs to be provided for, but how much is enough? There are different answers depending on the makeup of the family. Having small children and a young spouse is an entirely different scenario from being a widow(er) with adult children.

There have been a number of studies regarding the negative impact that very large inheritances can have on children. If they are not prepared, even trained, regarding the handling of wealth, they can have a difficult time adjusting to the windfall. As a result of unanticipated wealth, or unearned wealth, adult children will sometimes live their lives in negative ways.

One of the ways to model our Catholic faith for our beneficiaries and heirs is through our final intentions in our will. Whether we give a portion of our remaining assets to our parishes, Catholic schools, Catholic Social Services or other Catholic causes through a simple bequest or through a more complex arrangement such as a trust, we let our immediate heirs and beneficiaries know how important the Catholic Church has been to us during our lifetimes and provide one last lesson, especially to our children, through our wills.

Often, estate related terms seem so "legal," but they actually may be relatively simple concepts. A "bequest," for instance, is a testamentary gift or a gift made through a last will and testament. "I leave 10 percent of my estate to my parish," is an example of a simple bequest.

Whether we give an actual dollar amount, such as $10,000; a percentage, such as 10 percent; or the remainder of our estate after all other bequests have been made, we can make a significant difference with a charitable donation to our church.

Taking a proactive approach to planning the transfer of your estate is as important as the many decisions you made to acquire that wealth during your lifetime. It is even more important to remember that your last act of stewardship can also be an example that inspires your heirs and leaves a legacy of your Catholic faith.

Training the spirit

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

BEIJING — Mainland Catholic volunteers are getting ready to serve athletes from around the world who will compete in the Beijing Olympics in August.

The Beijing Diocese has designated 16 people — seven priests, five nuns and four seminarians — to join the religious volunteer service group and work alongside Buddhist, Taoist, Muslim and Protestant volunteers, reported the Asian church news agency UCA News.

The Beijing Summer Olympics and the Paralympic Games will be Aug. 8-24 and Sept. 6-17, respectively. A religious service center will operate in the Olympic Village during the events.

Father Joseph Zhao Qinglong, leader of the Catholic team, said the religious volunteers attended three training courses last year — the longest one lasted two months, with sessions twice a week.

"Our participation as volunteers can be a concrete service the church offers to society," he told UCA News recently.

"Certainly, we will serve all foreign athletes, government officials and visitors who need the service, hoping they will feel at home," he said, noting that the church in China is part of the universal church.

Father Zhao, who studied in Rome for five years and returned to Beijing last year, speaks English, Italian and some French.

Li Jiangang, a student at the national seminary in Beijing, told UCA News about one of the courses the Beijing Religious Affairs Bureau held last summer for 60 volunteers representing the five government-recognized religions.

The volunteers learned about the history of the Olympics, psychology, first aid, etiquette, English, customs and practices in Beijing, and the names of famous Chinese athletes, he recalled.

Li said that, based on exchanges with volunteers of other religions, they hold the common view that "the spirit of the Olympics coincides with religions' and the state's idea of harmonious society."

So the Olympics will be "a juncture for development of the country and religions," said Li, who speaks English.

Li said he practices the organ daily for an hour during the seminary's lunch break, because he will provide accompaniment at Masses in the Olympic Village. He added that he spends another hour playing basketball to be fit for the strenuous service during the games.

Sister Dong Siuhong is "studying hard about religious knowledge, especially about the church in China."

In order to provide the best religious services for the foreign athletes and accompanying personnel, she said, she is learning about liturgical arrangement and church decoration.

During the Olympic events, she said, the Catholics and the 18 Protestant volunteers will stay at the Protestants' Yanjing Theological Seminary near the Olympic Village.

Volunteers all have to wear the same uniform, but volunteer nuns will wear their habits at Masses to "show Catholic identity," said Sister Siuhong, who speaks Korean.

"We will present to the visitors warm hospitality and a good image of Chinese Catholics," she said, expressing hope that visitors would gain a better image of the church in China than they might have had a few decades ago.

Li said he hopes to show the foreign athletes and visitors that the church in China is young and energetic. He noted that the Beijing Diocese is baptizing more and more young and educated people each year.

Sister Kou Suzhen, who studied in France, said she thinks being a volunteer fits in with the spirit of consecrated life.

"I will express my devotion to God in my service," she told UCA News. "As the Olympics takes off soon, I'm preparing myself to serve the foreign guests with a positive attitude, happiness and warmth."

Chinese Catholics observe silence to mourn quake victims

CHENGDU, China (CNS) — Catholics joined other Chinese in observing three minutes of silence May 19 to pray for and mourn those killed by the earthquake that hit southwestern China a week earlier.

The Chinese government declared an unprecedented three-day period of national mourning May 19-21 for victims of the magnitude 7.9 quake.

Entertainment businesses were to be closed and the Beijing Olympics torch relay in Zhejiang and Shanghai was suspended until May 22.

After a Mass at Immaculate Conception Cathedral in Chengdu, provincial capital of Sichuan, about 80 Catholics stood and observed the three minutes of silence at 2:28 p.m., the time at which the quake struck a week earlier.

The quake's epicenter was in Wenchuan, just northwest of Chengdu.

Around the country, air-raid sirens and the horns of cars, trains and ships were sounded in expressions of grief as the Chinese stood in silence.

Father Simon Li Zhigang, diocesan administrator, said about 100 people attended a memorial Mass for the dead that morning.

In Hong Kong, Cardinal Joseph Ze Ze-kiun led diocesan priests in observing the three-minute silence.

Donald Tsang Yam-kuen, a Catholic and the chief executive of Hong Kong led high-ranking local officials in the moments of silence, after which he made the sign of the cross.

Approximately 35,000 people died and more than 245,000 people were injured in the quake.

FACES OF FAITH

Opera singer Amelia Farrugia, siblings Mitchell and Sophie Delezio, and Australian Football League player Jared Crouch have been chosen by World Youth Day 2008 organizers to be ambassadors for the July 15-20 event. Sophie Delezio, 8, escaped death twice. She survived a fire and also lived when struck by a car.

Family of girl who escaped death among World Youth Day ambassadors

PERTH, Australia (CNS) — The Catholic family of an 8-year-old girl who narrowly escaped death twice was named among nine ambassadors for World Youth Day 2008.

Sophie Delezio, known to Australians as "Little Sophie," was thrown more than 55 yards when she was struck by a car two years ago.

She spent 12 days in intensive care after suffering a heart attack, a broken jaw and broken shoulder bone, bruising to her head, numerous rib fractures and a tear to her left lung.

In 2003 she lost both feet and suffered burns to 85 percent of her body after a car crashed into a Sydney child care center she was attending.

The Delezio family — Sophie's parents, Ron and Carolyn, along with Sophie and her brother, Mitchell — are among the local sport stars, singer, diplomat and fashion designer chosen to promote World Youth Day among Australians.

Sophie's parents said the opportunity to serve as World Youth Day ambassadors provides them the chance to give "back to the church for what it has given us."

"World Youth Day will show Australians that the pope seriously cares about the people in Australia and wants to be with his family here," they said in a statement released by World Youth Day organizers.

Sophie, who was baptized at the shrine of Blessed Mary MacKillop in Sydney, always went into surgery with a prayer card and a relic of Blessed MacKillop, the Australian founder of the Sisters of St. Joseph of the Sacred Heart.

Blessed MacKillop, who was beatified by Pope John Paul II in 1995, is one of 10 patrons of World Youth Day.

"When the medical side is out of your hands, the only other way we could help Sophie was in prayer and knowing that there was a possibility of Sophie going to God if it did not work out," Sophie's parents said.

"No one can endure the difficulties of dealing with their child's critical injuries without having faith," they added. "It would have been too hard without believing in God and Mary MacKillop."

The couple said they witnessed God's love when they saw the World Youth Day cross and icon arrive in Australia. When they saw their children touch the cross they felt "God's energy was passed on to the children and our whole family."

World Youth Day ambassadors are helping to promote World Youth Day in Sydney July 15-20.

The other Australian ambassadors are: Matthew Hayden, cricket player; Jared Crouch, football player; Mark Bresciano, World Cup soccer hero; Stephen Moore, Rugby World Cup star; Amelia Farrugia, opera singer; John Herron, former ambassador to the Vatican and Ireland; Jimmy Little, musician; and Carla Zampatti, fashion designer.

Australian Cardinal George Pell of Sydney described the ambassadors as "impressive Australian role models" who will help encourage "all Australians — young and old — to get involved in World Youth Day."

Kennedy's colleagues in Congress praise his strong spirit

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Capitol Hill colleagues praised the fighting spirit of longtime U.S. Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts after learning he was diagnosed with a malignant brain tumor.

On the Senate floor May 20, Kennedy's colleagues stopped deliberations to offer words of encouragement for the 76-year-old senator, who was hospitalized in Boston May 17 after he suffered a seizure at his Cape Cod home.

Three days later, Kennedy's physicians announced the seizure was caused by a malignant tumor in the upper left portion of his brain.

He was released from the hospital May 21. A course of treatment has not been announced.

Kennedy, a Catholic, was elected in 1962 to the seat once held by his brother, John F. Kennedy, who became president in 1960.

He is the third-longest serving senator in U.S. history, after the late Strom Thurmond of South Carolina and Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va.,

Kennedy has worked with Catholic bishops and Catholic Charities officials on a variety of issues, such as immigration, the federal minimum wage and health coverage.

He also has been criticized by Catholic leaders for his support for legalized abortion and embryonic stem-cell research.

Catholic colleagues in the Senate and House offered their support for the senator.

During a May 21 media briefing on Capitol Hill announcing religious leaders' support for a newly-reworked climate change bill, Bishop Thomas G. Wenski of Orlando, Fla., who is chairman of the U.S. bishops' Committee on International Justice and Peace, led other Christian and Jewish religious leaders in a moment of prayer for Kennedy.

FROM THE VATICAN

Vatican document says vow of obedience shows dependence on God

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — A religious vow of obedience is a witness to the truth that obeying God's will sometimes involves reining in unbridled personal freedom, said a new Vatican document.

"With their very existence, consecrated persons present the possibility of a different way for the fulfillment of their own life, a way where the goal is God, his word the light and his will the guide," said the document from the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life.

The document, "The Service of Authority and Obedience," was released May 28 at the Vatican and was presented the same day to the heads of men's religious orders at the assembly of the Union of Superiors General.

In the past, the document said, religious superiors risked focusing so much of the order's mission that they could overlook the needs and gifts of individual members; "today, the risk can come rather from excessive fear of hurting others' feelings" or by focusing so much on individual talents that the impact on the order as a whole is neglected.

Neither religious obedience nor exercising authority in a religious community is easy, which is why both must take place in an atmosphere of prayer, with members seeking the will of God and listening to one another, it said.

Those in authority must be instruments of God's love and mercy, the document said.

The superior must be a person of deep prayer who listens to and consults others, but is not afraid to take responsibility for making the final decision, it said.

"Persons in authority must act in such a way that the brothers or sisters can perceive that when they give a command they are doing so only to obey God," said the document.

Receiving Eucharist kneeling may not be permanent change

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The four dozen people who received Communion from Pope Benedict XVI on the feast of the Body and Blood of Christ received the Eucharist on the tongue while kneeling.

Vatican officials said the gesture at the May 22 Mass outside the Basilica of St. John Lateran does not mark a permanent change in papal liturgies, but highlighted the solemnity of the feast and a connection to Mass practices in the past.

As the pope prepared to distribute Communion, two ushers placed a kneeler in front of the altar on the basilica steps. The chosen communicants — laypeople, nuns, seminarians, priests and boys and girls who had received their first Communion in their parishes in May — all knelt and received on the tongue.

Generally at papal Masses, those receiving Communion from the pope stand. The majority choose to receive on the tongue, but some reverently extend cradled hands to receive the Eucharist.

In a brief e-mail to Catholic News Service May 23, Msgr. Guido Marini, master of papal liturgical ceremonies, said the decision "was a solution adopted for (the feast of) Corpus Domini," but as for the future, "we'll see."

Archbishop Albert Malcolm Ranjith Patabendige Don, secretary of the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Sacraments, told CNS "there is no discussion" in the Vatican about insisting that those who receive Communion from the pope do so kneeling or that they receive it on the tongue rather than in their hands.

In addition, he said, "there are no new norms coming" that would change the Vatican's 1969 decision that local bishops could allow their faithful to receive the Eucharist in their hands while standing.

"But the gesture of the Holy Father" at the May 22 Mass "is to be appreciated. It brings out in a better way the fact that we adore the Lord whom we receive" in the Eucharist, Archbishop Ranjith said.

"It was a special occasion" because the feast focuses on Jesus truly present in the Eucharist, he said. "I hope this practice spreads."

In his homily at the Mass, Pope Benedict spoke about the importance of "kneeling before the Lord, adoration that begins at the Mass itself and accompanies the entire (Corpus Christi) procession" through the streets of Rome.

"To adore the body of Christ means to believe that there, in that piece of bread, there really is Christ who gives meaning to our lives," the pope said in his homily.

Honoring Our Lady of Fatima

Mass, dinner recognizes influence, vocations, work of foundation

GREENSBORO — Our Lady of Fatima's influence on vocations was recognized recently during a special Mass and dinner.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis celebrated a Mass in honor of Our Lady of Fatima at Our Lady of Grace Church in Greensboro May 13, the feast of Our Lady of Fatima.

Several priests of the Diocese of Charlotte concelebrated the Mass, with transitional deacons assisting and seminarians serving.

During the dinner afterward in the parish hall, Father Conrad Kimbrough, a retired priest of the diocese, was honored for his devotion to Our Lady and to fostering vocations.

The Mass and dinner — attended by guests from the dioceses of Charlotte, Raleigh and Richmond, Va. — were sponsored by the Te Deum Foundation, a North Carolina-based benevolent organization that provides spiritual and material needs for seminarians.

On May 13, 1917, three siblings claimed to have seen Mary near their home at Fatima, Portugal. The apparitions continued once a month until October 1917 and later were declared worthy of belief by the Catholic Church.

In his homily, concelebrant Father James Ebright spoke from first-hand experience that Our Lady guides seminarians along their paths to the priesthood.

For priests, she is "their special mother, the mother of the one, true priest, prophet and king they seek to follow," said Father Ebright, who is in residence at Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury.

Father John Putnam, diocesan judicial vicar and pastor of Sacred Heart Church, spoke during the dinner about how his early trip to the site of Our Lady's apparitions. There, he said, he received confirmation that the priesthood was indeed his vocation.

As such, he praised the importance of the Te Deum Foundation's Fatima pilgrimage for seminarians.

Father Richard DeClue, who is performing graduate studies at the Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C., spoke of how the foundation provided for some of his material needs, allowing him to stay focused on his studies.

Father Christopher Roux, the bishop's priest secretary, spoke about the foundation's plans to build a seminary in North Carolina. The dinner raised funds for the project.

There are currently no seminaries between Florida and Washington, D.C., he said.

"Unlike other sections of the country where parishes are closing or consolidating, there's a need here for our unique culture of an expanding Catholic population," said Father Roux.

At the end of the dinner, Bishop Jugis and Wilhelmina Silva-Mobley, foundation president, presented a special award to Father Kimbrough. Although retired from active ministry, Father Kimbrough continues to mentor young seminarians and bring new men into the priesthood.

"Father Kimbrough has and continues to serve Our Lord by bringing new shepherds to his flock," said Silva-Mobley.

In recognition of Father Kimbrough's years of service, the foundation endowed the Rev. Conrad L. Kimbrough Scholarship for Seminarians.

"The Te Deum Foundation's mission and seminary project are both praiseworthy endeavors in the service of the Lord and his church," said Bishop Jugis.

Each child celebrating his or her first Communion has a role during the Mass, such as carrying banners or candles, reading the first reading or intercessions, bringing up offertory gifts and preparing the altar for the eucharistic prayer.

First Communion, along with baptism and confirmation, is one of the three sacraments of initiation.

Rural Zimbabweans fear for lives amid violence

"are motivated to vote again to ensure an end to the present system," he told Catholic News Service in a May 26 telephone interview from the capital, Harare.

"Many communities feel that voting will be an act of solidarity with their friends who have been killed or wounded in the violence, so that they did not die in vain," Chaumba said.

A report on postelection violence in Zimbabwe by the Solidarity Peace Trust, an ecumenical group of church organizations from Zimbabwe and

South Africa, said, "There needs to be a general recognition that Zimbabwe is sinking fast into the conditions of a civil war, propelled largely by the increasing reliance on violence by the ruling party to stay in power, and the rapidly shrinking spaces for any form of peaceful political intervention."

The report, released in Johannesburg, South Africa, May 21, contained about 50 eyewitness accounts of orchestrated beatings, torture and the destruction of homes and shops.

The results of the March 29 parliamentary and presidential elections are "a clear message that, despite the extremely harsh and repressive political environment in which elections have been conducted in Zimbabwe, the people of the country found the 'resources of hope' required to say no to continued authoritarian rule," it said.

In early May, election officials announced that Morgan Tsvangirai, leader of the Movement for Democratic Change, took 47.9 percent of the vote while President Robert Mugabe, 84, who has led Zimbabwe since independence from Britain in 1980, took 43.2 percent.

The official results of the parliamentary vote confirmed that the opposition held a majority of seats for the first time in 28 years.

The report said that the ruling party's violence "has demonstrated the hollowness of Mugabe's anti-colonial message, with the real targets of his party's onslaught being the impoverished and battered citizens of the country."

The party's conduct since the March elections "has encapsulated the degeneracy of the Mugabe legacy, and the security threat that this regime now poses to Zimbabweans and the region," it added.

The report noted that the violence "was carefully planned by a combination of army, police" and government intelligence operatives at an April meeting in the village of Nkayi, Zimbabwe.

In their late May newsletter, Zimbabwe's Jesuits said there has been "vicious, premeditated violence" on an unprecedented scale in the country since the elections.

They urged opposition supporters who have been attacked by government agents to resist the temptation to retaliate.

"This would be civil war. It would also destroy the moral foundation of the struggle of the opposition for freedom and the restoration of human dignity in this country," they said.

In Harare, Anglican Bishop Sebastian Bakare said people attending services in Anglican churches are assaulted by police with increasing brutality. In a statement, he expressed shock and dismay at the "continuous police interference with Sunday services."

Police officers "beat, harass and arrest us, having declared our church premises no-go areas," his May 23 statement said.

Bishop Bakare replaced a pro-Mugabe bishop.

Jesuit Father Oscar Wermter said in the May newsletter that "a church congregation that is praying for peace is now deemed to be in support of the opposition — with a certain logic, one has to admit, since the ruling party is definitely engaged in war against the common people and is against peace."

"It is a great shame and very sad that members of the church supporting different parties may be fighting each other," Father Wermter said.

IN MEMORIAM

Jesuit Father Lawrence Hunt: 1927-2008

Priest remembered for mission work, leading others to Jesus

BALTIMORE, Md. — Jesuit Father Lawrence Hunt, a Jesuit for more than 60 years who once served in the Diocese of Charlotte, died May 20 at Colombiere Jesuit Residence in Baltimore, Md.

He was 81.

A Mass of Christian burial was held at St. Mark Church in Catonsville, Md., May 23. He was buried at the Jesuit cemetery in Woodstock, Md.

Father Hunt was born Feb. 14, 1927. He entered the Society of Jesus at St. Isaac Jogues Novitiate in Wernersville, Pa., Sept. 20, 1944. He was ordained at Woodstock Seminary June 23, 1957.

In 1963, Father Hunt was sent as a missionary to India, where he would spend 21 years in various ministries, notably at several schools and a hospital for patients with Hanson's disease (leprosy).

"He led with his heart," said Father Joseph Lacey, who had been friends with Father Hunt since 1959 and worked with him in India for many years.

Although Father Hunt never mastered the languages in India, he found a profound way to communicate.

"Every day, he would make the rounds and shake every leprosy patient's hand," said Father Lacey.

In 1984, Father Hunt returned to the United States and served as dean of students at St. Joseph's University in Philadelphia for a year.

He then returned to parish ministry, serving as assistant pastor and parochial vicar at parishes in Delaware, Maryland and Washington, D.C.

He served as pastor of St. Benedict the Moor Church and Good Shepherd Mission in Winston Salem from 1990 until 2004.

He then went on to serve as a pastoral care minister at a parish and medical center in Maryland between 2004 and 2008. He also took part in Radio Mass, which broadcast Sunday Masses from St. Ignatius Church in Baltimore for the homebound.

"He was a very, very vital part of this parish, even when he was in India," said Father Christopher Whatley, pastor of St. Mark Church, where Father Hunt continued to celebrate Sunday Mass until April 2008.

Father Hunt entered the Jesuits from St. Mark Church, according to Father Whatley, and the parishioners supported him and his work while he was in India.

"The parish was delighted when he came back here to serve the last few years and the schoolchildren especially cherished his sense of humor, his love for them and his strong desire to be with them," said Father Whatley.

"He saw his ministry as a way of telling everybody that Jesus loved them," said Deacon Joseph Knepper of St. Mark Church. "That's the way he lived his life."

Father Hunt is survived by two brothers, a sister and many nieces and nephews.

In lieu of flowers, the family requests donations made payable to "Jesuit Missions" be sent to Maryland Province, Jesuits Advancement, P.O. Box 64818, Baltimore, MD 21264.

Josephite brother who was nationally renowned photographer dies at 78

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A funeral Mass for nationally renowned photographer Josephite Brother Earl Vincent Kent, 78, was celebrated May 28 at St. Francis Xavier Church in Baltimore.

Brother Earl died May 22 at St. Joseph Manor in Baltimore — a retirement and recuperation facility for the Josephites — following a long and debilitating illness, said Josephite Father John F. Byrne, a retired priest at the facility. Brother Earl was interred in New Cathedral Cemetery in Baltimore.

Orphaned as an infant in Baltimore, he was raised in St. Elizabeth Home and was educated at Dunbar Junior High School in the Maryland city and St. Joseph Industrial School for Boys in Clayton, Del., until 1946. He eventually began working at the Josephite facility even before he joined the religious order in 1954. He took his final vows in 1961.

Brother Earl served in a number of ministries in New York, Delaware, Maryland, Washington, Texas and Louisiana. Along the way he developed a passion for photography and honed his craft, Father Byrne said.

"He would later become a formidable photographer for the Josephites," he said. "He generated a large portfolio of photographs chronicling Josephite and parochial life and work throughout the country. Many such photographs have been published in the Josephite Harvest, the Josephite mission magazine."

In addition to teaching photography at St. Joseph Industrial School for Boys, Brother Earl also served as the official photographer at the Josephite Pastoral Center in St. Joseph Seminary in Washington.

"He was always taking pictures," said Josephite Brother Thomas Vincent, a longtime friend of Brother Earl, who is now working at the Washington seminary.

Though much of his later photography can be seen at the Washington seminary, his work was appreciated by people nationwide who picked up a copy of the Josephite Harvest, said Josephite Father Frank M. Hull, editor of the national magazine.

"Brother Earl had been taking pictures most of his life as a Josephite brother," Father Hull said. "He could always be counted on to cover Josephite-related events."

The subjects in his photos stood out because they were never posed and he captured their true essence in the frame, Father Byrne said.

"When you saw the picture, you felt like you knew the guy," the priest said. "They were real people in his photos and when you look at them you can almost see into their souls, whether it was a photo at a funeral, a Josephite meeting, a bishop showing up, or of a pillar of the community."

The Baltimore-based Josephites — who primarily serve black communities — currently run parishes and schools in Washington, Baltimore, Virginia, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Texas and California, and have seminaries in both Washington and Nigeria.

Some of his favorite photographic subjects were youngsters in the different ministries, Brother Thomas said.

"Brother Earl really loved working with the youth," he said. "He may have been known for his photography, but he had also become a top-notch track coach when he was at St. Joseph Industrial School for Boys."

Very private, quiet and reserved, Brother Earl wasn't an easy man to get to know, but his photographs spoke volumes, Father Byrne said.

"He was one of those special kinds of artists I guess," he said. "He was not what you would call a media star."

Vatican completes restoration of mausoleum under St. Peter's

Stella, an official at the Fabbrica di San Pietro, the office responsible for the basilica's upkeep.

The $300,000 project was funded by the Rome-based Foundation for Music and Sacred Art, the Italian branch of Mercedes-Benz, and other sponsors.

Stella and other Vatican officials spoke at a May 27 press conference at the Fabbrica's headquarters near the basilica.

The Vatican necropolis includes the burial grounds where St. Peter's tomb has been venerated since early Christian times. The Valerii mausoleum was built sometime after 160 by Gaius Valerius Herma — a wealthy, highly educated Roman slave who had bought his freedom. He built the site for his family and his freed slaves and their descendants.

Like many other pagan tombs in the necropolis, the sarcophagi were later “recycled” by Christians who buried their loved ones and added inscriptions referring to Christ.

The cemetery had been used until the fourth century when the emperor Constantine had workmen fill in the open-air necropolis with dirt in order to lay the foundation for building a basilica above St. Peter's tomb.

The airless, lightless atmosphere actually had helped preserve much of the artwork and statuary.

Restorers for the Valerii mausoleum used hand-held lasers, tiny drills, scalpels, sponges and plain water to remove mineral salts, other encrustations and dirt, and they injected special glues to reinforce crumbling plaster walls.

They pieced together broken plaster or marble fragments back onto statuary tucked into niches lining the mausoleum walls.

Stella said what makes this mausoleum stand out from the others is its “uniform use of stucco” for artistic rather than architectural reasons and the large number of life-size plaster figures that are almost three-dimensional bas-reliefs.

More than a dozen figures in the various niches and “lunettes” above the sarcophagi have been either partially or completely preserved. Inscriptions and elegant stucco decorations indicate each buried relative's name and interests when he or she was alive.

One elderly male figure holds a tablet in one hand while writing implements are depicted in the lunette above him.

Above one younger female figure are bas-reliefs of a mirror and a jewelry case and above an older female is a spindle, basket and ball of yarn.

Many Roman gods and goddesses decorate the walls. Hypnos, the god of sleep, has the wings of a bat and is surrounded by two similarly winged cherubs who are holding a gilded cornucopia filled with poppy seeds.

The second-century subterranean burial ground is two levels below the basilica floor, and St. Peter's tomb is directly under the basilica's main altar.

The cemetery was excavated for the first time in the 1930-40s, revealing a double row of mausoleums and niches decorated with paintings, stucco recalled the enthusiasm of the youths and their eagerness to become more involved at the parish.

"All it took was some organization," she said.

Over the past year, the youth group has become a visible part of ministry in the parish.

The 10:30 a.m. Mass on the third Sunday of each month is designated as the youth Mass. At that Mass, youth group members serve as readers, ushers and altar servers.

"It is so important that we encourage these young adults to be participants in the church," said Driscoll. "Serving their parish and community should be a vital part of their lives."

The youths have completed service projects such as yard work for parishioners and a fundraiser for a local food pantry, "Loving Food Resources."

Other involvement in the parish has included the performance of an "Epiphany play" and a presentation of the Passion on Palm Sunday.

"Our youths appreciate the recognition they receive from our parish," said Driscoll. "This past year they have begun to recognize that they play a vital role in the church."

One of the primary goals they set for the first year was organizing a trip to the 2007 Eucharistic Congress in Charlotte.

At the congress, they took part in eucharistic adoration and the eucharistic procession, and attended the youth program track.

High school youth group members attended the annual Diocesan Youth Conference in Ridgecrest in April.

"Our youths are both the future and the 'now' of the church," said Driscoll.

"The youth group was formed to enhance the parish life at St. Joan of Arc," said Mike Driscoll, adult volunteer and Nancy's husband.

"And with the continued support of all concerned, it will continue to thrive," he said.

MARS HILL — The support and encouragement of the youths at St. Andrew the Apostle Church in Mars Hill have resulted in an increased spirit of giving from the small parish.

Maxine Pendleton, parish youth ministry director, engages the youths in an ongoing outreach to the communities in western North Carolina and beyond.

The first Saturday of each month, the youth group joins with a Baptist church to help feed the homeless and needy in downtown Asheville. The youths have developed friendships with many of the people they serve.

"Ms. Maebell is in her 80s and she looks after everyone," said Kegan Daly about one of the regulars at the Saturday food ministry.

"I'm dropping off an invitation to my (high school) graduation to her," said Daly.

Three recent Saturdays were spent on an extensive yard cleanup for a neighbor of a member of the parish music ministry.

The group also spent a Sunday in May running "Cakes for Kids," a bake sale fundraiser that raised $250 for Arts for Life, an organization that teaches visual arts, music and creative writing to disabled children.

The parish youth ministry began eight years ago under Pendleton's guidance. Changes are in store as some of the founding members, including Daly, move on to college this year, but the ministry remains strong with newer members growing into their roles as servants for those in need.

While focusing on local outreach most of the time, youth group members — after months of fundraising and support from parishioners — achieved their dream of going to Mexico in 2006 to help build a home in an impoverished community.

In addition to helping the less fortunate, the youths felt they received blessings from the experience.

"The poverty is pervasive," said Colleen Daly, one of the members who went on the trip and remains an active participant in the group.

"The trip helped us develop our own community," she said.

"It ties in with our faith," said Kegan Daly. "These are our brothers and sisters and we brought back those ties."

As some of the youth group members head off to college, they intend to take with them the lessons they have learned.

And through working with the youths, Pendleton said she too has learned more about tolerance and acceptance of others.

"The bottom line is the unconditional love God gives to us that we give to others around us," she said.

Charlotte Catholic senior organizes event for ALS

Lunch with football player raises money, awareness

BY KATIE MOORE
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — When Charlotte Catholic High School senior Ally Petrilli found out her dad was diagnosed with ALS (Amyotrophic Lateral Sclerosis) she decided to take a proactive approach to dealing with his illness.

"When my dad was diagnosed two years ago, I knew I wanted to do something to raise money and raise awareness," said Petrilli.

With the help of her friends and the encouragement of faculty and staff at Charlotte Catholic, she organized several events to help support the cause.

Fundraisers included a school dance and dress-down day — a day when students paid a dollar to wear something other than the school uniform.

Then a family friend suggested they solicit the help of a professional — a professional football player, that is.

Tom Brydon knew Mike Rucker, former defensive end for the Carolina Panthers, from his work on the board of the PinStripes Fund, which supports initiatives of the Carolinas Neuromuscular/ALS-MDA Center.

He knew ALS was a cause that was close to Rucker's heart. Rucker's grandfather was diagnosed with ALS when he was 9 years old.

ALS, also known as Lou Gehrig's disease, is a progressive neurodegenerative disease that attacks nerve cells in the brain and spinal cord resulting in muscle weakness and atrophy, according to the ALS Association Web site.

Petrilli and Charlotte Catholic campus minister Mary Jane Dawson came up with the idea of hosting a lunch with Rucker at the school.

Any student who supported the cause through the purchase of an ALS wristband could attend the event.

"It's always good to see the youth find a cause," said Rucker, who spoke at the event on May 27.

He recalled how the situation with his grandfather taught him what it meant to be a family.

"As a young kid it showed me the strength it took and the dedication," he said.

The Petrilli family is a testament to that strength.

"This whole situation — as bad as it is — helps you realize the importance of your faith, family and friends," said Ally's mother, Sherri Petrilli.

"You can't tackle something this huge without that support," she said.

This year, students at Charlotte Catholic have raised $6,500 for the ALS Association's Jim "Catfish" Hunter Chapter in North Carolina.

"It's been great to see my family, friends and school community come together to support such a worthy cause — to support my dad," said Petrilli.

During the last six years of his career, Rucker helped raise a quarter of a million dollars for ALS through his fundraiser "SACK ALS."

"I felt like it was time to do my part," he said.

Through the program, supporters pledged to contribute a set amount of money per sack each season. The more sacks he collected, the more money he raised.

Now that he is retired, Rucker said he will have to come up with a new way to raise money for ALS.

In the meantime he said, "I enjoy talking to the youth and raising awareness."

He said he likes to see the creative ways young people, like Petrilli, are able to raise funds.

"It starts in the heart," he said. "And through small projects."

The North Carolinian and his cousin, the saint

Two families, an ocean apart, reunited by St. Gaetano

BY NADIA MARIE SMITH
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

PHILADELPHIA — Not many people can say they have a cousin for a saint. But Justin Catanoso, a parishioner of St. Pius X Church in Greensboro, can.

Catanoso wrote about it in his first book, "My Cousin the Saint: A Search for Faith, Family and Miracles," published this May.

The book brings to life one of the church's newest canonized saints, St. Gaetano Catanoso, an Italian parish priest who served in a rural region with extreme poverty and a high rate of illiteracy and was a breeding ground for crime.

Canonized in October 2005, the Italian diocesan priest was one of five men in the first group of saints proclaimed by Pope Benedict XVI. He lived from 1879-1963.

Known for a spirit of charity, humility and sacrifice, St. Gaetano was dedicated to the holy face of Christ. He revived Marian and eucharistic devotions in his local parish and founded an organization to help subsidize education for poor seminarians.

He also opened an evening school for children in his parish who had to work at home or on the farm during the day.

His devotion to the Holy Face led him to found the Daughters of St. Veronica, Missionaries of the Holy Face, in 1934. St. Veronica is the woman who approached Jesus as he carried his cross and gave him her veil so he could wipe his face.

"Padre Gaetano came to believe he could do no less than to love with the same kind of intensity that Jesus loved. How else could he soften so many hardened souls?" Catanoso writes in his book.

"Like St. Veronica, herself, Padre Gaetano would fall in step with the many, many poor hobbling all around him. He would wipe their faces of tears and blood. He would love them blindly, radically, unconditionally."

In his book, Catanoso uncovers the paths of his sainted cousin and that of his grandfather, Carmelo. The only Catanoso family member to emigrate to the United States, Carmelo established the American branch of the family in this country.

The 2005 canonization of St. Gaetano spurred a family reunion and set author Catanoso on a personal journey of faith. Until then, he had been a self-described lapsed Catholic, more of a cultural Catholic than anything else.

"I remember sitting there, in the middle of St. Peter's Square, at this most extraordinary ceremony on this picture-perfect day with 100,000 people in the square, thinking, 'The faith is so palpable in the square and I am a spectator to it.

That's not good enough. I am going to give this a try," Catanoso recalled.

At that moment, he said, he promised himself he would start going to church and understanding the Mass, which was so central to St. Gaetano's life.

As he began that spiritual journey, he was approached to write a book about his cousin. So Catanoso, a Pulitzer Prize-nominated journalist and journalism instructor at Wake Forest University in North Carolina, set off in "search of faith, family and miracles."

The resulting book has been hailed as "a glorious book," by Jesuit Father James Martin, the author of "My Life With the Saints" and acting publisher of America magazine.

"Part spiritual journey, part detective story, part travelogue, Justin Catanoso's engrossing new memoir shows how discovering God always leads to discovering yourself," Father Martin wrote in his review of the book.

Catanoso spoke about his cousin and his family May 29 at St. Cornelius Church in Chadds Ford, Pa. Msgr. Gregory Parlante, the pastor, attended St. Gaetano's canonization and his family is related to the Catanosos through marriage.

Jesus taps into people where they are

BY JEFF HEDGLEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

The Tejano music is streaming out of the sound system, there is a margarita in my hand, it is Cinco de Mayo and I am mingling with about 100 young adults in a local bar.

The clincher is that I am not cruising for a date. I'm at a church event. The event is called "Theology Oon Tap."

All around the country, "Theology Oon Tap" gathers young adults in a relaxed setting to bring the message of Jesus' love to those who may not have darkened the door of a church since their confirmation.

There is some controversy about this. After all, this is a church-sponsored event at a bar! This Sunday's Gospel offers us a glimpse into the theology behind the "Tap."

Some of Jesus' followers were asked, "Why does your teacher eat with tax collectors and sinners?"

Jesus, overhearing the question, replied: "Those who are well do not need a physician, but the sick do. .... I did not come to call the righteous but sinners."

Jesus is the master of meeting people where they are. He does not expect them to change before he accepts them. Quite the contrary, he makes the first move and offers healing.

This night in the bar, Jesus moves, too. The speaker is talking about the Resurrection and poses the question: "What difference does it make for me?"

As I gaze around the room, I see the faces of young Catholics eager to learn more and believe more.

They may not be perfect, but at least they are seeking. They seek the Resurrection; they seek people who are like them in age and faith background; they seek fulfillment for their life; they seek peace; and they seek belonging.

All of what they seek is found in the person of Jesus and in his body that is gathered — tonight in a bar here, every Sunday at Mass. Let's pray that the former leads to the latter!

Questions:

Where do you think Jesus would go to minister to people if he had come now instead of 2,000 years ago? Is anyone bringing the Gospel to those places in your town?

What can we do to bring the light of the Gospel to the dark places in our world?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

SYDNEY, Australia (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI will send daily text messages directly to pilgrims during World Youth Day July 15-20 in Sydney, said youth day organizers.

The pope's text messages of hope and inspiration will be carried by World Youth Day's official communications partner, Telstra, said a World Youth Day statement May 7.

The Vatican has not commented.

"We wanted to make WYD08 a unique experience by using new ways to connect with today's tech-savvy youth," said Auxiliary Bishop Anthony Fisher of Sydney, World Youth Day coordinator.

The Telstra partnership, he said, means that Sydney "will be the most innovative World Youth Day to date."

A Telstra spokesperson said the GSM cell-phone networks running for World Youth Day "will mean many cell phones used by pilgrims from the United States will also work here."

Pilgrims also can purchase a prepaid SIM card for their cell phones when they arrive in Australia. However, a Telstra spokesman noted that CDMA phones do not accept their SIM cards.

In addition to its official Web site — www.wyd2008.org/index.php/en — World Youth Day also will offer an online social networking site www.xt3.com.

The site's social network will be launched in coming weeks, although pilgrims already may visit the site and ask to be notified via e-mail when registration opens.

Archdiocese of Indianapolis sues Facebook over phony Web page

BY DENNIS SADOWSKI
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — The Archdiocese of Indianapolis is suing the online social networking site Facebook to learn the identity of the person who developed a phony Facebook page that targeted a high school administrator by using his name without his permission.

The suit was filed May 9 on behalf of Tim Puntarelli, dean of students at the archdiocesan-run Roncalli High School in Indianapolis.

Archdiocesan spokesman Greg Otolski told Catholic News Service May 15 that the suit was filed after Facebook failed to turn over information about who established the Web page and sent inappropriate messages to students.

Facebook, based in Palo Alto, Calif., allows users to communicate with friends, fellow students, co-workers and others. Users can post photos and messages on individual Web pages.

The phony Web page's anonymous developers must be identified in order for the archdiocese to determine if additional legal action is required to protect and restore Puntarelli's reputation, Otolski said.

"One of the reasons we want to see who did it is to decide how we would proceed," Otolski said.

Archdiocesan officials want to know "if it's kids who thought it was a practical joke and didn't realize the seriousness of it, or if it was someone who had it out for him to ruin his reputation and ruin his career," he said.

The Web page was discovered April 18 and was taken down within two days after the school's technology director contacted Facebook, according to the complaint filed in Marion County Superior Court.

The suit alleges that the user, identified only through an e-mail address as mclovenjesus@yahoo.com, created a profile for Puntarelli and defamed him through photos and inappropriate messages sent to Roncalli High School students.

The postings included invitations to 31 students to become Puntarelli's "Facebook Friends" and a message suggesting that Puntarelli may take disciplinary action and/or administer a drug test to a student, the suit said.

The complaint also alleges that the user transmitted false and misleading messages about the archdiocese.

"We're not looking to infringe upon anybody's First Amendment rights in any kind of way," Otolski said. "But I don't think in this case he's a public figure. He's not somebody who would be well known to a large group of people."

The court issued a temporary restraining order May 9 preventing Facebook from destroying information regarding the identity of the Web page's creator.

"We're still talking with Facebook's lawyers and we're still hoping that Facebook will give us the info we need to identify the creator of the page," Otolski told CNS.

Facebook declined comment on the case.

Jesuit magazine criticizes 'Big Brother' TV show for its disservices

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The "Big Brother" television series risks creating a new generation of gladiators when people act not according to ethical standards but according to what is necessary to survive, said an influential Jesuit journal.

The influence the reality television show has on today's culture and future generations means alternative ways must be found that teach young people "more dignified" role models, it said.

In a May 17 article released to journalists May 15, La Civiltà Cattolica gave a lengthy description of the "Big Brother" series that started in the Netherlands in 1999 and soon spread to other parts of the world.

The Rome-based biweekly journal is reviewed by the Vatican Secretariat of State before publication.

In the United States, the 10th season of "Big Brother" will air in July; the eighth season wrapped up in Italy this spring.

The article, written by Jesuit Father Francesco Occhetta, said the "Big Brother" formula is reminiscent of ancient pagan sacrifices, where the god being worshipped is the brother's all-seeing eye, the altar is the stage, and participants are regularly "sacrificed" in these new temples.

Whereas the world of Big Brother in George Orwell's book, "1984," sought to create a society of inclusion in which everyone fit in and did not get out of line, the reality series is based on "exclusion: pinpointing the people who don't fit the role assigned to them" and tossing them out "like a bouncer" weeding out the "undesirables."

A third definition of "big brother," the article said, must be promoted — that of being an older sibling to someone, being responsible for others' needs and willing to sacrifice oneself for the other.

It said the severity of the difficulties, dangers and exploitation the participants experience is demonstrated by the fact that participants are offered several sessions with professional therapists after their stint on the show is over.

Parents, church groups and teachers must work together to "unmask the underlying dynamics" at work on the show and teach youths that reality television is a moneymaker, not something serious upon which to model their lives.

"Otherwise the risk is to train new 'gladiators'" to fight it out in the public arena with the aim of eliminating one another, it said.

Something to 'Honk' about

Student production a success, says director

GREENSBORO — The St. Pius X Players, middle-school students at St. Pius X School in Greensboro, presented "Honk! Jr." to rave reviews and sellout crowds as part of the school's fifth annual spring production March 13-15.

"Honk!" is an award-winning musical retelling of the Hans Christian Andersen story "The Ugly Duckling," mixed with a theme of pro-tolerance. "Honk! Jr." was a revised version tailored for middle school-age students.

"It is a great story for all ages, teaching us how to accept people the way they are and that being different can be a good thing," said Tracy Shaw, middle school religion and drama teacher, who directed the production. "I chose this musical, because of the great songs and the underlying message that it gave: 'We are all unique and special.'"

This year's production was the largest yet, according to Shaw. The sixth-through-eighth-grade performers rehearsed for six weeks, four days a week, to prepare for the show in the school's auditorium. Art teacher Sharon Nosal designed the set and resource assistant Cindy Basel designed the costumes.

Shaw said the show was a huge success.

"I was blown away by the performances of my actors. I am blessed with a very talented group of students who are willing to take risks for the sake of art," she said.

There are more pressing questions about life on earth

Coexistence of science and religion must be considered

You know what's coming when you see news stories with the words "Vatican" and "aliens" in the same sentence. It's raw material for Leno and Letterman, another opportunity to make Catholics appear silly.

And so it was with a recent interview with the Vatican astronomer whose main premise is this: It is difficult to exclude the possibility that other intelligent life exists in the universe.

That carefully nuanced statement then appeared in secular headlines as "Vatican OKs alien life," "Vatican says OK to believe in aliens" and "Vatican says little green men are part of creation."

"In my opinion this possibility exists," Jesuit Father Jose Funes, the director of the Vatican Observatory, told L'Osservatore Romano, the Vatican newspaper. "This is not in contrast with the faith because we cannot place limits on the creative freedom of God."

God created multiple forms of life on earth, and there may be diverse forms throughout the universe.

The Bible "is not a science book," and looking for scientific facts on the universe and its origin doesn't cast doubt on God's role in its creation, he said.

Father Funes said the big-bang theory is the most "reasonable" explanation of the creation of the universe. The theory says the universe began billions of years ago in the explosion of a single, superdense point that contained all matter.

Astronomers believe the universe is made up of 100 billion galaxies, each consisting of 100 billion stars, he said.

So think about it: Is it presumptuous to hold that intelligence can exist only on Earth, one planet among billions? Is it proper to say that we are the best that God can do?

As intriguing as these considerations

STEPHEN KENT
CNS COLUMNIST

may be, there are more important and pressing questions about life on earth and the relationship of religion and science.

The U.S. bishops will consider at their June 13-15 meeting a brief policy statement on embryonic stem-cell research.

"The issue of stem-cell research does not force us to choose between science and ethics, much less between science and religion," the draft document says. "It presents a choice as to how our society will pursue scientific and medical progress."

It would be good if this moral issue would attract as much attention in a serious vein as does extraterrestrial life.

The policy statement addresses three arguments of proponents, the most chilling of which says "that which is destroyed is not a human life, or at least not a human being with fundamental human rights."

If not inherent upon creation, then when are such rights conferred and by whom? Can it be argued that what can be granted can also be revoked?

These are serious questions.

If it is reasonable to believe that the universe began with the explosion of a single point that contained all matter, is it any less reasonable to believe that a human being — with the full complement of human genes — began as an embryo?

Has a human embryo ever been known to become anything other than a human being?

The church too often is cast as anti-science. It is not.

"Catholic foundations and medical centers have been and will continue to be among the leading supports of ethically responsibly advances in the medical use of adult stem cells," says the bishops' draft document on embryonic stem-cell research.

While musings about alien life may open the mind to ponder deeper questions, the questions around embryonic stem cells are more profound and more demanding of serious attention.

It is upon them that the proper coexistence of science and religion will balance.

A silver anniversary worth remembering

U.S. bishops challenged faithful to put Gospel, church teaching first Twenty-five years ago the U.S. Catholic bishops were at their prophetic best. In the midst of the Cold War and a fast-moving arms race, and with nuclear war — mutually assured destruction — threatening the world, they courageously challenged the widely held and dangerous assumption that war is inevitable — even nuclear war!

In May of 1983, the bishops released their landmark pastoral letter "The Challenge of Peace: God's Promise and Our Response." Immediately it became a lightning rod.

The bishops were highly criticized as being naive churchmen who were playing in a game they neither understood nor belonged in.

But the bishops did exactly what faithful bishops should always be doing: explaining the principles of peace contained in the Gospel and Catholic social teaching and providing authoritative moral applications based on those principles to the grave issues of contemporary war and war preparation.

The bishops insisted that the faithful have an obligation to take their applied teachings most seriously.

They wrote: "The moral judgments that we make in specific cases, while not binding in conscience, are to be given serious attention and consideration by Catholics as they determine whether their moral judgments are consistent with the Gospel."

However, now as then, it appears that most U.S. Catholics continue to cling far tighter to an unhealthy sense of nationalism — "my country right or wrong" — than to a way of life that strives to make moral judgments that are consistent with the Gospel.

But 25 years ago the U.S. bishops strongly challenged us to put the Gospel and Catholic social teaching first!

They condemned the arms race as a danger to peace and a theft of money and goods needed by the poor. Instead, they called for a just distribution of the world's resources.

Condemning nuclear weapons, the bishops wrote that nuclear deterrence cannot be considered an adequate long-term basis for peace. However, 25 long dangerous years have passed, and

Making a Difference

TONY MAGLIANO
CNS COLUMNIST

nuclear deterrence remains a permanent part of U.S. warfare strategy.

Quoting Pope John Paul II, the bishops declared: "Today, the scale and the horror of modern warfare — whether nuclear or not — makes it totally unacceptable as a means of settling differences."

One of the five bishops charged with drafting "The Challenge of Peace," retired Auxiliary Bishop Thomas J. Gumbleton of Detroit, told me that the just-war theory is not workable.

Hesaiditsprinciplesofdiscrimination (non-combatant immunity) and proportionality (going to war cannot cause more harm than good) cannot be met considering the massive destruction caused by modern warfare.

Bishop Gumbleton said the reason most Christians won't reject war is because they follow the direction of culture more than the direction of the Gospel. He said, "Jesus taught us how to die, not how to kill." A disciple "doesn't die with a weapon in his or her hand."

It would be a great service to the Catholic Church and the world if the present U.S. bishops would seriously re-examine and actively promote the deep insights and prophetic challenges offered by their predecessors in "The Challenge of Peace."

It would also be very helpful if priests and deacons would periodically weave the peace pastoral's teachings into their homilies.

A silver anniversary deserves to be celebrated! Let's dust off "The Challenge of Peace: God's Promise and Our Response" and strive to live out the wisdom and hope it offers our war-plagued world!

Iraq: Five Years Later

Do you think the result of the war with Iraq was worth the loss of American life and other costs?

Conducted among a random sample of 844 U.S. adults interviewed March 15-17, 2008. The error due to sampling for results based on the entire sample could be plus or minus three percentage points.

The joys and pains of retiring

Retirement a time to recall from where God has led us, and blessings along way

The hors d'oeuvres, wine and flow of compliments seemed to be endless. One would have thought the person retiring was the messiah who saved the organization he served.

"You will always have your desk; you are always welcomed!" the retiree was promised.

Within months, the desk was occupied by another, and the impression was given that it would be better not to come into the office to allow the new director to find his own way. Being in the loop, telephone calls and travel all ceased!

A somebody had now become a nobody.

This story is lived by millions who retire each year only to face a three-tiered bitter pill: the unwelcome realization that aging can suddenly cut down a regular way of living; achievements stay in the past; daily camaraderie with co-workers becomes a thing of the past too. How do those retiring face this bitter pill?

As much as we tout the golden age of retirement, it is a reminder of twilight years and the death of much we have come to love.

This is shocking and must be faced squarely; otherwise, it can lead to depression.

The shock is realizing that life goes by quickly, that nothing lasts forever. If peace of mind is to exist, honestly accepting these realities must happen.

After the shock subsides, anger and resentment often set in, making a retiree feel that all the sweat and effort exerted were unappreciated. As one person bitterly told me, "I feel like an old rag that has been used up and is then tossed."

Once a retiree goes through this kind of purgatory, he or she needs to bolster the hope that retirement can in fact be enjoyable.

In Washington we have the saying, "There is life beyond the Beltway!" Retirement is a time for finding that other life and realizing that it is often better than the one we left.

I can personally vouch that many people who are officially retired don't actually retire! They move into other jobs, and in many cases they have a much saner rhythm of life.

In retirement, the wisdom of the Bible on aging is ever so important to remember.

Job tells us: "With old age is wisdom, and with length of days understanding" (12:12).

For those with children, the Book of Proverbs reminds us not to forget our blessings: "Grandchildren are the crown of old men, and the glory of children is their parentage" (17:6).

Retirement is a time to recall where God has led us from — and the blessings that occurred on that adventure.

Pope says despite threat of war it's possible to create peace

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Despite desperate times and the threat of war, it is possible to create real peace and have hope for the future, Pope Benedict XVI said at his weekly general audience.

During a "disastrous time, indeed, desperate," St. Gregory the Great "was a man who was immersed in God" and "knew how to create peace and give hope" to his people, Pope Benedict said.

The pope dedicated his May 28 audience talk in St. Peter's Square to this sixth-century pope and doctor of the church. Pope Benedict said the saint's hard work, administrative abilities and fatherly concern for people's welfare meant that he often successfully faced the "grave problems" society and the church were facing, notably the constant threat of a Lombard invasion.

The saint was "immersed in God," he said, and one could see that his yearning to be with God was "always alive deep in his soul." He "is a guide for us in our times today," because his love for God "shows us where the true sources of peace" spring and where true hope lies.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

In today's catechesis we turn to Pope St. Gregory the Great, who governed the church of Rome at the end of the sixth century and is venerated as a doctor of the church. Born of a noble Roman family, Gregory entered the civil service, in which he rose to the dignity of prefect of the city, and then embraced the monastic life.

Gregory's learning and experience, and his outstanding personal gifts, led to his appointment as the papal representative to the imperial court in Constantinople, and then as the pope's secretary. In the year 590, Gregory was elected pope.

His papal ministry was marked by tireless energy and a clear vision of the grave problems facing civil society and the church. Gregory made every effort to contain the Lombard invasion, to provide for the evangelization of that people and to establish peace throughout Italy.

In addition to his preaching, teaching and pastoral activity, he also reorganized the management of the church's goods and ensured a more effective administration of her charitable works.

At a time of great social instability, and despite his frequent ill health, Gregory proved an effective, prudent and saintly pastor, whose life and teaching continue to inspire us today.

The conservation of energy: More than a question of economics

Stewardship of the environment becoming major theme for Pope Benedict

Gas is getting perilously close to $4 a gallon where I live, as it is in much of the United States. And while some countries would call that a bargain, it's hitting the American pocketbook hard.

So with three cars in my family and two kids with summer jobs, the challenge is not just scheduling the cars but making sure everybody takes a turn filling the tank.

Going out for the evening? Ante up. Heating fuel and other energy costs are rising steadily, too, so with all this energy inflation it came as a crushing blow — pardon the pun — when an avalanche tore through Alaska's capital city of Juneau and destroyed major transmission towers, which carry more than 80 percent of the city's power from a nearby hydroelectric dam.

Boom! Just like that, in a powerful natural disaster, folks in the picturesque city along the coast in Southeast Alaska faced an energy crisis of major proportions.

Until repairs are completed this summer, the city is using mainly diesel fuel, a very expensive alternative.

The new electricity rate is about five times the 11 cents per kilowatt-hour it was before the snow came sliding down the mountain.

So what's the result? Well, of course, there's some complaining, and some pleas for state assistance, which has been sparse so far.

But the big result, as reported in a recent New York Times article, is that Juneau has suddenly become very conservationist. Says the Times: "Juneau has cut its electricity use by more than 30 percent in a matter of weeks, instantly establishing itself as a role model for how to go green, and fast."

Now, I wouldn't wish a rampaging avalanche on anyone, much less any other natural or manmade disaster. But wouldn't it be great if we could all marshal that kind of resolve to cut energy use for the sake of the planet and to cut our dependency on foreign sources of energy?

Remember the clothesline? I'm not sure my mother even owned a dryer when I was growing up on the farm. White sheets waving in the hot Nebraska wind were a familiar sight in those days.

But many years later, after Mom moved to a town, she ignored her dryer most of the time and carried the laundry out to the line.

"Don't these sheets smell good?"

she'd remark about a freshly made bed.

Do you ever see clotheslines now, except in the oldest part of cities? Some neighborhood covenants purportedly ban them. What a shame.

The conservation of energy is not just a question of economics, although squeezing the wallet can propel us to conserve. More importantly, it's a question of stewardship, and Pope Benedict XVI has been making that point, even mentioning our responsibility to the earth when he spoke at the United Nations in April.

Stewardship of the environment is becoming a major theme for this pope.

Here are some of the things Juneau is doing to conserve energy, as reported in the Times: stores displaying televisions have them all turned off but one; the public library shut down one of two elevators, lights in public places have been dimmed and thermostats have been turned down during the chilly spring.

Despite the rainy climate, clotheslines are popping up everywhere, and people are dashing to buy compact fluorescent light bulbs.

How many of those things could be done in our own homes and cities?

What a challenge and a gift to the environment it would be to cut our energy use by 30 percent this summer!

CAPE TOWN, South Africa — Hundreds of victims of xenophobic violence in South Africa are being housed in church halls in Durban as the country's faith communities and civil society rally to help those displaced.

"We're housing more than 430 people, mostly from Zimbabwe, but also from Mozambique, Malawi, Burundi and the Democratic Republic of Congo," said Hupenyu Makusha, a coordinator in the Durban archdiocesan pastoral care for refugees project.

Churches in Durban have made their halls available for temporary housing and many people have donated food, blankets and clothes, Makusha told Catholic News Service in a May 27 telephone interview from Durban.

When the immediate crisis is over, the archdiocesan project will help with "voluntary repatriation for those who would rather go home than stay in the hostile atmosphere in South Africa," Makusha said.

More than 50 people have been killed in attacks on foreigners in South Africa. More than 30,000 people have been displaced and hundreds of suspects arrested since the attacks started in mid-May.

South African churches, faith communities and civil society are cooperating in their efforts to help the victims of the violence, said Kabelo Selema, who heads the justice and peace department for the Southern African Catholic Bishops' Conference in Pretoria, in a May 27 telephone interview from Pretoria.

The commission plans for June 22 to be a "day of prayer for those affected by xenophobia as well as for the people in Zimbabwe," where a runoff presidential election is scheduled for June 27, Selema said.

"We need to reflect on what we, as Christians, can do," Selema said.

Up to 3 million Zimbabweans are estimated to have fled to South Africa to escape violence, severe shortages of basic commodities and 80 percent unemployment.

Ten million people are estimated to have come to South Africa seeking a better life since apartheid ended in 1994.

Archbishop George Daniel of Pretoria said that attacks on foreigners signal a lack of generosity to receive immigrants and asylum seekers.

"Xenophobia is a serious offense against God precisely because it violates the innate dignity of the human person," Archbishop Daniel and the priests in his archdiocese said in a May 22 statement.

"At its core, xenophobia is a failure to love our neighbor. Since we cannot claim to love God unless we love our neighbor, we can only be one with God if we reject xenophobia and work aggressively to remove it from our personal lives, our church and our society," they said.

The priests said they would do all they could to "offer all immigrants the pastoral care they need" and urged Catholics to offer them "hospitality, not hostility."

The Catholic Church is "extremely diverse, representing races and ethnic groups from every part of the globe," they said.

Noting that the situation is complex, the priests said South African President Thabo Mbeki's policy of quiet diplomacy in Zimbabwe "has proven fatal" and blamed the South African government for "not doing everything in its power to avert the causes that led to a looming immigrant crisis."

Noting that "the systematic lack of service delivery is a breeding ground for crime and lawlessness," they said, "Let us ensure that all South Africans and immigrants have access to basics: employment, food, shelter and dignity."

Zimbabwe's Jesuits called the xenophobic attacks "alarming news for our cross-border traders whose livelihood depends on going to South Africa to buy goods for resale in Zimbabwe."

Zimbabweans are now "caught between" the violence in their home country that followed March 29 elections and attacks on them in South Africa, they said in their late May newsletter.

HICKORY — A call to ministry doesn't always mean a call to religious life.

The recent graduates of the lay ministry training program for the Diocese of Charlotte know that being a beacon of God's light is something they can do in the secular world on a daily basis.

A ceremony recognizing 41 graduates for their commitment to lay ministry was held at the Catholic Conference Center in Hickory June 1.

The lay ministry training program is a two-year program designed for women and men who wish to grow in confidence as they minister to others in their families, the church and the marketplace.

CHARLOTTE — Father Brandon Jones and Father Tri Vinh Truong formally dedicated their lives to serving the Lord, the church and the people of God.

The men were ordained to the priesthood by Bishop Peter J. Jugis at St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte June 7.

"The whole church of Charlotte praises God and thanks him today for the gift of two new priests for the church," said Bishop Jugis.

During his homily, Bishop Jugis spoke of the graces bestowed upon the two men in the sacrament of holy orders.

"It is God who gives you this gift of holy orders," said Bishop Jugis.

DAUGHTER'S FAITH, MOTHER'S INSPIRATION

Virginia Tech tragedy leads bereaved mother on journey back to faith

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Before April 16, 2007, Marian Hammaren of Westtown, N.Y., thought she knew what she'd been put on the earth to do: to be Caitlin's mother, to guide and protect her.

But 19-year-old Caitlin Hammaren, a sophomore at Virginia Tech and an only child, did not survive the tragedy on campus that day and Marian Hammaren was left wondering: "What's my job now?"

In a May 30 telephone interview with Catholic News Service, Hammaren described the dark times that followed the campus massacre that left her daughter and 32 other students and faculty members at Virginia Tech dead.

But she also spoke about a book that "set me back on the journey to God" and helped give her a new role in life.

"Despair doesn't even describe it," she said of the weeks following her daughter's death. "Heavy-hearted is a word you don't even grasp until you go through something like this."

After confirmation of Caitlin's death, Hammaren said she was "truly numb." She spent the next few days comforting Caitlin's friends and helping them "say a final goodbye" at a memorial service in Virginia.

She discovered in Caitlin's dorm room that "she was very religious, more than I actually knew," Hammaren said.

Among the books at Caitlin's bedside were an old catechism, a Bible, a book of quotes from Mr. Rogers and a book her father had recently bought her about "1,001 things to do before you die."

Raised a Catholic but "not practicing as I should have," Marian Hammaren said she found little comfort in her faith in those first dark weeks after the tragedy.

Because shopping had been a favorite mother-daughter activity, she had been avoiding malls. But one day she found herself in a bookstore and was drawn to the religion section, where Anthony DeStefano's "Ten Prayers God Always Says Yes To" caught her eye.

That book led her to the Bible and other spiritual writings and to "A Travel Guide to Heaven," an earlier book by DeStefano, executive director of Priests for Life.

One day in her garden she began screaming at God about the injustice of Caitlin's death.

"I taught her to trust you. Where were you?" she recalled yelling. "I need to touch her hair, I need to hear her voice."

But Hammaren said "God didn't mind the little beating up I gave him" and graced her with a "very calm, gentle thought: 'If you want to see her, you have to go through me first.'"

Eventually she came to realize that "when Catie was alive, we were just her babysitters here on earth," she said. "I had to get past the fact that there could be a better parent than me, and understand that she was in the best hands possible."

That understanding and the hope that she will see her daughter again in heaven "helped me get out of the despair, out of the blackness," said Hammaren, now an active member of the Church of the Holy Cross in South Centerville, N.Y.

"I'm happy to be home," she said of her return to the faith. "I did not get it before. My daughter got it more."

And Hammaren sees a new purpose in talking about the journey she has taken.

"If I can get one other person back to God," she added, "then I think I'm doing what he wants me to."

Jesuit urges U.N. to improve international protection of workers

GENEVA (CNS) — A Mexican Jesuit has urged the U.N. Human Rights Council to improve international protection for Mexican workers affected by transnational corporations working in Mexico.

"There is no real political will in Mexico to protect workers' rights. That is why we need international action," said Father Sergio Cobo, director of the Center for Reflection and Action on Labor Issues, at the eighth session of the council in Geneva in early June.

Father Cobo called on John Ruggie, U.N. special representative on labor and human rights, to recommend that the United Nations put in place an international ombudsman to investigate cases of abuse by transnational corporations in Mexico and throughout the world.

Father Cobo said that although 60,000 Mexican workers are technically unionized, 90 percent of them do not know they belong to a union. Foreign companies pressure managers and sometimes union leaders to keep workers in the dark about their rights and the work of unions, he said.

The priest also listed other abuses, including demands for sexual favors from workers, of whom a high percentage are women, in exchange for vacation time.

Often, the Jesuit said, workers applying for jobs at such companies are asked if they have relatives who are lawyers, or if women are pregnant. Women workers who do get pregnant often have to work eight- to 10-hour days standing.

Ruggie said he was "deeply moved by the struggles" of Father Cobo and other human rights defenders.

He told them not to give up their struggle and said he intends to ensure his mandate will result in concrete measures that will improve the lives of those affected by corporate misbehavior throughout the world.

FROM THE VATICAN

Vatican working on interreligious dialogue guidelines, official says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican is working on a new set of pastoral guidelines for interreligious dialogue, a leading official said.

The Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue began pulling together elements for the guidelines at its plenary session in Rome, said Cardinal Jean-Louis Tauran, council president.

"After many years of hesitation about the suitability of such a document, the time has arrived to offer pastors and the faithful some general orientations, which obviously will have to be adapted to local situations," Cardinal Tauran said in an opening address to the council's plenary meeting June 4.

The cardinal said the guidelines would be inspired in part by the Ten Commandments, which remain universal principles in a believer's relationship with God and with neighbors.

Cardinal Tauran offered no timeline for the new document, but said the council's meeting should provide ample material for its preparation.

In 1991, the interreligious council published dialogue guidelines under the title "Dialogue and Proclamation." The document called for a balance between dialogue and evangelization and said proclaiming Christ must be done with sensitivity, humility and respect for other cultures.

Pope Benedict XVI named Cardinal Tauran to head the council last year.

In his opening address, the cardinal said the church must help Catholics understand that all believers share a common patrimony of values, including belief in God, the sacredness of life, the need for brotherhood, the experience of prayer and the language of religion.

For their part, he said, Christians need to proclaim openly that Christ is the way, the truth and the life, and be "prepared to share their spiritual convictions and to consider those of others," he said.

Nine pilgrimage sites in Rome readied for Pauline year

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Nine Rome pilgrimage sites linked to the life of St. Paul are being readied for visitors during the jubilee year dedicated to the apostle, church officials announced.

Pope Benedict XVI plans to inaugurate the Pauline year June 28 at an evening prayer service in the Basilica of St. Paul Outside the Walls. He will light a votive lamp that will burn continually during the jubilee, which ends June 29, 2009.

Vatican officials are hoping pilgrims and religious tourists will give special attention to St. Paul, and the nine sites being promoted all have connections to the saint's life in Rome.

In addition to the Basilica of St. Paul Outside the Walls, where St. Paul's tomb lies under the main altar, the sites include St. Peter's Basilica and the Basilica of St. John Lateran.

Another site is the Abbey of the Three Fountains, built on the spot where St. Paul was beheaded on the order of Roman Emperor Nero.

Two small churches are also featured on the pilgrim's route: San Paolo alla Regola (St. Paul's at Regola) and Santa Maria in Via Lata (Our Lady at Via Lata), traditionally considered the first and second houses where St. Paul lived and taught in Rome.

The church of Santa Prisca on the Aventine Hill is included. It was believed to be the residence of St. Prisca, a first-century martyr known by St. Paul.

Also on the route are the basilica and catacombs dedicated to St. Sebastian. The relics of St. Paul were thought to have been preserved in these catacombs before being moved to their permanent burial site.

A final stop is the Mamertine Prison near the Roman Forum, where St. Paul was believed to have been incarcerated.

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI met with members of the Islamic-Catholic Liaison Committee in a private audience June 11 at the Vatican.

Cardinal Jean-Louis Tauran and Archbishop Pier Luigi Celata, president and secretary, respectively, of the Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue, also were at the audience.

The committee was meeting in Rome June 11-13 to discuss the theme "Christians and Muslims: God's Witnesses of Justice, Peace and Compassion in a

Celebrating Corpus Christi

Knights of Columbus flank Father Tim Reid, pastor of St. Ann Church in Charlotte, during a Corpus Christi procession May 25. The event was in celebration of the feast of the Body and Blood of Christ May 22.

Pope Benedict XVI celebrated a Mass and led a Corpus Christi procession through the streets of Rome, which was followed by Eucharistic adoration and Benediction, to mark the feast day May 22. In his homily, the pope said the rites and rituals of the feast day explain what the feast is about: "First, we are gathered around the altar of the Lord to be together in his presence; second, there will be the procession, which is walking with the Lord"; and, finally, all the faithful will kneel before the Eucharist, honoring Jesus Christ who gave his life for the salvation of all.

The Eucharist has the power to unite people, strengthen them and remind them that only God is worthy of worship, said Pope Benedict.

By walking in procession and following Jesus present in the Eucharist, he said, Catholics remind themselves that "the Lord Jesus liberates us from our paralysis, he makes us get up and proceed, he helps us take a step forward, then another."

A potential way to promote life

Bishops encourage support for bill for 'Choose Life' plates

BY DAVID HAINS
COMMUNICATIONS DIRECTOR

CHARLOTTE — Pro-life advocates in North Carolina could soon promote their support for life on their vehicles with special license plates.

An effort is underway in the N.C. General Assembly to make available a plate with the words "Choose Life" and the faces of two children on it.

The bill, HB 932, is being supported jointly by the dioceses of Charlotte and Raleigh.

Earlier this month, priests in the Diocese of Charlotte received via e-mail a letter from Msgr. Michael Clay, legislative liaison for the Diocese of Raleigh. The letter asks for prayers and support for the passage of the bill by the House Finance Committee.

The letter also includes a list of legislators serving on the finance committee who reside in the diocese.

"I ask for your help in creating the momentum needed to move our legislators beyond their fears to enact this legislation," wrote Msgr. Clay.

The letter and the list of legislators can be viewed on the diocesan Web site at www.charlottediocese.org.

Currently North Carolina issues 122 specialty license plates that promote issues from environmental causes to colleges. There is even a plate promoting Harley Davidson motorcycles.

"Choose Life" plates will be distributed by the N.C. Department of Health and Human Services to nonprofit crisis pregnancy centers that do not offer abortion-related services, referrals or counseling.

Maggi Nadol, Respect Life coordinator for the Diocese of Charlotte, said the "Choose Life" license plates would allow for more freedom of expression by pro-life Christians.

"Anything that we can do to promote the sanctity of life as an issue is important both to the unborn and for the advancement of our Christian mission," said Nadol.

The nonprofit organization Choose Life, Inc. reports that 18 states, including South Carolina, currently make the "Choose Life" plate available. Ten other states are actively considering it.

FROM THE COVER

Lay ministry graduates to bring knowledge to world

"The program is not informational; it is formational," said Frank Villaronga, director for evangelization and ministry formation for the Diocese of Charlotte.

"The role of the laity is to respond to their baptismal calls to participate in the ministry of the church," said Villaronga. "That may mean doing it in their particular roles in life."

One of the goals of the lay ministry training program is to help participants discern their calls to ministry in the church, but "it's up to each person to discern what that role will be," said Villaronga.

Participants meet approximately 12 times a year for two years for classes on various topics related to ministry and church teaching.

"I would say that it's for any lay person who is interested in knowing more about his or her faith and putting that faith into practice," said Villaronga.

Program participants come from all walks of life. Some come into the program with doctorate degrees while others have high school diplomas. Some have been actively involved in the church for years while others are just discovering their faith.

"There is a bond that happens," said Villaronga. "Friendships form."

"It is not the primary purpose of the program, but it's a really good byproduct," he added. "They walk together and help each other through the process."

A chance encounter

Don Edgerton heard about the program during a visit to St. William Church in Murphy a little over two years ago.

"I had no idea what it was," he said. "Not the slightest idea. But something hit me."

Edgerton's draw to the program may be a bit more dramatic than most.

For him, the call to lay ministry meant selling his businesses and moving from Florida to North Carolina. He underwent a complete lifestyle change.

"This (program) is something that if you expose yourself to one time, it is contagious," he said.

"If you let the Spirit work within you, it is a life-changing event," he added.

As a lay volunteer, Edgerton hopes to get involved in prison ministry. He said he asks God every day for guidance in knowing how best to use his gifts.

ABOUT THE PROGRAM

The lay ministry training program was formed in 1990. Training sites for the 2008-2010 program are in Bryson City, Charlotte, Greensboro and Lenoir, with a Spanish-language version in Salisbury. Sessions begin in August.

WANT MORE INFO?

For more information on the diocesan lay ministry training program visit www.charlottediocese.org/layministry.

"The lay ministry training program for me is the most fulfilling thing that I've been able to do in my faith life," he said.

His enthusiasm for lay ministry is something he is eager to share with those around him.

"I treat the Catholic lay ministry program sort of like a good book: If you read a good book and you get done, the first thing you do is run to a friend to tell them to read it," he said.

Room for growth

Michelle Calascione is the faith formation coordinator at St. William Church. When she started the lay ministry training program two years ago, it was to better equip her to perform her job.

As a college graduate and a practicing Catholic, she was certainly qualified for her job, but she recognized a need to grow deeper in her understanding of the faith.

"I didn't feel like my knowledge was sound enough to be a faith formation coordinator for other adults," said Calascione.

Knowing very little about the program, she was uncertain of what to expect. "I kind of went into it blind," she said.

But after the first class she was pleasantly surprised.

"I walked away from the first day realizing how much I needed to learn and how much I was going to learn," she said.

She hopes to encourage fellow parishioners to take part in the next training program.

"There are many individuals who feel that they know all they need to know about their faith," she said. "This program shows that there is so much that we don't know."

Lasting friendships

Pat Voelker has always been an active participant at her parish, St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte.

Over the years she has volunteered as a lector and an instructor for the Rite of Christian Initiation for Adults program.

For Voelker, who took the training in the Greensboro Vicariate, the best part of the program was the bonds she formed with her fellow group members.

"It was truly a group experience, it wasn't just individuals gathering and talking about these topics," said Voelker.

"It's about getting to know other people who have this understanding that they need to do more — that they need to serve," she said. "Being around people who have that mindset really encourages you to serve."

Now that she has completed the training, she plans on becoming more involved with the RCIA team at her parish. Having completed the training, "I think I can be more effective," she said.

With her retirement coming up in August, she is hoping to use the extra free time to do more charitable work.

"I want to be a presence in the community," said Voelker.

"Life doesn't just happen in church on Sundays," she said. "Christian life is happening all the time and we're called to bring Christ into the world all the time."

Laborers of the Lord's harvest

Lay ministry training program pre-requisite for permanent diaconate

CHARLOTTE — For those men considering serving in the Diocese of Charlotte as permanent deacons, the diocesan lay ministry training program is the first step.

The two-year program, designed for men and women who wish to grow in confidence as they minister to others, is a pre-requisite for the diaconate formation program.

"This Sunday's gospel calls for 'laborers' to go out and work in the master's harvest," said Deacon George Szalony, permanent diaconate formation director.

Permanent deacons are the "laborers" and more are needed, he said.

Those interested in joining the permanent diaconate must be at least 35 years old, but must not have reached age 65 by 2014.

They must have the consent of their wives, if married; the endorsement of their pastors; and be U.S. citizens or legal, permanent residents of the United States by December 2009.

Program explores the nonviolence of Jesus, others

U.S. secretary of state; Ehud Olmert, Israeli prime minister and leader of the Kadima party; Ban Ki-Moon, U.N. secretary-general; Khalid Mashaal, co-leader of Hamas, Islamic Resistance Movement; and Mahmoud Abbas, Fatah leader and president of the Palestinian Authority.

The role-players were attending "Walking with Jesus, Micah and Gandhi: Living Nonviolently Today," at Living Waters Catholic Reflection Center May 31.

J. Patrick Mahon, a member of Immaculate Heart of Mary Mission in Hayesville, presented the program. He and his wife, Joan, coordinate the Pax Christi chapter at St. William Church in Murphy and Immaculate Heart of Mary.

"It was interesting trying to shift gears," said Augustinian Father Liam Tomás O'Doherty, of the Friary of Lecceto, the Augustinian community in Maggie Valley.

"I felt conciliatory as the secretary-general and as Condoleezza Rice, and I wanted to create resolution," said Tim Mahoney-Lynch, a parishioner at St. Margaret of Scotland Church in Maggie Valley. "When I was playing the other roles, I had some fire in my belly."

"After awhile you do begin to feel how hard it is to give up something that's been a part of them for so long," said Donna Mahoney-Lynch, also of St. Margaret of Scotland Church.

"It brought to my mind how difficult the hopes of people must be," said Kathy Tilley of St. Joseph Church in Bryson City, one of those observing the role-playing.

The exercise illustrated that no one ever has all the truth and that part of seeking the truth in any situation is trying to understand all sides of the issue.

A dozen people attended the program, which took its theme from the prophet Micah: "You have been told, O man, what is good, and what the Lord requires of you: Only to do the right and to love goodness, and to walk humbly with your God" (Micah 6:8).

Micah, Jesus and Mohandas Gandhi all lived under repressive regimes yet advocated peace and nonviolence.

Elements found in gospel nonviolence are justice, gratitude for the gift of creation, humility, listening, love for community, wisdom (not just knowledge), courage, love and hope.

The early church, Mahon said, thrived on Matthew 5:43-48, which describes how Christians are to love rather than hate their enemies and to pray for those who persecute them.

"Unless now the world adopts nonviolence, it will spell the suicide of humanity," said Ghandi, who read the "Sermon on the Mount" (the beatitudes) (Matthew 5) every day. "Nonviolence

"We have to show that nonviolence is authentic Christianity. God is a God of peace and reconciliation."

is the only thing the atom bomb cannot destroy."

"True peace has nothing to do with arms," Mahon said. "It's the peace of Jesus on the cross, drawing all people to him through the power of his nonviolent love."

"As a culture, we've accepted violence, given it approbation," said Father George Kloster, vicar of the Smoky Mountain Vicariate and pastor of St. William Church in Murphy and Immaculate Heart of Mary Mission.

"If you question the use of violence, you're suspect," he continued. "We have to show that nonviolence is authentic Christianity. God is a God of peace and reconciliation."

Peace must begin within each person making it his or her constant attitude and habit of living.

Justice and peace activists themselves, passionately defending their views, can sometimes err on the side of violence. Mahon cautioned that activists cannot be self-righteous and must examine their motivations to discern unconscious motives they might have, including "look how bad they are and how good I am."

Remedies to prevent such attitudes include prayer, studying the issues and nonviolently resisting identified evils such as consumerism, militarism, sexism, capital punishment, classism and racism.

Anger can be appropriate. Mahon quoted St. Thomas Aquinas, who said, "It is the mark of a virtuous man to be angry at injustice."

In the afternoon, attendees had quiet time to work on individual plans for nonviolent living.

In the wrap-up session, Tim Mahoney-Lynch said that he starts and ends each day with peace, which sets the tone for his actions throughout the day.

"I begin the day with an attitude of gratitude," he said. "I look at my relationships: Are there people in my life — living or dead — with whom I'm not at peace?"

During evening prayer, he and his wife recommit themselves to each other.

To become fully informed about issues, Donna Mahoney-Lynch said, "Make sure you question, question, question, and make sure the answers suit you. It's important to have good mentors. I've learned to live simply, gently, gracefully. I've learned how to give back."

VOCATIONS

Jubilarians honored for years of service, ministry

Sister Nancy Marie Nance.

"They accepted God's call to come and serve as women religious," said Mercy Sister Paulette Williams, president of the Sisters of Mercy Regional Community of North Carolina.

"We thank God who has given us these women religious on our faith journeys," she said.

The jubilarians have ministered throughout North Carolina and at the Sisters of Mercy mission in Guam.

"The Sisters of Mercy community has done so much to nurture us and the church," said Father Frank O'Rourke, pastor of St. Gabriel Church, who celebrated the Mass.

"We come here today to celebrate these women and the work they have done," said Father Frank Cancro, pastor of Queen of the Apostles Church in Belmont and homilist for the jubilee Mass.

During his homily, Father Cancro related the ministries of the jubilarians to working in a garden. When tending a garden, he said, there is often a lot of hard work and sweat involved.

"We celebrate the sweat that has allowed them to use their gifts ... to open their hearts and respond 'yes' to some hardships they've had to endure here, in Guam and everywhere they've been called to be," said Father Cancro.

Beauty, he said, is a word that comes to mind when one thinks of a garden, and a beautiful garden is often the result of hard work.

"We celebrate the beauty of these individual women ... beauty that allows us to see in them the beauty and power of the Gospel they proclaim ... in every breath and aspect of their lives," said Father Cancro.

"For all your sweat, hard work and beauty, we say thank you. On behalf of the whole church that has benefited and seen the beautiful face of God in your work, thank you," he said to the jubilarians.

"Thank you for allowing us to walk with you, until finally and forever we are home," he added.

Mercy Sister Marie Pierre Martinez

Born in Guam, Sister Martinez entered the Sisters of Mercy June 20, 1948 and made her perpetual profession Aug. 13, 1956. Her ministries include serving as a teacher and principal and in administrative appointments in the United States and Guam. Ministries in Guam included serving in chaplaincy ministry at Guam Memorial Hospital; serving as chair to the Continuing Formation Committee and as a member of the Formation/Education Board and Mercy Personnel Board. She also was a coordinator at Agana Mercy Convent.

Mercy Sister Mary Alma Pangelinan

Born in Guam and growing up amid the Japanese invasion during World War II, Sister Pangelinan was forced to live in caves to avoid capture and forced labor. That experience fueled her desire to enter the Sisters of Mercy on Dec. 6, 1947, in Guam. By 1950, she was missioned with four other Sisters on the southern part of Guam, where they taught Confraternity of Christian Doctrine (CCD) classes in various villages. Her ministries include teaching in Guam and the United States, and working in the food services department and finance office at her regional community in Belmont.

Mercy Sister Mary David Richard

Born in Buffalo, N.Y., Sister Richard always knew she wanted to be a woman religious. Not long after entering the Sisters of Mercy on Sept. 15, 1947, she was ministering and teaching in Guam. Her stateside ministry includes service at Nazareth Orphanage in Raleigh, Our Lady of the Assumption School in Charlotte and various ministries in Belmont.

Mercy Sister Therese Galligan

Born in Akron, Ohio, Sister Galligan entered the Sisters of Mercy in 1957 and taught for several years in the parochial school system of the Diocese of Raleigh. With education and training in nursing, she has been an active participant in numerous charitable organizations related to health care, bereavement, nursing and hospice.

In 1979, she helped establish a hospice program in western North Carolina. She later served as vice president of the board of directors, nurse coordinator and executive director of Mountain Area Hospice, Inc. in Asheville, the fifth hospice program for North Carolina.

Mercy Sister Clara Virginia Kelly

Born in Spencer, N.C., Sister Kelly entered the Sisters of Mercy Jan. 26, 1958. After final profession of vows in 1963, her ministries included various nursing and administrative roles in health care in Asheville, Charlotte and Florida.

While at St. Joseph's Hospital in Asheville, she served on its board of directors for 13 years, and served as health care coordinator for her religious community. She presently ministers at Consulate Health Care in Melbourne, Fla.

Mercy Sister Larretta Elizabeth Rivera-Williams

Born in Winston-Salem, N.C., Sister Rivera-Williams attended St. Benedict the Moor School and Bishop McGuinness High School. She entered the Sisters of Mercy Sept. 8, 1982. With degrees in social work and religious education, and certifications in pastoral education and critical stress management, she has served as director of religious education and pastoral associate at St. Benedict the Moor Church. She currently serves as assistant chaplain at Wake Forest University in Winston-Salem.

Mercy Sister Nancy Marie Nance

Born in Alton, Ill., Sister Nance entered the Sisters of Mercy Sept. 8, 1982. Since 1985, she has had one major ministerial assignment — working with children and adults with mental retardation at Holy Angels in Belmont. She helped establish Cherubs Café and Candy Bouquets in Belmont, which provides vocational training and meaningful supported employment for individuals with mental retardation. She currently serves as outreach services director.

COURTESY PHOTO BY BISHOP PETER J. JUGIS

Pope John Paul II embraces Bishop Peter J. Jugis at his priestly ordination in St. Peter's Basilica at the Vatican June 12, 1983.

Bishop Jugis, priests recognized for years of service

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — Bishop Peter J. Jugis was recently honored for the 25th anniversary of his priestly ordination.

Bishop Jugis, who celebrated his anniversary June 12, and 11 other priests celebrating jubilee anniversaries were recognized during a Mass at the bi-annual priests' convocation in Asheville June 10.

Also recognized was Father James Hawker, vicar of education and pastor of St. Luke Church in Mint Hill, who is retiring in July.

A native of Charlotte, Bishop Jugis graduated from South Mecklenburg High School in 1975 and, while studying accounting at the University of North Carolina at Charlotte, he began to contemplate life as a priest.

"I just began to realize my heart wasn't in the accounting field," said Bishop Jugis in a 2003 interview with The Catholic News & Herald. "I could do it intellectually, but I just didn't feel that this was what I wanted to give my life to totally."

After a year of discernment and after talking with several priests and then-Bishop Michael J. Begley, and with encouragement from his parents, Bishop Jugis applied to be a seminarian of the diocese in 1979.

He studied at the North American College, the U.S. seminary in Rome, and was ordained by Pope John Paul II in St. Peter's Basilica June 12, 1983.

Then-Father Jugis served at numerous parishes across the 46-county Diocese of Charlotte, including St. Leo the Great Church in Winston-Salem, Holy Infant Church in Reidsville, St. John Neumann Church in Charlotte, Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury, Queen of the Apostles Church in Belmont and Our Lady of Lourdes Church in Monroe.

In November 1985 he was appointed to be a diocesan tribunal judge, and in August 1987 began studies for his doctorate in canon law at the Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C.

In 1992, Bishop Jugis became the first priest of the diocese to receive a doctorate in canon law. Six years later, he began working full-time for the diocesan tribunal while regularly serving as administrator or pastor in churches around the diocese.

It was in July 2003 that Archbishop Gabriel Mantalvo, then-papal nuncio to the United States, called to tell him he was appointed to be the next bishop of Charlotte. It was a humbling moment — one that brought him to his knees, recalled Bishop Jugis.

When he was ordained and installed as the fourth bishop of Charlotte at St. Matthew Church in Charlotte Oct. 24, 2003 at the age of 46, he was one of the youngest bishops in the United States.

Being a bishop is a tremendous responsibility, said Bishop Jugis.

"I try not to think of the enormity of the task, but just want to serve the best that I can, and let the Holy Spirit guide and show me what has to be done," he said.

"It is a special grace and a blessing to be chosen as a bishop where I've already served, where I've really spent all of my life," said Bishop Jugis. "I was one of the priests helping to build up the diocese. Now I'm building up the diocese in a different way as bishop."

“The Lord will work through your ministry to produce the fruits of salvation ...”

Bishop Jugis ordains two new priests

by this powerful grace, making you a sacrament of Christ the high priest, capable of acting in the person of Christ,” he told them.

Bishop Jugis also spoke of the priests’ sacramental identification with Christ and how it is threefold. As priests they will take on the roles of teacher, nourishing people on the Gospel; sanctifier, administering the sacraments to the people; and shepherd, leading their flock to the pastures of eternal life.

“By your teaching, sanctifying and shepherding in the name of Christ, the Lord will work through your ministry to produce the fruit of salvation in the people you serve — the fruit which remains unto eternal life,” he said.

Father Brandon Jones

Father Jones grew up in Elkin, where he was raised in the Baptist church. He was first introduced to the Catholic faith at age 11, when his cousin — Father Jay Scott Newman, current pastor of St. Mary Church in Greenville, S.C. in the Diocese of Charleston — converted to the Catholic faith.

Father Conrad Kimbrough, then-pastor of St. Benedict Church in Greensboro was the first priest Father Jones ever met.

“I remember I was 13-years-old at the time and he asked me, ‘Do you believe in the Bible?’ When I said yes, he said ‘Well my church wrote it.’”

“That was a formative event in my conversion to the faith,” said Father Jones.

At age 17, Father Jones was received into the Catholic Church at St. Stephen Church in Elkin. A few years later, while studying Latin at the University of North Carolina at Greensboro, he first considered the priesthood.

He began his studies for the priesthood in 1993 when he entered the Theological College at Catholic University in Washington, D.C. Two years later, then-Bishop William G. Curlin assigned him to the Pontifical North American College in Rome.

In the following years, Father Jones considered a vocation with the Dominican order of priests; worked as a Latinist, editing and annotating documents; and earned licentiate degrees in philosophy and theology.

In 2006, he decided to return to the diocesan priesthood track and completed his studies at St. Charles Borromeo Seminary in Pennsylvania.

During the past five months, Father Jones has served as a transitional deacon at St. Vincent de Paul Church.

“A priest has to be primarily a man of prayer,” said Father Jones. “He has to have a lively interior life and to be in close communion with our Lord in order to bring him to others.”

Father Jones has been assigned to serve as parochial vicar at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte.

Father Tri Vinh Truong

Father Truong was born in Vinh Long Province, Vietnam. In 1994, his family was granted refugee status, allowing them to immigrate to the United States.

After living for a year in Atlanta, the family moved to Charlotte, where they currently reside.

Father Truong graduated from St. Xavier University in Chicago and worked for a health care company for several years. But, a vocation to the priesthood continued to call to him.

“I’ve wanted to be a priest for a long time,” he said.

He attended Mount St. Mary’s College and Seminary in Emmitsburg, Md., where he studied canon law, theology, systematic theology, homiletics (preaching) and Scripture.

During his last year at seminary, he served as a transitional deacon at Immaculate Conception Church in the Diocese of Harrisburg, Pa.

As a priest, he said he is looking forward to “carrying out the saving work of God in Christ Jesus.”

“I’m looking to serve the people in any way that I can,” he said. “My main goal is to carry out Christ’s salvation to the world.”

Father Troung has been assigned to serve as parochial vicar at Holy Family Church in Clemmons.

Ordination Mass

Concelebrants of the ordination Mass at St. Vincent de Paul included Abbot Placid Solari of Belmont Abbey; Msgr. Mauricio W. West, vicar general and chancellor of the Diocese of Charlotte; Father Christopher Gober, director of diocesan vocations; priests serving in the Diocese of Charlotte; and visiting priests. Also in attendance was Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin.

During the rite of ordination, Fathers Jones and Truong made their promises to fulfill the office of the priesthood. Kneeling, they placed their hands between Bishop Jugis’ hands in a promise of obedience to him and to his successors.

The congregation was invited to join in prayer for the church, its people and the priestly candidates as they lay prostrate before the altar.

During the rite’s most solemn moment, Fathers Jones and Truong knelt before Bishop Jugis, who laid his hands on their heads. The celebration of the sacrament of holy orders was completed as the bishop extended his hands over the kneeling candidates and prayed the prayer of consecration.

The new priests were vested with astoles and chasubles — outer garments of the priestly office. Bishop Jugis anointed their hands with sacred chrism and each was then presented with a chalice and a paten signifying his role as a celebrant of the Eucharist.

The newly ordained priests then joined their brother priests to concelebrate the Mass, thus opening a new chapter in each of their lives.

“The church has gained two fine men who have sacrificed much to follow Christ,” said Father Gober.

“Their witness gives hope both to the faithful and to the many seminarians who will accompany them shortly,” he said.

Books, DVD aim to ready preschoolers for learning Catholic faith

BY NANCY FRAZIER O'BRIEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — After nearly 30 years of teaching religious education to children ages 3 to 14, Peggy Olds of Willowbrook, Ill., was convinced of one thing.

Although parents spend a lot of time teaching their preschoolers their ABCs, numbers and other information needed to prepare them for first grade, she said, they don't do the same to ready their children for learning the basics of their Catholic faith.

Olds hopes to fill that gap with her "Questions for God" series, which aims to tell salvation history in a way that children can learn and retain it as easily as their ABCs.

Through 10 books of 16 pages each and a 50-minute DVD, the series takes on children's questions from "God, Who Are You?" through "God, How Did Jesus Save Us?" to "God, When Will We Be With You?"

Although written primarily for 3- to 6-year-olds, the books can be used with children up to sixth grade, as well as with others who learn best from simple concepts, such as the developmentally disabled, children or adults with English as a second language and the elderly, Olds said.

Audrey Merschman, a longtime friend of Olds, prepared the watercolor illustrations for each book.

In a recent interview with Ave Maria Radio, Olds said the series also can help adults learn along with their children.

"So many parents did not receive good catechesis over the past 40 years," she said. "The DVD provides a simple family activity for learning together."

The series has received an imprimatur and "nihil obstat" — which grant official permission — from the Archdiocese of Chicago and a "declaration of conformity" from the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

Each book also includes one or more of the main church prayers — the Our Father, Sign of the Cross, Act of Contrition, Hail Mary and others — that the children are encouraged to learn by repeated recitation.

In a study guide for the series, Olds said the prayer to St. Michael the Archangel is especially apt in a society prone to seeking out superheroes.

"The superheroes in movies and on TV are not real — St. Michael is," she wrote. "He is a powerful ally for the young child who faces so many fears. ... Comic-book heroes can't measure up."

"Encourage learning this prayer early and encourage the child to call St. Michael whenever he/she feels shaky," she added.

Catholics must be light in dark to protect humanity

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

W.D. doesn't blame his two lung transplants on the quarter century he spent working in the Virginia coal mines, "but it sure didn't help," he said.

No, he explained, his lungs failed because of a genetic condition that was present in only two of his parents' nine children.

W.D. has lived his entire life in Appalachia, a beautiful mountainous region of the eastern United States known for its paradoxical culture of riches and poverty.

Like most natives of Appalachia, W.D. loves the land where he lives — he loves his mountains and he loves his neighbors.

With them, he's struggled over the years against various forms of injustice that have been perpetrated on the region mostly from outside sources.

Of all the forces that have exploited his community — unfair labor practices, environmental destruction, lack of health care, domestic violence, poor schools and general impoverishment — the one that hit him hardest was the most recent outrage: rampant drug abuse.

This specter arrived less than 10 years ago, entering the region in the form of an evil specifically targeting a weak human community.

This weekend's Gospel gives voice to what W.D. and the people of Appalachia have been doing for decades: fighting for God's goodness against forces of darkness that will destroy the body and more.

The pain drug oxycodone was aggressively marketed in Appalachia because of the poverty and high incidence of disability and injury among the populace.

Abuse of the highly-addictive drug spread like wildfire. The result: broken families, broken lives, death.

W.D. told me about his work as a community volunteer. After his last transplant, he explained, "As soon as I got some of my health back, I started working every day with the anti-drug program we started in our schools."

Pressed for details, he said his daughter had become addicted to drugs.

"It's torn our community up," he said. "Those drugs coming in here have really hurt our young people."

W.D. has stood in the courtroom with a crowd of others in testimony against the drug manufacturer. They continue to stand publicly against such victimization.

Theirs is the Gospel message: Don't fear those who can kill the body, but protect the true gift of humanity that God created — the life within you that won't die.

Questions:

What have you experienced that poses a threat to the living God among humanity today? How can you stand up to that threat?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"What I say to you in the darkness, speak in the light" (Matthew 10:27).

Playing a pope, promoting peace

In Jerusalem, Jon Voight says Catholic roots fight Hollywood nonsense

BY JUDITH SUDILOVSKY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

JERUSALEM — Academy Award-winning actor Jon Voight said the strong Catholic roots instilled in him by his mother have helped him overlook much of the "nonsense" of Hollywood.

"It is a relief in Hollywood to have some spirituality," Voight told Catholic News Service in mid-May in the lounge of a hotel on the edge of Jerusalem's Old City.

"You are protected from all the nonsense. You keep your spirituality by doing good deeds," he said.

After a period of spiritual-seeking in the mid-1980s, Voight said, he rediscovered the lessons learned as a young child from his mother and became involved in using his celebrity status to help others, including American Indians, drug addicts, the homeless, Vietnam veterans and farmers.

He also has been a spokesman for almost 20 years for Chabad's Children of Chernobyl, a medical relief program for Russian Jewish children still affected by the fallout from the 1986 explosion of the nuclear reactor in Chernobyl, Ukraine.

Voight was in Israel to show his support for the Chernobyl children's program.

The actor, who is known for his role in "Midnight Cowboy" and his Oscar-winning role in "Coming Home," also has portrayed the older Pope John Paul II in a televised miniseries.

He is also the estranged father of actress Angelina Jolie.

In addition to meeting children from Chernobyl who were brought to Israel with the help of the medical relief program, the 69-year-old actor spent a day in the southern Israeli city of Sderot and met with Israeli terrorism victims and their families.

Sderot has been facing daily missile launches from the Gaza Strip.

"It made me so upset" to see the children in Sderot, he said.

"The press does not give it any attention," he said. "The most important thing is: I am here to try to figure out a way to bring recognition to these people who are surrounded by (other) people who want to bring (about) their destruction."

In May, Palestinian militants lobbed hundreds of missiles into southern Israeli communities, and at least two Israelis were killed. Israel retaliated, and a Palestinian mother was killed.

"People in the United States can't even get our minds around it, it is so horrific and despicable: putting your own family's life on the line and using it for gain for your cause," Voight said.

He said he seeks out knowledge about other religions because "holy people are holy people," regardless of their religion.

"I try to surround myself with holy people wherever they come from," he said.

Voight has said Pope John Paul, author and Holocaust survivor Elie Wiesel and the Dalai Lama were the few moral voices that could be counted on.

The actor said he loved playing

Pope John Paul.

"It was great to be able to play someone I loved so much," Voight said. "I was very happy to do it. He was a great man."

Voight spontaneously began imitating the pontiff, quoting from a papal speech at the 2002 peace meeting in Italy, that was left out of the television movie.

"I am ready to acknowledge that Catholics have not always been faithful to this affirmation of faith," Voight said, imitating Pope John Paul's accent and cadence, holding up his hand for emphasis.

The pope, said Voight, fulfilled his personal definition of what it takes to be a great person: someone who brings other people together, no matter what the religion or title, and seeks justice and is a spiritual being.

He said his mother in Yonkers, N.Y., was a true example of that.

"She was a very Catholic woman and she went to Mass more than one time a week, but she never talked about it. We never knew when she went. It was very private," he said.

"I felt guilty thinking she was only taking care of us when she could be running a hospital. She could have been (legendary Israeli Prime Minister) Golda Meir," he said.

Catholic student association launches pilgrim news Web site for WYD

PERTH, Australia (CNS) — The Australian Catholic Students Association has kicked off a Web site linking international pilgrims with Australian Catholics as they prepare for World Youth Day in July.

Sydney Cardinal George Pell launched the Web site, www.ybenedict.org, in late May at a Spanish-themed party in Sydney, where World Youth Day will be held July 15-20.

The Web site offers daily pilgrim news in English and Spanish for the final days leading up to World Youth Day events. It will be translated into Spanish by Mexican youths who are in Sydney volunteering for the events.

The Web site is a project of Towards 2008, the Australian student and young adult campaign for World Youth Day 2008.

Anthony McCarthy, national coordinator of Towards 2008, said the Web site will allow pilgrims "from Sydney to Santiago, from South Australia to Spain" to follow all the developments leading up to the events.

During the launch party, Cardinal Pell also starred in a short video commercial to promote Carnivale Christi 2008, an event at the University of Sydney, as part of the World Youth Day Youth Festival.

The party followed the "Activ8" promotions May 24, when young people promoted World Youth Day in 50 locations across Sydney.

Bishop McGuinness graduates celebrate commencement

KERNERSVILLE — Ninety-eight graduates of Bishop McGuinness High School in Kernersville recently received their diplomas.

The commencement ceremony was held at the Stevens Center in Winston-Salem May 31. A baccalaureate Mass was celebrated at Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in High Point May 29.

Earlier that day, the graduating seniors were honored and received awards for their academic accomplishments and recognition of college scholarships.

During commencement, diplomas were conferred by Msgr. Mauricio W. West, vicar general and chancellor for the Diocese of Charlotte; Linda Cherry, superintendent of diocesan Catholic schools; George Repass, principal of Bishop McGuinness; and Bob Belcher, school admissions director.

In the fall, the graduates will be attending 45 colleges and universities. Two are foreign exchange students who will return to their home countries of France and Germany.

Bishop McGuinness' graduating class received $4.5 million in combined scholarships.

Graduates and their guests heard remarks by special guest speaker, Tim Rice, CEO of Moses Cone Health System in Greensboro and father of graduate Brian Rice.

Principals of the Diocese of Charlotte nominated Puceta for the annual award, presented by the National Catholic Educational Association. Puceta was chosen because, among other criteria, he best exemplifies a clear philosophy of Catholic education and provides effective faith leadership.

"I am deeply honored that I have been nominated (for this award)," said Puceta. "All of our principals are equally devoted to our schools and most especially our students, and they all deserve recognitions and support."

Using words to affect attitude while stating mission

'Word warriors' must keep socio-ethical questions in moral context

While walking to dinner through a Toronto neighborhood, our group came upon a modern fortress-like building very out of place amidst the older architecture of the 19th-century factory buildings converted to condos and boutiques.

A large sign over the front proclaimed: "Toronto Police Service."

"That's a nice way of saying it," one of our party said, and, perhaps because we had been working with words all day, all agreed that "service" did indeed set a tone and attitude that took some of harshness away from the building and from activities within.

Service. It is a nice way to state a mission.

Several hundred editors and writers meeting in Toronto late last month for the Catholic Media Convention were examining and discussing the tools of their trade. Since words are our stock in trade, it was not so much looking at new products as much as looking at more effective ways to use those tools.

What's new in our trade is that we have the tools to help Catholics carry out their responsibility as citizens.

From several presentations came a common theme that Catholics are obligated to be participants in the public square and therefore must be equipped to effectively present their positions and get along with others where possible.

Catholics as voters must be assisted in discerning — not told — what to do.

One speaker urged us to be "word warriors." Despite the militaristic metaphor, it was good advice to use our tools to frame the debate in the public square to keep the socio-ethical questions in a moral context.

"Give them the words to speak their truth," said Margaret Somerville, an ethicist from Montreal's McGill University.

To be effective requires finding what we have in common with opponents in order to experience belonging to the same moral community, Somerville said.

She also said language has contributed to the "banalization" and "functionalization" of evil. Such language is used to shut down moral intuition.

As an example, Somerville said, the terminology "merciful acts of clinical care" makes more remote what physician-assisted suicide is really all about.

People want to be told what to do but that is not only not possible, it's the lazy way.

Catholics must do the hard work of hearing, analyzing and acting upon the policies of political candidates, for example.

The job of the institutional church is "equipping people to make choices, not to make the choices for them," said Joan

Consider This

STEPHEN KENT
CNS COLUMNIST

Rosenhauer of the U.S. bishops' peace and justice office.

Somerville is concerned that religious people too often use language that alienates. Much better, she said, is to find good secular arguments for our positions since even people of no religion can find the sacred in the secular.

"Find what we have in common to experience belonging to the same moral community," she said.

Peter Lauwers, a Canadian constitutional lawyer, said the church must commit to supporting "accommodative pluralism" that encourages dialogue among different viewpoints and tolerates real diversity.

In fact, he seemed a bit envious of the robust policy debate of the United States, which he finds Canada lacks.

"Policy here is not so much debated as it is alternately announced and denounced," he said.

The Christian responsibility is to actively participate in the political process so individuals must be equipped to be effective.

We learned from the experts and ethicists about the power of words, the importance of clarity and tone, and to look for what unites rather than divides.

We also learned from the simple inscription on a building how to set the tone and thus affect an attitude while stating mission.

WRITE A LETTER TO THE EDITOR

The Catholic News & Herald welcomes letters from readers. We ask that letters be originals of 250 words or fewer, pertain to recent newspaper content or Catholic issues, and be in good taste.

To be considered for publication, each letter must include the name, address and daytime phone number of the writer for purpose of verification. Letters may be condensed due to space limitations and edited for clarity, style and factual accuracy.

The Catholic News & Herald does not publish poetry, form letter or petitions. Items submitted to The Catholic News & Herald become the property of the newspaper and are subject to reuse, in whole or in part, in print, electronic formats and archives.

Tribute to Father Hunt's ministry

As parishioners of St. Benedict the Moor Church in Winston-Salem, we read the tribute paid to Jesuit Father Lawrence Hunt ("Priest remembered for mission work, leading others to Jesus," May 30).

Brief mention was made of Father Hunt's 1990-2004 pastorate at our church and Good Shepherd Mission in King. He was revered for his compassion, sense of humor, diplomacy and his ability to interact with people of all socioeconomic backgrounds, and was highly respected by all the clergy in Winston-Salem and Forsyth County.

An avid gardener, Father Hunt shared the fruits of his gardening skills with the needy. His ministry was a caring one, of which his many hospital visits gave evidence. Never averse to manual labor, Father Hunt often cut the grass at St. Benedict the Moor Church.

Father Hunt truly was a living saint throughout his life, a model of faith in action. Father Hunt brought hope, understanding and love to all with whom he came in contact. He was a peacemaker and through him, you could see Christ.

Peace the proper response

This year's edition of the U.S. bishops' "Faithful Citizenship" document lists war and peace as serious moral issues, including the end of nuclear proliferation, the arms trade, torture and the use of unjust war ("Challenged to be faithful citizens," May 23).

For some Catholics, "the love of enemies is the strongest assertion of Jesus." These Catholics, such as Dorothy Day, believe in a radical discipleship that requires a pacifist stance. To Day, for example, it was simple: Jesus made love a commandment, and in doing so calls his disciples to be peacemakers regardless of any other factors.

Most people see it impossible to confront the challenges of current foreign policy issues with such an attitude. But are not Jesus' teachings infamous for being a challenge?

Yes, but we as Christians have hope that with the grace of God we can make it through anything — even facing a harsh world with love and peace.

Christ-like conversion

I loved the commentary by Father Eugene Hemrick on evangelization ("Before we go running to convert others," May 16), and how our first greatest witness is through personal holiness, and that we must be converted before we can convert others.

This is very true to a point. Our own conversion and growth in holiness is surely, for most of us, a process to which we apply ourselves over time.

Second to pursuing our own deeper love and devotion to Jesus comes living that out as a real joy about our life, with all its stresses, difficulties and hassles. If God is for us who can be against us?

Through an interior conversion there will be fruit in our individual daily encounters with others and as we seek to serve Christ in the world through the church. Undergoing personal conversion is not an isolated enterprise. The more we exercise our faith in the areas that matter most to Christ, the more likely our conversion is to stick and that personal holiness is to reach into the hearts of the lost all around us.

Letters to the Editor

A way to defend life

In response to Mary Rose Pearl's letter to the editor ("Powerful defense of life," April 18), I extend an invitation to every member of our diocese to take a definitive stance against the intrinsic evil that is abortion. Let us increase our prayers to end this shame, let us stand in front of abortion clinics and pray.

When I joined a group to stand outside a clinic and pray the rosary on Saturday mornings, I did not feel comfortable at first. But then I began to see what a powerful tool such prayer is to fight abortion. Occasionally, I see women who decide to keep their babies. This is a great reward.

As Catholics, we have a great obligation to fight this moral evil that cuts deep into the very fabric of our society. And what better way to do so than to seek the help of our Blessed Mother right where the evil strikes.

1983 document inadequate for modern warfare

Tony Magliano's column on the U.S. bishops' 1983 pastoral letter, "The Challenge of Peace," was woefully inadequate with modern times ("A silver anniversary worth remembering," May 30). The U.S. bishops have been worried about mutually-assured destruction for more than 25 years. It has been proven that ballistic missile defense can hit and destroy a "bullet with a bullet." This concept was recently proven with destruction of a rogue satellite.

A positive aspect with BMDs is there is no "life" in danger. Any incoming ballistic missile can be targeted and destroyed without loss of life on either side. So there is no need for nuclear deterrence, mutually assured destruction, reciprocity or an arms race. Disagreements can be settled by negotiations, resolutions and embargos.

— Kevin Roeten
Asheville

Tony Magliano has the audacity to judge "most U.S. Catholics" as not having the ability to think for themselves ("A silver anniversary worth remembering," May 30).

Pope John Paul II was right in saying the horrors of modern warfare were unacceptable, but I think he was talking to all the world, not just the United States. Augustine's and Aquinas' interpretation of natural law gives us the right to defend ourselves, and a nuclear deterrence is the only way in this day and age.

Declaration of Independence: America's safeguard against relativism

Republic acknowledges a Creator, rights from Creator as self-evident truth

Pope Benedict XVI recently cautioned Americans against the "dictatorship of relativism." By that he meant to warn us against the modern proposition that contends that conscience is private and personal with only subjective moral conclusions.

This modern proposition is not the view of Catholic theology.

Every moral act consists of three elements: the act itself; why we do it; and the circumstances in which the act is performed — where, when, how, with whom, and its consequences.

It is Catholic teaching that some acts are always wrong apart from the intention of the actor or the circumstances in which the act takes place. Abortion is such an act.

Those who are not Catholic or are unbelievers may say "not so fast."

Many moderns also contend — unlike those Founding Fathers who got together in 1776 — that the natural law is not self-evidently knowable.

The argument for relativism that worries the pope can be insidious. For example, sometimes relativism is asserted to be an aspect of freedom.

Thus, when asked in the abstract whether matters of conscience should be free from coercion (e.g., not subject to legal penalty), many would agree, and some would go so far as to say our individual moral conclusions must be free from public criticism.

After all, we would have found it disrespectful in the extreme for the national media during Pope Benedict's visit to second-guess the wisdom of his exposition of Catholic thought.

Of course, as soon as religious belief is no longer a proper subject for public discussion, it will be insisted that religion lacks a legitimate basis to claim any authority over laws that will govern the actions of the public — that is, individuals beyond its own believers.

But now consider what that means for the Supreme Court's permissive stance toward abortion or the recent California decision on same-sex marriage.

Here the law is running against the church, but if religion is not a proper subject for debate, does the church really have any basis to complain?

Yes, and here's the real reason to light up the sky in celebration on the 4th of July: By the famous declaration of that day, the American republic acknowledged a Creator and rights flowing from that Creator as self-evident truth.

This acknowledgment is a commitment to natural law, and while the meaning of natural law may be disputed, it at least has to be admitted into the public debate.

In short, if we are true to the

Faith & Precedent

Declaration of Independence, we will be less likely to come under the sway of any relativistic dictatorship.

Because of religious differences, we cannot insist that Catholic doctrine be directly enacted into law, but the declaration's reference to natural rights from a Creator does illustrate why it is wrong for the Supreme Court to come down on the side of abortion.

Even if the law is incapable of grasping the moral wisdom of the truth of the human person embodied in Catholic teaching, it should be silent — totally silent — on a question such as abortion. Only if there was an overwhelming consensus that natural law specified an answer that should guide everyone's actions should the court have spoken.

Avoiding the dictatorship of relativism thus means understanding the limited capability for human law to substitute for a well-formed conscience.

It is for this reason too that it is incumbent upon every Catholic to be simultaneously unwavering in the revealed belief that abortion is an intrinsic evil without justification and charitable toward those who by the relativism of the age may be led astray on this question.

Pope says living exemplary life is key to re-evangelization

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Living an "exemplary life" is key to re-evangelizing lands that have forgotten their Christian roots, Pope Benedict XVI said.

St. Columbanus, a sixth-century Irish monk, was "one of the fathers of Europe" who helped re-evangelize a region that had succumbed to a resurgence of paganism, the pope said during his June 11 general audience in St. Peter's Square.

Through his life and writings, the Irish saint helped shape the monastic culture of the Middle Ages "and thus nourished the Christian roots of Europe," said Pope Benedict.

Pope Benedict said the saint's message to people today also includes "a firm call for conversion and letting go of earthly goods."

His ascetic lifestyle was not an end in itself "but a means for freely opening oneself up to God's love," the pope said.

"Let us remember that we have to return all those gifts that (God) has given us" after death and that earthly possessions are nothing in comparison to the heavenly rewards that await in eternity, he said.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

In today's catechesis, we turn to St. Columban, one of the many Irish monks who contributed to the re-evangelization of Europe in the early Middle Ages.

Columban made his monastic profession in Bangor and was ordained a priest. At the age of 50, he left the monastery to begin missionary work in Europe, where entire regions had lapsed into paganism.

Beginning in Brittany, Columban and his companions established monasteries at Annegray and Luxeuil. These became centers for the spread of the monastic and missionary ideals brought by the monks from their native Ireland.

Columban introduced to Europe the Irish penitential discipline, including private confession. His stern moral teachings led to conflict with the local bishops and the Frankish court, resulting in the exile of the Irish monks, first to the Rhineland and then to Italy.

At Bobbio, where he established a great monastic center, Columban worked for the conversion of the Arian Lombards and the restoration of unity with the bishop of Rome.

It was there that he died, leaving behind not only the example of an austere monastic life, but also a corpus of writings which shaped the monastic culture of the Middle Ages and thus, nourished the Christian roots of Europe.

Social justice in theory and in action Catholics should practice both charity and justice to others

Quick: Name three papal encyclicals on social justice.

Having trouble? I confess, before I took Christian ethics as part of my graduate studies in pastoral studies, I would have flunked this test, too.

When my classmates and I gave our presentations on Catholic social justice documents at a marathon weekend session, the first presenter wore a jogging suit, hummed the theme to "Rocky" and handed us all bottles of water. This was her way of saying, "We're going to cover some distance here, folks."

And we did. Whew! We started with Pope Leo XIII, who in 1891 expressed the church's concern with the wider world as he commented in "Rerum Novarum" on the horrific working conditions brought about by industrialization.

And we marched — jogged or logged — all the way to Pope John Paul II's "Sollicitudo Rei Socialis" ("On Social Concerns").

We heard popes, bishops' synods and the Second Vatican Council talk about the rights of workers, the right to organize and join unions and the right to private property. We heard popes discuss the merits or demerits of capitalism, communism, socialism. We were reminded that our faith commits us to the dignity of all.

We heard popes defend life, not just in warning against abortion but against the death penalty, nuclear arms, the arms race. We heard our church proclaim a preferential option for the poor. We heard Pope John Paul urge us to stand in solidarity with the poor, shoulder to shoulder.

And when the weekend ended, someone put up a mock finish line for us to run through. Funny, but ironic, because we knew we were not at the end but at the beginning: How do we make these teachings part of our lives?

The morning after my marathon weekend, I woke up to find an amazingly coincidental article on the front page of my newspaper. A local nurse, born and raised in Alaska who lives in my neighborhood, has started an orphanage in Ethiopia. She operates a nonprofit from Anchorage, and with $40,000 this year, made it possible to house and educate 43 children in Ethiopia. According to the Anchorage Daily News, there are more orphans in Ethiopia than there are people in Los Angeles.

How did an ordinary gal decide to do this? Although her religious affiliation wasn't mentioned, she grew up, said the Daily News, in a family committed to acts of charity. As a result, she occasionally volunteered for a medical group that helps refugees in places like

For the Journey

EFFIE

Uganda or Ethiopia.

Three years ago, volunteering in Ethiopia, she met a man who was letting 43 children — many of them AIDS orphans — live in his yard.

When she returned to Alaska, the man and his desperate wards haunted her sleep. Now she has provided a primitive orphanage, with the only swing in the village, and people around Anchorage are helping her out.

How do I relate this story to our marathon on social justice?

First of all, notice where this gal developed her sense of social obligation. As Catholic parents, we are our children's first teachers, and a sense of social justice must be part of our teaching.

Second, our social justice tradition teaches us it's not enough to just write a check. Charity and justice are not the same thing: One helps the poor; the other brings them into communion with us.

Pope John Paul urged us to stand shoulder to shoulder with the poor. The nurse in Anchorage did that, and it moved her to act, and proved the enormous power of just one person.

Chinese Catholics try to resume normal lives in rural quake-hit areas

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

GUANGYUAN, China — Despite fears of continuing aftershocks, Catholics in this quake-hit area of Sichuan province are in good spirits and optimistic about rebuilding their homes soon, said a local priest.

Father Joseph Ye Yong of the Chengdu Diocese has visited all eight churches in Guangyuan parish, traversing mountainous areas about 160 miles northeast of Chengdu on his motorbike, reported the Asian church news agency UCA News.

Chengdu is the provincial capital.

Father Ye, the assistant parish priest, told UCA News June 2 he was relieved to confirm no fatalities among his 20,000 parishioners.

Most of them are farmers who now live in relief tents, their houses having collapsed in the earthquake, but they have returned to work in their terraced fields because the wheat-harvesting season has begun, he said.

Some are still nervous, he added, especially when aftershocks hit.

"The disaster is a cross God has given us, be it rich or poor," the 35-year-old priest said, noting that "all are equal and small when facing the natural disasters."

Many parishioners, he said, are confident of rebuilding their homes if they work hard for a few years, since they expect reconstruction work to mushroom.

"We don't feel alone, because we have received much help and concern from different parts of the country and overseas," said Father Ye.

Seismic waves traveling north-eastward to the neighboring Gansu and Shaanxi provinces caused extensive damage in Guangyuan, about 150 miles from the quake's epicenter in Wenchuan.

As of May 31, local officials were reporting that, in the May 12 earthquake, in Guangyuan and the surrounding counties under its administration about 4,500 people died, more than 20,000 people were injured and more than 1 million were displaced.

Most of the Guangyuan parish's eight churches were damaged seriously. Father Ye estimated it would cost about $577,000 to repair and reinforce all the churches, but he hopes to resume church life as soon as the aftershocks stop.

Father Simon Li Zhigang, administrator of the Chengdu Diocese, told UCA News that more than 20 damaged and flattened churches must be rebuilt.

He said the diocese would make a long-term plan and estimated repairs and reconstruction would cost $10 million-$11 million and take up to four years.

Since mid-May, the diocese has received nearly $30,000 from Catholics across the country toward church reconstruction, he added.

About 30 laypeople of the diocese died in the quake, mainly in the Dujiangyan, Mianzhu and Pengzhou areas, but the injured are hard to count as some were transferred to hospitals in other provinces, Father Li said.

He acknowledged also that the situation of remote churches and Catholic families is still not known, because some roads are still blocked by landslides.

MAN OF THE CLOTH

A model displays a selection from an organic clothing line designed by Father Andrew O'Connor, assistant pastor at Holy Family Church in New York. His new organic clothing line, Goods of Conscience, promotes his church's social teachings by providing healthy labor opportunities for poor workers in Guatemala and the East Bronx section of New York.

Priest's new fashion line helps Guatemalan village

NEW YORK (CNS) — At first glance, the scene seemed typical. In one of Manhattan's trendiest neighborhoods, models strutted down the aisle amid flashing bulbs, pulsating music and a Chardonnay-sipping crowd. The designer promoting this fashion line was clad in New York-requisite black.

But his collar was square and white.

Father Andrew O'Connor is a Catholic priest. His new organic clothing line, Goods of Conscience, promotes the church's social teachings by providing healthy labor opportunities for poor workers in Guatemala and the East Bronx section of New York.

Hand-woven, technicolor and ruggedly formal, Father O'Connor's creations are made from naturally grown cotton. He uses raw dyes such as yellow wood and black walnut.

"It's really great fabric," said model Camilla Barungi, a finalist in the third season of the hit cable TV series "Project Runway," as she showed off her full-length indigo skirt and short-sleeved beige top. "It may not be silk charmeuse," she added, but the ecofriendly style "is the future of clothes."

Father O'Connor sells the garments from his Bronx workshop by appointment. They aren't cheap; shirts are priced in the $300 range, and a silk-batted ski jacket goes for $1,200.

"The construction of the cloth is superb," said David Rose, owner and chief designer of the wholesale clothing company Ascari.

And unlike other fancy duds, these products come packaged with a heartwarming story.

It starts in the southwestern mountains of Guatemala, in the small Mayan village of Chicacao, where members of the Tzutujil tribe live with no electricity. While on retreat there in 2005, Father O'Connor discovered villagers were struggling to preserve an ancient practice of making cloth from local ingredients from the nearby volcanic lake.

Moved by the craftsmanship that went into weaving — the material for one shirt takes up to 15 days to create — and disheartened by the villagers' meager wages, Father O'Connor hatched a plan to pay the workers to ship some of the fabric to New York.

Using a vacant convent attached to Holy Family Church near the Cross Bronx Expressway, where he is assistant pastor, the priest began employing immigrant seamstresses to make clothes based on his designs.

Soon after, with the help of donations, the Goods of Conscience brand was born.

The clothes "look good, feel good and do good," said Father O'Connor, noting that money shipped back to Guatemala has already helped build portions of a church, school and roadway. "It's a clothing line with a mission."

Father O'Connor said wearers of his clothes become part of a "cultural narrative" by helping preserve an indigenous Mayan craft threatened by mass-produced imports.

"It's a win-win, win-win-win situation," said the Ascari company's Rose.

Bishops urge G-8 nations to recommit to fight poverty, climate change

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The presidents of bishops' conferences associated with the Group of Eight industrialized nations have urged government leaders to honor their commitments to reduce global poverty and address climate change.

In a letter released less than three weeks before the July 7-9 summit of the Group of Eight leaders in Toyako, Japan, the bishops called upon the presidents of the convening countries to "reaffirm and build upon the substantial commitments" made at summits in 2005 and 2007.

The G-8 includes Russia, Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, the United Kingdom and the United States.

Chicago Cardinal Francis E. George, president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, was joined by the presidents of bishops' conferences in other G-8 countries in reminding the leaders of their promise to spend $50 billion annually on development assistance — with half going to Africa — by 2010.

"This commitment must be met and additional commitments should be made in the areas of health care, education and humanitarian aid," the bishops wrote.

Citing the current world food crisis, the HIV/AIDS pandemic and a growing concern about malaria and other diseases, the bishops called upon the leaders to consider proposals that would ease access to food in poor communities, increase health and education spending, and "move toward just world trade policies that respect the dignity of the human person in their working life."

Promoting self-help and the empowerment of poor people to be "drivers of their own development" are key to such efforts, the bishops said.

They also urged action to ease the impact of climate change on the world's poor in developed and developing countries.

FROM THE VATICAN

Pope appeals for stability, religious freedom in Middle East

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI appealed to world leaders to help bring peace, stability and true religious freedom to the Middle East.

"Peace is the only path that will also address the serious problem of the displaced and refugees and stop emigration, especially of Christians, which deeply hurts the Eastern churches," he said in a June 19 speech to representatives of Catholic communities in the Middle East and to Catholic aid agencies that assist them.

During a private audience with some 80 participants of a Vatican meeting of funding agencies for Eastern churches, the pope thanked the representatives for their dedication to offering desperately needed aid and support to Christian communities, especially in the Holy Land, which are "vital for the whole church."

The pope said he shared the pain of Christians in the Holy Land and said he was praying "fervently to be able to visit in person" and for lasting peace.

The pope urged the church funding agencies, whose umbrella organization is known by its acronym, ROACO, to continue with their support of Iraqi Christians, including the internally displaced and those living in difficult conditions as refugees.

Pope Benedict highlighted the recent developments promoting "dialogue and mutual understanding" in Lebanon and said he hoped this nation would fulfill its "vocation to be for the Middle East and the world a sign of the real possibility for peaceful and constructive coexistence between peoples."

He also said he hoped the June 22 beatification in Lebanon of Capuchin Father Jacques Haddad would "touch the hearts of young Lebanese Christians today" so that they, too, can lead "an evangelical life at the service of the poor" and be faithful witnesses of the Catholic faith in the Arab world.

Vatican official says 'Humanae Vitae' defends freedom of women

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Although bitterly criticized as burdensome on Catholic couples when it was published in 1968, the encyclical "Humanae Vitae" has ended up defending the freedom of women and the fullness of married love, a top Vatican official said.

Cardinal Giovanni Battista Re said in mid-June that the encyclical on married love and procreation, which held that artificial birth control is morally wrong, has defended the value and sacred character of human love against a strictly technological approach.

Cardinal Re, prefect of the Congregation for Bishops, said doctrinal analysis and pastoral experience over the last 40 years have shown that "the encyclical, which at first appeared to be restrictive, in reality has actually safeguarded the unity and fullness of conjugal love."

It has also "defended the freedom of women, the responsibility of married couples and the autonomy of people in developing countries," he said.

"The encyclical is not simply a 'no' to contraception but also a defense of the dignity of woman against whatever might degrade her greatness as a person, wife and mother, reducing her to an object of pleasure," he said.

Cardinal Re made his remarks in a keynote address at the Rome meeting of the American Academy of FertilityCare Professionals, which had as its theme this year's 40th anniversary of "Humanae Vitae."

The cardinal said a careful reading of the encyclical today shows that its teaching tries to persuade rather than coerce. The pope's aim was not to force consciences but to enlighten them, he said.

The encyclical's teaching against contraceptives, Cardinal Re said, is framed in the context of a very positive discourse on human love, highlighting the deep connection between human sexuality and the possibility of life.

"The text of the encyclical proposes a sure path that Catholics ought to follow with confidence: a path that is a 'yes' to life, a 'yes' to the Creator," he said.

Its pronouncement on the intrinsically evil character of contraception, the cardinal added, is "a teaching to be held as irreformable."

Bishop Curlin discusses healing power of Lourdes

illnesses to Lourdes water.

Lourdes attracts more than 6 million pilgrims annually and will host a visit by Pope Benedict XVI in September for its jubilee year, marking the anniversary of the apparitions. The jubilee began last Dec. 8, the feast of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and ends this Dec. 8. The apparitions were officially recognized by the Catholic Church in 1862.

Bishop Curlin's dedication to Our Lady of Lourdes began as a child in his grandmother's home.

"She had a plastic shrine of Lourdes, with a blue vigil light," said Bishop Curlin. "We would kneel in front of it and say the rosary."

St. Bernadette was a poor, illiterate 14-year-old when Mary appeared to her in the grotto at Lourdes.

Over the course of five months, St. Bernadette saw Mary 18 times. During one of the apparitions, she instructed St. Bernadette to dig in dirt at the grotto and told her to drink of the water, though no water was there. Once St. Bernadette began to dig, the Lourdes water was revealed, and its healing properties have become renowned over the last 150 years.

Since 1883, the Lourdes Medical Bureau — which gathers medical information for a French doctor appointed by the bishop of Tarbes and Lourdes — has examined the records of more than 7,000 people claiming they were cured after visiting the Lourdes sanctuaries. Of these, 67 cures have been considered miracles.

Garcia believes he has been cured by Lourdes water.

He suffered immensely for 30 years from both asthma and allergies, and despite various medications and treatments, nothing helped. "The doctor said there was something wrong with my immune system," he said.

Then, 14 years ago, Garcia received Lourdes water from a Franciscan in New York and immediately saw a difference in his condition. Garcia was tested by his doctor, who found him to have the lung capacity of a man almost half his age.

"I am a living example of what happened at Lourdes 150 years ago," said Garcia.

Through 16 pilgrimages to Lourdes, Bishop Curlin has witnessed many miracles, but he said the greatest miracles are of the spirit, not the flesh.

"Our Lady told Bernadette, 'I cannot promise you happiness in this world, only in the next,'" said Bishop Curlin.

"So many sick go there and they leave there sick," he said. "What is changed is in their hearts. God moves you where he wants you, if your heart is ready for it. You go where God wants you to go; you say what God wants you to say."

Of the millions who visit Lourdes each year and the thousands who are sick, many are not asking to be cured, said

Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin speaks about Our Lady of Lourdes at Immaculate Conception Church in Hendersonville June 8.

Bishop Curlin.

"They are asking, 'Give me the faith to bear this,'" he said. "The message of Lourdes is to take your faith seriously. Lourdes makes you see things through the eyes of Jesus," said Bishop Curlin.

Bishop Curlin recounted his visits with Mother Teresa — both in Washington, D.C. and in the streets of Calcutta, India. Her faith walked through a deep darkness, he said, but her work as Jesus' hands persevered despite that — a characteristic she shared with St. Bernadette.

"In your life, there are moments when you feel momentarily forgotten by God," Bishop Curlin told the audience. "Then there is the dark night, total darkness where you are praying 'Oh, God!' and nothing comes back to you. We have all heard of Mother Teresa's dark night. She said to God, 'I give you my emptiness, my darkness.'"

Witnessing the struggles of those who went to Lourdes on crutches, in wheelchairs, with incurable disease and despair, Bishop Curlin said he found himself moving into the darkness of others to be the hands of Jesus in that holy place.

"Lourdes says, 'Take him off the cross.' Bernadette found Christ when scrubbing floors or pots and pans," said Bishop Curlin. "'Jesus captured my heart,' she said."

Bishop Curlin was diagnosed with cancer 15 years ago and treated successfully. He currently faces a diagnosis of blindness within the next few years due to a hereditary condition. Looking to the miracles of Lourdes, Bishop Curlin said he faces this diagnosis with a calm acceptance.

"The greatest miracle [of Lourdes] is what happens inside you. I'd rather see with my heart than my eyes," he said. "I pray if I lose my sight, don't let me lose the sight of my heart."

"Once you meet Jesus, you see your life more clearly," he said.

Poverty, humility defined life of St. Bernadette Soubirous

LOURDES, France (CNS) — St. Bernadette Soubirous was 14 years old, poor, illiterate and did not know the catechism enough to make her first Communion when Mary appeared to her in the grotto at Lourdes, a small town of about 4,000 people in the Pyrenees Mountains.

St. Bernadette was born Jan. 7, 1844. She was the first of nine children. By 1854, her financially-struggling family gave her up, first as a servant to her aunt, then to help on a farm outside Lourdes.

St. Bernadette returned to Lourdes for catechism classes in 1858. On Feb. 11 that year, St. Bernadette, her sister and a friend went looking for wood. As she was taking off her stockings and shoes to cross a canal, she heard a gust of wind and saw a young woman dressed in white.

That was the first of 18 Marian apparitions.

But St. Bernadette shunned the attention that followed. She sought seclusion and entered religious life with the Sisters of Charity and Christian Instruction at Nevers, France.

She remained hidden from the world and died in 1879 of tuberculosis of the bone. She was canonized in 1933. Her body is incorrupt and venerated at the altar of the Nevers convent.

About this presentation...What principles form the basis of the U.S. Catholic Bishops' call for comprehensive immigration reform? How can the faith community help bring about a society that welcomes newcomers, especially people fleeing poverty and/or seeking reunion with family? As we seek immigration reform, can we concurrently reach the goals of fulfilling our faith's mandate to "welcome the stranger," maintaining our nation's security, and respecting the moral values and civil laws which guide our actions? These questions will be addressed during this presentation. For more information on the "Justice for Immigrants Campaign," visit www.justiceforimmigrants.org.

FOCUSing on mission work

Missionary training underway at Belmont Abbey College

BELMONT — Nearly 200 young adults are training to be Catholic missionaries at Belmont Abbey College this summer.

FOCUS, the Fellowship of Catholic University Students, is training its full-time staff members at the college for five weeks, which started May 31.

Colorado-based FOCUS, a national student outreach organization, has a presence of more than 150 missionaries ministering to thousands of students on 38 college campuses in 18 states.

"FOCUS could have chosen from any number of outstanding colleges to host their summer training this year. The fact that they selected the Abbey represents quite a coup for the college and the whole community," said Rhonda Eason, Belmont Abbey College events coordinator, who headed up a campus-wide team effort to bring FOCUS to Belmont.

The college typically hosts several camps, retreats and other kinds of events during the summer, but the FOCUS training session will be one of the largest summer events in college history.

"Under the leadership of Abbot Placid Solari and president Dr. Bill Thierfelder, Belmont Abbey College is providing a strong and faithful Catholic presence in the south," said Curtis Martin, FOCUS founder and president.

"We are honored to host our staff training at Belmont Abbey. The Abbey's staff has rolled out the red carpet to welcome us, and the campus will be an excellent setting to encourage prayer, community-building and the formation of our staff," he said.

FOCUS summer training is one part graduate school, one part boot camp and one part retreat. Participants take courses in Scripture, apologetics, discipleship, church teaching and fundraising. Noted Catholic speakers and teachers are involved.

In addition to coursework, the participants take part in daily prayer, daily Mass, reconciliation, practical workshops and team building.

Dr. Matthew Harrison of Concord talks to the chief of the Bibiani tribe while on a medical mission in Ghana, Africa April 24-May 5. Harrison, along with several other doctors and volunteers, treated a total of 1,500 patients during the trip.

Mission trip to Africa provides spiritual renewal for local doctor

medical mission trip for Harrison, a parishioner of St. James the Greater Church in Concord. He went on his first to Mexico last year.

"One of the reasons I am getting involved in missions is in the hopes that my kids will be able to join me on missions to experience helping others and see how people of other cultures worship," said Harrison.

Harrison and his wife have six children with one on the way.

"My main mission is to my family," he said, "and bringing my children closer to God."

He said he wants his children to realize how blessed they are and to get a glimpse of the poverty-stricken conditions in other parts of the world.

In Ghana, "people live in houses that are basically slabs of concrete on a dirt floor with a tin roof," said Harrison.

"People walk two to five miles to come sit in the sun all day to see a doctor," he said.

"Here (in the United States) people get frustrated when they have to wait 10 minutes," he added.

All Helping Hands Medical Missions are set up to follow a retreat-like format. There is a mission priest on every trip.

A typical day includes morning prayers and meditation, Mass, work at the clinic, night prayers, spiritual counseling and confession.

For the first day or two of the mission, the focus is on evangelization; the missionaries go door-to-door in the community asking for prayers. Next, they make home visits to care for sick people who can't make it to the clinic.

Finally they spend about five days working at the clinic sites.

Harrison's mission took place in Bibiani, a town about 250 miles northwest of Accra, the capital of Ghana.

"I was blessed to be able to run the medical clinics and even got to pitch in on pulling teeth with our dentist," he said.

Other volunteers included an orthopedic surgeon, urologist, pharmacist and several non-medical professionals.

They treated a total of 1,500 patients during the week.

"We get much more out of it than the people we help," he said. "It really is a spiritual renewal."

"I think it helps the missionaries themselves to know how they can give out what God has given them to share with other people," said Father Simon Assamoah, the mission priest in Bibiani.

When asked how the local people responded to the missionaries, Father Assamoah said, "it was fantastic."

"For them to see a group of about 21 Americans come into the community — into their homes, praying with them, giving out rosaries — it gave a real hope to the people," he said.

Harrison said he was impressed with the vibrant faith of the local people.

"The Sunday Mass is about three hours long," he said.

During the week, local Catholics get up early to go to Mass at 5:30 a.m., before they start work on the farms and in the mines.

The Catholic community in Bibiani is "very dynamic," said Father Assamoah. "It is a growing church and the people are very enthusiastic about their faith."

"They love to spend time with God," he added.

Both Harrison and his medical partner Dr. Daniel Holland, a Catholic, are committed to doing one international medical mission a year.

But even when they're not crossing borders, they strive to maintain that mission objective in their own family clinic by providing medical care with a Christian focus.

Father Assamoah is currently visiting the United States and will be in Charlotte July 31-Aug. 6.

"Dr. Matt (Harrison) has become a contact person" for the Bibiani mission, he said. "He has seen the needs of the people."

"I am coming to thank his community for giving him the opportunity to come to Bibiani," said Father Assamoah.

"The mission was really worthwhile," said Father Assamoah. "It really inspired the faith of the people and I'm sure it also inspired the faith of the missionaries."

First deacons in diocese celebrate 25 years of service

of permanent deacons ordained for the Diocese of Charlotte celebrated their 25th anniversaries of ordination.

The 19 deacons were ordained to the permanent diaconate by then-Bishop Michael J. Begley before more than 2,000 people at Ovens Auditorium in Charlotte May 29, 1983.

"We couldn't believe 19 of us drew all those people. It was quite an event," said Deacon Harold Markle, permanent deacon at St. John Baptiste de la Salle Church in North Wilkesboro.

The diaconate is the first of three ranks in ordained ministry. As ordained ministers, permanent deacons may perform baptisms, witness marriages and assist in various liturgies of the church.

The permanent deacon is the only ordained man allowed to be married. However, if a deacon's wife passes away, he is not allowed to remarry. If a man is single, he is not allowed to marry after ordination.

Enter the trendsetters

In January 1980, Bishop Michael J. Begley, the first bishop of Charlotte, announced the formation of the permanent diaconate program in the diocese.

"The more I read (about it), the more excited and interested I became," said Deacon Markle. "My wife said she would support me all the way ...."

Deacon Andy Cilone had been active in the church all his life. "I saw the permanent diaconate as another step in my work in the church ... to learn and educate others about my faith," said Deacon Cilone, permanent deacon at Immaculate Conception Church in Forest City. "I talked it over with my wife and kids. We decided that I would apply. If it was meant to be, I'd be chosen."

By September 1980, Deacons Cilone and Markle were among the 21 candidates, under the direction of then-Father (now Msgr.) Anthony Kovacic, to attend the opening weekend program at Sacred Heart College in Belmont.

There, Msgr. Marvin LeFrois, permanent diaconate program director in the Diocese of Savannah, Ga., explained how the program and how deacons were serving in his diocese.

"It was a learning process — we had no role models," said Deacon Markle. "The priests we'd be assisting didn't know what to expect. We didn't know what to expect."

"It was scary at first," said Deacon Cilone. "We referred to ourselves as the guinea pigs."

The three-year program covered four main topics: church history and mission; the sacraments; Scripture; and the liturgy and the deacons' participation at Mass, baptisms, wakes and weddings.

"Going in, we didn't know how awesome the program was going to be," said Deacon Markle.

be ordained in 1983. Two men were ordained later and went on to become priests for the diocese.

Not all of those first deacons are still alive; in addition, some have retired and some have moved out of the diocese. But a strong camaraderie existed between them then, and still does today.

"It was a special group. We were like a fraternity. We looked out for one another," said Deacon Markle.

"We grew as a family — the 19 men and the wives," said Deacon Cilone.

Over the years

The first permanent deacons were ordained to serve in their parishes. But then-Bishop William G. Curlin later told them, said Deacon Markle, that "we were ordained not for our parishes, but for where we were needed."

Deacon Markle said being transferred to another parish was a "good experience."

"You go there not as a parishioner but as a deacon. You get to know the people and how you can help," he said.

Deacon Markle's desire to help led him to prison, hospice and AIDS ministries, and most recently to volunteer work at a local hospital — "I keep them in stitches," he said — and in Hispanic ministry. Deacon Markle, who turns 80 in August, is learning Spanish to better assist Hispanic parishioners.

"Our diocese is becoming diversified with many nationalities, primarily Hispanics. We must rise to the occasion and plan for that. We have an obligation to bring the communities together as one."

"The church is growing and the outreach is greater," said Deacon Cilone.

Regarding the growing number of cultures in the diocese, Deacon Cilone said, "Variety is the spice of life. They've added to the flavor of the diocese."

In July 2003, the permanent diaconate expanded its duties considerably by taking over the diocesan prison ministry program. Many deacons visit prisons on a regular basis to offer Communion services, Bible studies and counseling to prisoners.

Deacon Harold Markle (left) and Father John Hanic are pictured during the Mass celebrating the 50th anniversary of St. John Baptiste de la Salle Church in North Wilkesboro Sept. 21, 2002. As ordained ministers, permanent deacons may perform baptisms, witness marriages and assist in various church liturgies.

20 years and has won two volunteer of the year awards for his work, said the inmates' sincere desire for change is what makes prison ministry so attractive to him.

These are "men who, once they are in prison, start leaning towards religion and spirituality. They start reading the Bible," he said.

Deacon Cilone said prison ministry is not designed to convert prisoners to Catholicism, but rather to help them develop their spiritual lives and "let it take them wherever it takes them."

Deacons today

Candidates now go through approximately six years of diaconate training, including two years in the diocesan lay ministry training program.

The application process is extensive, involving interviewing and collection of credentials and recommendations. After the application process is complete, candidates enter aspirancy, the initial step in the diaconate process.

For about six months, each aspirant prayerfully reflects on his call to the ministry. The academic phase of the training begins soon after for those who are selected to continue. Current minimum requirements for aspirants include being a Catholic for at least five years, being at least 35 years old but not having reached age 65 by 2014.

Candidates must possess a spirit of openness and prayer, humility, faithfulness to the teachings of Jesus and a willingness to spread the Gospel through word and actions, according to Deacon Louis Pais, director of the permanent diaconate for the diocese.

"That is what the concept of the diaconate is all about," he said.

Deacon Markle said he would do it all over again today.

"After a while, it (the permanent diaconate) becomes a part of your life. God has been good to me ... everything that has happened in my life has been with God's help."

Deacon Cilone had similar sentiments. "When I look back, I see God's hand leading me in different directions as needed — everything seemed to flow together," he said.

For those considering the permanent diaconate, he recommended being "ready to give and apply yourself. Being a deacon is demanding but very rewarding at the same time."

Completing a chapter in the 'book of life'

Father Hawker retires from leading, educating the faithful in the Diocese of Charlotte

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

MINT HILL — Hundreds of people flooded the room to celebrate the retirement of their pastor, and their friend.

The retirement party for Father James Hawker, pastor of St. Luke Church in Mint Hill, was held at the church June 7.

Father Hawker, who turned 70 this year, is retiring after 45 years of priestly ministry. He has served St. Luke Church as pastor since 2001, and the Diocese of Charlotte as vicar of education since 1995.

"My assignment in the Diocese of Charlotte has been a grace-filled experience," said Father Hawker.

"During the past 13 years, I've been enriched greatly by the quality of faith exemplified by the priests, religious and laity of the diocese," he said. "It's been a privilege and a pleasure to serve in this area of the Lord's vineyard."

Ordained in the Archdiocese of Boston in February 1963, his first parish assignment was at Our Lady Comforter of the Afflicted Church in Waltham, Mass.

"My pastor said, 'Father, you're in charge of the CCD,'" he recalled.

The parish's Confraternity of Christian Doctrine, or religious education, classes consisted of 1,800 elementary school and 500 high school students at the time.

"That was a baptism of fire," said Father Hawker. "But my love for catechetics has grown since then."

Father Hawker received master's degrees in psychology and religious education, and a master of divinity degree in theology. He served in the Archdiocese of Boston in a variety of ministries, including parish work, assistant headmaster of Cardinal Cushing Academy in West Newbury and director of religious education for the archdiocese.

He also held memberships on the archdiocese's liturgical commission, justice and peace commission, lay ministry commission and the Catholic-Jewish Committee. He was a lecturer of catechetics and homiletics at St. John's Seminary and catechetics at Pope John XXIII Seminary in Boston.

His studies and experience with religious education led him to foster

Catholicism beyond the archdiocese. In the 1980s, he served as president of the National Catholic Education Association's (NCEA) National Conference of Directors of Religious Education and Chief Administrators of Catholic Education committees.

He also served as a member of the board of directors for the NCEA. From 1990 to 1995, he served as a consultant to the Vatican's Congregation for the Clergy in the area of catechetics.

"Every continent and many countries were represented there, and I was privileged to represent the United States during the congregation's annual gatherings," said Father Hawker.

"Two areas that we considered were the forthcoming catechism of the Catholic Church and adult catechetics," he said. "It was during that time that then-Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger met with and addressed us."

Father Hawker next put his gift for catechetics to use when he transferred at then-Bishop William G. Curlin's request to the Diocese of Charlotte to become the vicar for education in 1995.

"A vicar for education is delegated by the bishop to oversee the educational mission of the diocese, its parishes and schools," said Father Hawker. "He is responsible for ensuring that the educational vision of the bishop is implemented."

In addition to his vicar duties, Father Hawker returned to parish work. He said it has been a joy to serve as pastor of St. Luke Church for the last seven years.

"I've been impressed deeply by the generosity of spirit of the parishioners," he said. "They've been and are extremely attentive and responsive to the social Gospel whereby they, like all Christians, are called to manifest the care and compassion of Jesus himself toward the poor, needy and outcast."

Upon his retirement in July, Father Hawker will return to the Archdiocese of Boston, where he actively served for 32 years.

"I am looking forward to being of service to the incarcerated and those who are victims of addiction," he said. "Naturally, I shall serve in whatever manner that is helpful to parishes in need of assistance."

Father Hawker said he is grateful for the time he spent in North Carolina.

"To Bishop Curlin who invited me here to assist in the educational mission of the diocese, and to the priests of the diocese for their exemplary spirit of welcome and fraternity, I express deep gratitude," he said.

"In my view, the book of life is a compilation of chapters. As I return to Boston, the chapter related to the Diocese of Charlotte and the parish of St. Luke will be closed," he said. "However, its influence will live on in my life — for that, I am very grateful, as I continue to be bound to this community in the name of Jesus Christ."

With the grace of God

Four priests celebrate 10 years of service

BY KATHLEEN HEALY SCHMIEDER
CORRESPONDENT

HENDERSONVILLE — "I pray every day: Lord, if you choose me, let me be a good, holy, simple, humble priest," said Father Peter Pham, priest in residence at St. Joseph Church in Charlotte.

"Let me reflect the image of God, the image of Christ. Let me be a good priest," he said.

Father Pham is one of four priests in the Diocese of Charlotte who celebrated the 10th anniversary of their priestly ordinations June 6.

The 1998 ordination of Father Pham, Father Dean Cesa, Father Christopher Davis and Father Matthew Leonard marked their vows to undertake journeys of service to God through the vocation of the priesthood.

"It has gone so fast," noted Father Davis, pastor of St. Joseph Church in Asheville.

Reflecting on the last 10 years, the priests shared a sense of humility and commitment to follow God's call to serve his people.

"At the beginning, it is like a marriage, a beautiful honeymoon," said Father Pham.

The reality of a priest's daily work within a parish also reflects a marriage, requiring the support of both the priest and the parish to establish a solid foundation and life.

As with any vocation, there are often frustrations that require daily recommitment to their vows. With prayer and dedication, they continue to serve, facing challenges and overcoming hurdles with a willingness to give of themselves every day.

"It is a beautiful and scary thing," said Father Leonard, pastor of St. Francis of Assisi Church in Lenoir, regarding the dual nature of the priesthood. "At one point you give yourself over to the providence of God and say, 'Do with me what you will,' and you trust."

Heading the call to serve requires prayer and also a love of serving. For some the gifts of being a priest come through what they give to others.

"As a priest, I have the ability to reach out to different cultures ... but there is much more to it," said Father Davis.

"My hope is to get closer to God, to bring people into the love and knowledge of God," he said. "In that is the salvation of souls — mine and those of the people I serve."

"The greatest gift is to be able to know Christ better by serving people," said Father Leonard. "Do ministry, do what's right in front of you right now. If you think about being a priest, do whatever you can find in the church to serve others, because that's what a priest does, whatever needs to be done."

"Always make primary what God wants you to do," said Father Cesa, pastor of St. Barnabas Church in Arden, in regard to following a priestly vocation.

"We should focus on the two sacraments we repeat — Eucharist and reconciliation. The Eucharist is the center of all we do," he said.

"Pope Benedict XVI tells us it's not the love you receive, but the love you give that matters," said Father Pham. "We need to be ready to die for the love of Christ."

In his vocation, Father Pham, a native of Vietnam, said he receives support from his flock and his pastor, Father Peter Tan Van Le, who recently celebrated his 35th anniversary to the priesthood.

"The grace of God is always with me, in good and bad times," said Father Pham. "In 10 years, you go through this and that. It's not an easy path, but God loves me so much."

"He walks with me and he carries me through. If you think you are called, just do it! Go with great confidence," he said.

The priests aspire to continue walking with God and ministering to their people.

"I hope to continue serving the people, serving God," said Father Cesa.

"I am glad I'm a priest," said Father Leonard. In reflecting on the last 10 years, he added, "It makes me look forward to the next 20 and 30 years."

"I recently returned from a retreat and at the end of it I found myself thinking, 'I want to go home. I want to go home to my parish and my parishioners,'" said Father Davis.

"If God had given me the chance to do it all over again," he said, "I wouldn't change a thing."

Jubilarian priests reflect on years of service

and 25 years are Father John Hanic and Father John Schneider.

Over the years, these men have served as witnesses to the people of the Diocese of Charlotte through the example of their lives and their faith. The Catholic News & Herald spoke with a few of the priests and asked them to reflect on their ministries and share some of their insights in the priesthood, the diocese and living the faith. Here is what they had to say.

What have you enjoyed most about being a priest?

"I always enjoyed the experience of going to a new part of North Carolina. And then of course working with the people. Because of our nature and being spread over a large area, we got to meet a lot of people from all parts of the state."

—Msgr. Thomas Walsh, a 55-year jubilarian

"I think the most enriching ministry of the priesthood is the ministry to the sick and suffering — working with the people especially when suffering by (approaching) death."

—Father Joseph Kelleher, a 55-year jubilarian

"The Mass and the sacramental ministry."

—Father Richard McCue, a 50-year jubilarian

"I've always liked people and I thank God because it means a lot to make people feel welcome."

—Jesuit Father Vincent de Paul Alagia, a 50-year jubilarian

"Working with God's people."

—Father John Schneider, 25-year jubilarian and pastor of St. Eugene Church in Asheville

How has the diocese changed?

"My very first parish was in Wadesboro. At that point when I went there in 1957, there were just 40 children and 28 adults, and of course that has changed so much. North Carolina has become much more urban than it was. (Back then) they told me to be careful driving on the highway because there might be a mule on the road. I actually missed a hog once."

—Msgr. Walsh

ARCHIVE PHOTO

Father John Hanic and Father John Schneider are pictured as transitional deacons during a gathering in Maggie Valley July 20, 1982. The two men were ordained as priests in 1983.

"Well there were a lot of the liturgical changes as a result of the Second Vatican Council, (particularly) increased participation of lay men and women in the work of the church."

—Father McCue

What are you doing now?

"I love the work and I love the kids. I think the ministry to the high school is just the presence to be there for them. It's a terrific ministry. I tell them now, 'Even after I'm gone I'll still be looking out for you. So be careful, if you're up to something I may come back and haunt you, and boy would I scare you.'"

—Father Joseph Kelleher, chaplain to Bishop McGuinness High School in Kernersville

"I'm a senior priest — which means that I help. I promised Bishop (William G.) Curlin, I said, 'Bishop, I know they need help.' So that's what I do."

—Msgr. Walsh, on returning to his hometown of Allegany, N.Y. to be closer to his siblings and help out in the diocese there

"I'm doing like so many other retired priests — assisting other priests in various areas and helping with the weekend Masses. Last weekend I said four Masses at one of the local parishes. I'm glad to do it."

—Father McCue, currently resides in Exeter, N.H.

"Father Joe (Sobierajski) wanted me to come here because he was interested in having the parish involved in retreat ministry. So we developed a team to give retreats and spiritual direction."

—Father Alagia, in residence at St. Peter Church in Charlotte

What advice would you give to new priests or seminarians who are just starting out in their ministries?

"I would say never neglect your prayer life. That's the thing that keeps us going. Prayer is the most important thing."

—Father Kelleher

"Listen to God's people. Be of service to God's people."

—Father Schneider

"I'd say first of all to thank God for the gift of the priesthood and for being chosen from others to carry out the ministry of Christ in this unique way."

—Father McCue

"He (a seminarian) has to be able to doubt and accept doubt, and to question and be willing to search."

—Father Alagia

"I would say just be open to new experiences."

—Msgr. Walsh

Vatican hosts world premiere of musical about life of Mary

Show reminds people Mary is 'woman of our times,' says archbishop

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican has thrown its support behind an Italian musical highlighting the life of Mary.

The Vatican also hosted the show's world premiere in the Paul VI audience hall June 17.

"Mary of Nazareth: A Story That Continues" was sponsored by the pontifical councils for Culture and for Social Communications; the Vatican's secretary of state, Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone; the Italian Senate; and Rome's city and regional governments.

Some 40 actors, 12 dancers and a 60-piece orchestra brought the story of "the most important woman in the history of humanity" to the stage.

At a June 10 press conference at the Vatican, Archbishop Claudio Celli, president of the Pontifical Council for Social Communications, said he was pleased the council was sponsoring a musical dedicated to Mary.

He said while the council does not see its role as a promoter of musicals, this project stood out.

In a world that has lost so many values, people are still "nostalgic" and looking for sense and meaning in their lives, he said.

This show reminds people that Mary "is a woman of our times" who once again "presents (and) communicates Christ the lord to mankind today," he said.

"And that is why with pleasure the pontifical council was pleased to see this show and with pleasure gives its sponsorship," he said.

No commitments have been made about where the show will play now that it has premiered at the Vatican.

"We have made contacts with people in South America, Europe, Italy and the Middle East," said Sergio Pellerey, head of the show's promotional agency, AIRAM.

Burdens, humility can help reveal God's call

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

I was discussing God's attitude toward sin and forgiveness with two teenagers preparing for the sacraments. Kim struggled with the idea that God could forgive someone who had committed a sin such as a crime that caused enormous pain to the victim.

It was a normal human response. But Jack thought otherwise.

"I've found out that it's not as hard to forgive as you might think," he said. "I've had people do some bad things to me that have really hurt me. But I saw that the bad stuff is really about them, not me, and not forgiving only makes it worse."

"That was what Jesus showed in the resurrection, right? That what happens here that hurts you goes away, and what's important is loving people and forgiving them like he did, so you can go to heaven with him."

I was amazed at the depth of Jack's understanding — and the certainty of his faith. Although I'd worked with Kim and Jack for a year, I thought their growth in formation was meager because we met infrequently. Besides, Jack was very restless, and it was difficult to tell if he actually was comprehending the fundamentals of Catholic faith I'd been trying to teach him.

I knew that Jack had never been taught even the basics of any faith. Also, he had a strikingly difficult life in his 17 years. So I was astounded in this session to hear him speaking about the faith with great knowledge and conviction.

Jack had been faithfully attending Mass with his teenage friend who had invited him to church. He'd told me about conversations he'd had with his parents about Catholicism.

But I realized the depth of spirituality and understanding in this young man was more than what had been placed there in any of us.

No, while some of us, though given faith at an early age, struggle to understand and trust God, Jack is one of the "liti ones" to whom God will reveal himself as Jesus says in this week's Gospel. As for Jack, suffering much in his young life, faith wasn't hard. In Jesus he has found the yoke easy and the burden light.

Questions:

What burdens and difficulties in your own life can help you see some meaning in the life to which Jesus calls you? What "hidden things" have God revealed to you in your moments of humility?

'Mark on the world'

Musicologists find gems in scores found in Bolivian mission churches

BY BARBARA J. FRASER
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

CONCEPCION, Bolivia — While the painstakingly restored churches in eastern Bolivia may be the crown jewels of South America's colonial Jesuit missions, the real gems were found in several decrepit boxes after nearly two centuries of neglect.

In 1972, while he was beginning restoration of the early missions, Swiss architect Hans Roth found boxes and piles of music in the churches in San Rafael and Santa Ana de Velasco. Some were fragments, while others were nearly complete scores.

The music was found "in an unfortunate state," said Javier Mendoza, director of the museum and music archive in Concepcion. Nevertheless, he said, "the interesting thing is that the people kept it."

The scores connected singers in the communities with the Jesuit missionaries who brought classical music to this region of Bolivia, called the Chiquitania, in the late 1600s.

Photographs from the 1950s show members of choirs in the churches holding the scores, even though they did not know how to read music, Mendoza said.

Roth salvaged about 5,000 sheets of music and took them to the larger town of Concepcion, where musicologists could study and catalog them. Experts then began the painstaking task of preserving the manuscripts.

The collection "is the repository of colonial music in the Americas and the only one containing music by Dominico Zipoli, by far the most important European composer to emigrate to the Americas before the 19th century," said Julieta Alvarado, a Panamanian-born harpsichordist and music professor at Southwest Minnesota State University.

The more than 200 pieces of keyboard music found in San Rafael comprise "the largest colonial keyboard music collection to date in the entire continent," said Alvarado, who spent several years studying the music.

Because the pages were dirty and wrinkled, before restoration work could start they had to be dampened and flattened, then dried and cleaned. The actual restoration began last year with funding provided by the Spanish government.

In some cases, the sheets must be washed using a special technique, Mendoza said. In others, holes must be filled.

"We do not fill in missing parts" of the music, he said. "We are not reinterpreting" the pieces. "That is the job of musicologists."

The restorers' task is to stabilize and preserve the music so that musicologists can study it and musicians can perform it. The scores have been photocopied so that researchers do not handle the originals. The restoration techniques were chosen carefully.

Mendoza estimates that the restoration will cost about $200,000 in all. A special, climate-controlled room has been designed for the archive, and plans include better security and fire-suppression systems.

Future plans also include capitalizing on the experience the restorers have gained and offering restoration services as a way of generating revenue to support the archive and museum, he said.

Mendoza's dream is to publish a book of the musical scores "so they reach more people."

With the restoration of the archive, the music that flourished in the Jesuit missions in the late 1600s and early 1700s and remained hidden for nearly two centuries after the Jesuits were expelled from the Spanish colonies has come to light again.

The baroque music festival held every two years in the Chiquitania is a showcase for the missions, the music that was played and composed there, and young local musicians who have forged a link with their ancestors through the ancient melodies.

"With music," Mendoza said, the Chiquitania "has left its mark on the world."

ARCHIVAL ANECDOTA

For the month of June, here are some historical facts about St. Peter Church, the first Catholic church in Charlotte.

Important Early Dates

- March 17, 1851: Father Jeremiah O'Connell laid the cornerstone of the original St. Peter Church.
- June 29, 1852: On the feast day of Sts. Peter and Paul, Bishop Ignatius Reynolds, the second bishop of Charleston, S.C., dedicated the first St. Peter Church. It was described as "a brick church of a very neat style of architecture, 50 feet long and 30 feet wide with arched ceilings." Also, it had "a picket fence and a pot-belly stove that glowed in winter." It was located on the same lot as the present-day St. Peter Church, on Tryon Street at First Street.
- July 5, 1873: The first resident priest in Charlotte, Father J. B. Hands, arrived at St. Peter Church.
- July 2, 1882: Bishop H.P. Northrop of Charleston ordained Benedictine Father Daniel Hefti to priesthood in St. Peter Church — this was the first time a priest was ordained in Charlotte and perhaps the first occurrence in all of North Carolina.
- Sept. 3, 1893: Abbott-Bishop Leo Haid of Belmont laid the cornerstone for the new (present-day) St. Peter Church. Benedictine Father Francis Meyer, pastor, assisted Abbott-Bishop Haid.
- Dec. 24, 1893: Abbott-Bishop Haid dedicated the newly-built St. Peter Church.

Historical Facts

— The need for a larger church and damage to the original church from two munitions explosions necessitated the construction of a new building.

— St. Katherine Drexel contributed money to build the present St. Peter Church.

— A typical Sunday schedule in 1880 at St. Peter Church: Sunday School, 9 a.m.; Mass, 10:30 a.m.; catechism, 4:30 p.m.; vespers, 5 p.m.

Quotes

Missionary priest and author Father Jeremiah O'Connell (1821-1894) served many of the early missions of western North Carolina, South Carolina and Georgia. The following excerpts are quoted from his book, "Catholicity in the Carolinas and Georgia."

— The first St. Peter Church: "The church lot is located at this time almost in the heart of the city; [in 1852] it lay at the extreme [southern] limits of the town. It comprises two acres. I was offered the entire vacant square, a bare old field, for the sum of five hundred dollars. ... The enterprise [land and construction of the original St. Peter] cost about one thousand dollars."

— Dedication of the original St. Peter Church: "The ceremony was performed by Bishop Reynolds, in presence of a large congregation, chiefly non-Catholics. He delivered an able discourse on the 'Real Presence.' I said the Mass, the first of many thousands offered in the church; it was served by the bishop. On the same occasion he administered confirmation ..."

— Catholics in the Charlotte area: "At that time [1852] there were scarcely one hundred adult Catholics in Charlotte and the adjoining missions. They were poor people, but virtuous, and full of zeal for religion. They all contributed according to their ability."

SNAP holds press conference at Pastoral Center

CHARLOTTE — Three members of SNAP, the Survivors' Network of those Abused by Priests, recently held a press conference on the lawn of the diocesan Pastoral Center.

David Clohessy, SNAP national director, organized the June 11 press conference to announce his group's intentions to deliver a letter to Bishop Peter J. Jugis.

Neither the bishop nor any other diocesan official was made aware of the press conference prior to its taking place. Bishop Jugis was out of town and en route to the U.S. bishops' spring general assembly in Orlando, Fla., June 12-14.

The letter, which was hand-delivered to a diocesan representative, asked Bishop Jugis to visit parishes where alleged or proven child sexual abusers worked and urge anyone who may have experienced sexual abuse crimes to contact law enforcement.

The diocesan policy on sexual misconduct by church personnel requires the contacting of civil authorities whenever a credible allegation of misconduct has been made.

Three independent audits have found the Diocese of Charlotte in full compliance with the U.S. bishops' Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People.

A copy of the diocesan sexual misconduct policy is available online at www.charlottediocese.org.

The Eucharistic Congress: The Eucharist helps us proclaim Christ

In a little more than three months from now, we will celebrate our diocesan Eucharistic Congress.

The Eucharistic Congress is an opportunity for the entire diocese to come together each year to celebrate our faith and our love for the Eucharistic Lord. The Eucharist brings us together as one body in Christ. It is the source and the summit of our Christian life, as well as the heart of our Christian life.

Our first Eucharistic Congress was held in 2005 to celebrate the Year of the Eucharist. Since then, we have come together in joy each year to celebrate a Eucharistic Congress.

The Eucharistic Congress to be held in Charlotte this fall — on Friday, Oct. 3 and Saturday, Oct. 4 — is our fourth annual congress. Everyone is invited to attend!

I hope you have already reserved these dates on your calendar, and that you are planning to be present for this celebration of faith.

The theme for the congress

This year's congress occurs during the special holy year announced by Pope Benedict XVI to honor the 2,000th anniversary of the birth of St. Paul. The theme for the Eucharistic Congress is taken from St. Paul's Letter to the Colossians (1:28): "It is Christ Whom We Proclaim."

St. Paul's sole passion was to proclaim Christ. In our Eucharistic Congress, it is Christ whom we proclaim in our eucharistic procession through the streets of Charlotte, in our holy hour of exposition of the Blessed Sacrament, in the celebration of the Mass, in the talks by our speakers and in our sacred music concert.

The entire Eucharistic Congress from beginning to end is a proclamation of Christ. The theme we have chosen, therefore, not only honors St. Paul and his apostolic mission, but also appropriately expresses the spirit of the Eucharistic Congress — to proclaim Christ.

The Eucharist helps us proclaim Christ

How? In his apostolic exhortation, "Sacramentum Caritatis," Pope Benedict wrote that the Eucharist is not only a mystery to be believed and celebrated, but also a mystery to be lived and proclaimed in our daily lives (nn. 70-93).

The Eucharist transforms us. We are changed more and more into the image and likeness of Christ by our participation in the eucharistic celebration, and especially by receiving holy Communion.

Through our participation in the Mass, the life of Christ matures in us, so that our entire life becomes a proclamation of Christ.

The Holy Father wrote of how the

From the Bishop

BISHOP
PETER J. JUGIS
BISHOP OF CHARLOTTE

Eucharist transforms us to become a living proclamation of Christ and his love: "By sharing in the sacrifice of the Cross, the Christian partakes of Christ's self-giving love and is equipped and committed to live this same charity in all his thoughts and deeds" (n. 82).

"The love that we celebrate in the sacrament is not something we can keep to ourselves. By its very nature it demands to be shared with all. What the world needs is God's love; it needs to encounter Christ and to believe in him .... We too must be able to tell our brothers and sisters with conviction: 'That which we have seen and heard we proclaim also to you, so that you may have fellowship with us'" (1 Jn 1: 3).

"Truly, nothing is more beautiful than to know Christ and to make him known to others" (n. 84).

Christ, whose life is constantly nourished in us by the Eucharist, is proclaimed and made known to others by our Christian love.

Cardinal Christian Tumi of Cameroon spoke at the recent International Eucharistic Congress in Quebec about the radical love that the Eucharist makes us capable of living.

The cardinal reminded us that the Eucharist must lead us to a greater love for our brothers and sisters, to give our lives along with all the risks that that entails.

In this way, the Eucharist is terribly dangerous: to have a passion for love is always dangerous. The eucharistic man is a dangerous man, burning with the fire of the Spirit, whose only concern is to spread the fire.

He is a man of daring and confrontation, a man of radicalism and the absolute. There is no question of compromise. He must commit himself to act for God and for man.

Many ways to proclaim Christ

Christ, whose presence is nourished in us through the Eucharist, can be made present to others in many different ways through our Christian living.

Pope Benedict wrote that "the first and fundamental mission that we receive from the sacred mysteries we celebrate is that of bearing witness by our lives ....

Perseverance: The will to bear discomfort

God becomes our strength, joy in a hidden but powerful way

A woman from Western Canada wrote to me about hitting bottom, feeling overwhelmed with life's burdens.

Her demanding husband was becoming more and more abusive and her children more and more disrespectful.

She lost her joy and didn't know how to cope. But as weary as she was, she somehow managed to persevere.

People like her are among the greatest saints, and they don't even know it.

There are times when we are at our lowest, and yet we have the stamina to carry on. It isn't easy, but by the grace of God it is possible.

The will to bear discomfort is at the basis of sound mental health. It's called perseverance, and it stems from the power of God — and the joy of God.

It's all very mysterious, I admit, but then the world of the supernatural is always baffling.

Blessed Mother Teresa of Calcutta would have understood this woman's problem.

According to recent revelations, Mother Teresa managed to keep on caring for the poorest of the poor in spite of her emotional emptiness. She fought through the darkness, trusting in God's strength. How did she do this?

I am convinced she asked the Lord to be her strength and her joy. She asked the Lord living in her to do for her what she was not able to do for herself.

She learned to live by faith, not by feelings.

As a result, her life never stopped producing good fruit. By depending on God's power and not her own, she suffered through the drudgery.

Once when Mother Teresa was seriously ill, she wrote the following: "Joy is prayer, joy is strength. Joy is love.

"Joy is a net of love by which you can catch souls. God loves a cheerful giver. One gives most who gives joy.

"The best way to show gratitude to God and people is to accept everything with joy. Never let anything so fill you

We become witnesses when, through our actions, words and way of being, another makes himself present" (n. 85).

It is Christ the Lord who makes himself present through our daily witness. St. Anthony of Padua wrote of the diverse ways of proclaiming Christ by living the Christian virtues:

"The man who is filled with the Holy Spirit speaks in different languages. These different languages are different ways of witnessing to Christ, such as humility, poverty, patience and obedience; we speak in those languages when we reveal in ourselves these virtues to others.

"Actions speak louder than words; with sorrow as to make you forget the joy of the risen Christ. I tell this to my sisters, and I tell this to you."

What an amazing insight for someone so caught up in emotional emptiness! Obviously she willed herself to be joyful in spite of her feelings.

Joy is not in the feelings; it resides just beneath the surface.

The famous author C.S. Lewis was a strong defender of the faith. However, it may come as a surprise to learn that Clive Staples Lewis was, for most of his early life, a skeptic. He said it was God's grace that brought him from non-belief to Christianity.

Lewis always admired how God's love manifested itself in the lives of holy people.

He saw them risking everything to relieve the world's suffering by caring for plague victims, defending the rights of children, running soup kitchens and caring for the homeless.

Lewis saw all these activities as God's power issuing forth from their lives.

In troubled times we can still keep on keeping on. In spite of injustices, trials and sorrows, we can try to turn the other cheek and return good for evil.

The Lord becomes our strength and our joy in a hidden but powerful way.

Pray for the grace to be a saint and never be discouraged. The Lord is with you.

Pray, "Lord, I beg you to be my strength and joy, protect me from the folly of believing that I can do it all on my own."

let your words teach and your action speak" (Sermon I, 226).

For us, everything we do is to be proclamation of Christ.

To prepare for the Eucharistic Congress

We can prepare for the Eucharistic Congress by opening our hearts to Christ and by asking him to change us to become more like him.

By our words and our action and by living Christ's love and the virtues, may we proclaim Christ to our brothers and sisters, so that they also may come to a greater love for the Lord.

Saints in cyberspace

New technology and religion combine online

When I first heard the term "blog tour," I felt like a grandma wondering what the world the kids of today were up to.

I was confused about how a person could squeeze into a computer and then, in the cyber highway, find all of these "blog" destinations, where the author could pop out (of the computer) and start talking to all the readers of that blog.

It took me a while to revise my thinking on the technology of book tours that could actually be done online. No more wasted hours in an airport waiting for a delayed connecting flight.

Your little fingers do all the walking, and voila! You have visited several different markets (readers) in no time at all. But I had an even harder time applying this knowledge to the Catholic book industry. Let's face it, we aren't the most forward-thinking bunch out there.

We religious folk like tradition, and tradition isn't typically fond of, well, change, and therefore hates technology. Right?

Wrong! Jesuit Father James Martin, Tim Russert of the Catholic publishing world — because he's the keynote speaker at most major conferences — is on TV almost as much as Katie Couric.

He appears in print every time I pick up a newspaper or magazine. Just recently he finished a blog tour for his bestselling book, "My Life with the Saints."

He didn't have to squeeze into a computer in order to find the blogs. He merely "visited," or wrote, for a series of Catholic blogs, one per day for one week. He even promised to "visit" (that means "write") me at my Beliefnet blog, "Beyond Blue."

I like what Father Jim says about this new way of spreading the good news, because sometimes I get so caught up in the language of technology for my blog — making sure I score a certain number of page-views (hits) — that I forget my mission: to be an instrument of God.

Says Father Jim: "Saints have long used creative ways to evangelize. From the earliest days of Christianity, the saints understood it was important to use any means possible to tell people about Jesus Christ."

"St. Paul, for example, travels by land and by sea, writes long letters and does whatever it takes to bring the word — or rather the Word — to a world that had never heard of Jesus."

Father Jim goes on to explain the ways saints are now finding their way into cyberspace. For example, an article I had written for Beliefnet.com is on how I owe my life to my patron saint, St. Therese of Lisieux.

I received roses or a visible sign at every critical point in my life; this is the first item you see when you Google the words "shower of roses."

The second item is a blog named "Shower of Roses," written by a woman named Jessica, devoted entirely to the Little Flower. Google the term "saints" and you get over 75 million entries!

"Given the history of Christianity," says Father Jim, "the notion of a 'blog tour' to talk about the saints isn't so surprising. And I'll bet that if St. Paul were still around, rather than visiting Ephesus and Corinth, even he might be tempted to send them an e-mail or two!"

separating marriage from procreation. This will have ill consequence.

As a defender of life in its natural form, the Catholic Church understands that even the benign could mask a diabolical push for artificial wombs and the genetic manipulation of intelligence — a push that will no doubt grow now to accommodate even the minimal same-sex desire for simulating natural childbirth claimed to be of interest for the 20 percent to 30 percent of same-sex couples.

When carefully assessed, the acquisition of unnatural reproductive means often advances the interests of the very affluent through a libertarian exercise that would destroy all hope of democratic equality.

In a depopulating world, the claim that there is a universal right to marry regardless of the genders of those involved becomes a frightening ally of a claimed universal right to genetically engineered children.

Yes, endorse claims of created equality when the distinctions of the past have been shown to lack reason. But do not pretend to make equal that which is not (procreative and nonprocreative relationships) or find a universal right to contradict human nature itself.

As contraception opened the door for abortion, same-sex marriage invites genetic manipulation that not only allows homosexuals to pretend to be parents, but also lends legitimacy to the fashioning of a new superman by genetic manipulation.

Pope says values must focus on Jesus to avoid chaos, anarchy

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — If values such as tolerance, freedom and dialogue do not have Jesus as their point of reference, they lose their true meaning and can lead to chaos, anarchy and empty chatter, Pope Benedict XVI said.

It is from Jesus that "we learn the truth about ourselves" and how to understand all the values that are upheld rightfully in the world, he said during his June 25 general audience in St. Peter's Square.

"Tolerance that doesn't know how to distinguish between good and evil would become chaotic and self-destructive" while absolute freedom that ignores the rights of others "becomes anarchy and destroys authority," he said.

"Dialogue that no longer knows what it should talk about becomes empty chatter" unless it and all the other great values in the world have a point of reference in the truth which is Christ — "the one absolute value, to whom all worldly values are directed," he said.

The pope's remarks were part of his catechesis highlighting the life and teachings of St. Maximus of Constantinople, a monk and doctor of the church who lived in the sixth and seventh centuries.

The pope said this Palestinian-born saint was "a heroic defender" of the church's teaching in the true humanity of Christ during a time of bitter controversy over Christ's humanity and divinity.

But the saint knew the negation of Christ's human will "destroys the mystery of salvation," the pope said.

He said St. Maximus understood that the salvation of humanity depends on Christ becoming completely and fully human, which includes the freedom to choose to cooperate with divine will.

"Adam — and this Adam includes us — thought that saying 'no' would be the greatest freedom; only he who can say 'no' would be truly free," the pope said. Adam believed saying "no" to God would mean he would finally be free to be himself and could realize his full potential, the pope said.

This temptation in human nature was present even in Jesus but he overcame it, said Pope Benedict.

Jesus saw it was not by denying God's will, but by saying "yes" to God's plan that brought about "the greatest freedom," the pope said.

People become their true selves only when they unite with the will of the divine, he said.

"Only by leaving ourselves behind, by being outside ourselves and in God do we find ourselves and our totality and completeness," he said.

American bishops and the danger of same-sex marriage

New laws may lead to depopulation, genetic manipulation

American bishops, led by New York's Cardinal Edward Egan, have drawn an important distinction in the wake of the prudent and likely unauthorized effort by New York Gov. David Paterson to laterally promote so-called same-sex marriage by piggybacking on California.

Specifically, the bishops remind states to avoid invidious discrimination (e.g., discrimination against homosexuals in health designations, property ownership) without affirming a practice (same-sex marriage) which denies God's creative plan. The first rectifies man's prejudice; the second has the implied temerity oftribing bias to God himself.

Gay and lesbian people are within humanity acknowledged to be created equal in the Declaration of Independence, but this does not deprive the community through law of making necessary and reasoned distinction for its survival.

While some public officials like Gov. Paterson carelessly deploy their same-sex biological agenda, the Catholic prelates of New York more prudently urged "the [to] review whatever benefits or privileges that it has through the years conferred on married couples and, in cases where true discrimination may be at play, fashion legislative remedies."

Oddly, the California Supreme Court wrote a 170-plus page opinion without discussing among other things single-gender effects on childrearing or the innumerable difficulties of commodating religious freedom that arise from the legal acceptance of same-sex marriage.

The proponents of same-sex marriage insist that inventing gay and lesbian marriage harms no one. This, however, overlooks the national and global decline in fertility, which threatens the economies of Europe and the U.S.

To say that the availability of same-sex marriage is not the principal cause of this decline in terms of absolute numbers is a fair point, but giving state approval to nonprocreative marriage cannot logically be denied as a contributing cause to the decline of families with natural children.

Several European countries, most notably France, have responded to delayed traditional marriage and dramatically reduced fertility with generous child subsidies and legal arrangements making it far easier for women to reconcile work and family.

Our French brothers and sisters, who Americans in the recent past have parodied, turn out to be far more sensitive to the importance of families than, say, a glib U.S. law and economics professor who spurned the suggestion that America follow the French example.

It is shortsighted in the extreme for the keepers of supply-and-demand curves to portray traditional, procreative families as "a stodgy bourgeois construct designed to channel the revolutionary energy of sexuality into diaper changing and carpooling."

Catholic teaching responds differently. Same-sex marriage rests upon Campers hone their skills during a scrimmage at the Montagnard soccer camp at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte June 13. Teen parishioners Jordan Archer, Will O'Brien and Robey Spratt started the camp three years ago in an effort to reach out to the Montagnard community at the cathedral.

Teens build camaraderie through Montagnard soccer camp

Lessons, friendships go beyond the field

CHARLOTTE — The idea started about four years ago after their team won the state championship for Charlotte Junior Soccer.

With the end of the soccer season, the three 12-year-old boys were looking for an excuse to hang out off the field. Each would be attending a different school in the fall and they needed something that would keep them connected.

Jordan Archer, Will O'Brien and Robey Spratt, parishioners at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte, came up with an idea that would combine their love for soccer with their Catholic faith.

The next summer they started a free soccer camp for Montagnard children at the cathedral.

Montagnards are refugees from the central highlands of Vietnam, many of whom fought alongside U.S. Special Forces during the Vietnam War.

Known for their anti-communist resistance, Montagnards continue to be persecuted for their Christian faith in Vietnam. Since 1975 several thousand Montagnards have resettled in Charlotte, many through Catholic Social Services' Refugee Resettlement Office.

"We always saw them at church, but there was never really any interaction," said Robey. "We wanted to connect our church as well as give them (the Montagnard children) a good (summer) activity."

"Now, when we see them at church, they know who we are," he added.

The success of the camp has been overwhelming.

"The first year we thought it would fail," said Jordan, who was in charge of sign-ups.

Each boy took on a different role in preparing for the camp.

Jordan handled sign-ups and recruitment, Will was in charge of donations, and Robey made arrangements for food and refreshments.

The boys ran announcements in the church bulletin and talked with parishioners after the weekend Masses.

The first year, about 15 children showed up on the first day of camp. Word spread fast and by the second day the attendance had doubled.

One of the things they have learned from the camp is that, "all kids are the same," said Will.

"They all want to have fun," he said.

This year more than 60 campers ages 3-16 came out for the third annual installment of the camp.

Each camper was given a jersey, shorts, shin-guards, soccer socks, cleats and a drawstring athletic bag.

The boys acquired the uniforms and equipment through the Passback Program. The program is a joint effort between the U.S. Soccer Foundation, Eurosport and Major League Soccer to help meet the soccer uniform and equipment needs of all communities, regardless of income, gender or location.

The program helps provide use apparel and equipment to athletes who can't afford to purchase their own.

"It's truly heartwarming," said Debbie O'Brien, Will's mother.

She talked about the leadership roles the boys, now 16, have taken on in running the camp.

"They're all a little shy," she said. But when they get out there, "somebody has to step up to the plate."

Each of the boys is the eldest of four children. Over the past few years, they have encouraged their younger siblings to help out at the camp.

In terms of keeping the camp going, the boys said they expect their siblings to carry on the tradition and they plan to come back and help, even after they go away to college.

"It will definitely be passed on," said Robey. "And hopefully carried out for a long time."

BY DAVID HAINS
COMMUNICATIONS DIRECTOR

RALEIGH — The two bishops of North Carolina have created an organization to give the state's Catholics a greater voice in the political process.

Bishops Peter J. Jugis of Charlotte and Michael F. Burbidge of Raleigh made the announcement during a press conference in front of the State Legislative Building in Raleigh July 2.

The organization, Catholic Voice NC, consists mainly of a Web site, www.catholicvoiceenc.org, that will facilitate contact between legislators and interested Catholics who register at the site.

SALISBURY — It was the perfect combination of old and new — a celebration marking the historical 125th anniversary of Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury, followed by the groundbreaking ceremony at the construction site of the new church.

On June 29, the feast of the solemnity of Sts. Peter and Paul, Bishop Peter J. Jugis, along with Father John Putnam, pastor of Sacred Heart Church; priests of the diocese; and parishioners celebrated the conclusion of the 125th anniversary of Sacred Heart Church with a Mass in the Omwake-Dearborn Chapel of Catawba College.

SEAFARING SPIRIT

Father Sinclair Oubre, pastor of St. John the Evangelist Church in Port Arthur, Texas, and head of the Apostleship of the Sea for the Diocese of Beaumont, Texas, presides over a burial at sea in this undated photo.

Pastor, labor advocate, seafarer, biker: Texas priest does it all

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Father Sinclair Oubre, like many priests, has multiple responsibilities.

They include being pastor of a parish and administrator of a mission in the Diocese of Beaumont, Texas; running the Apostleship of the Sea office for the diocese and serving on the apostleship's national board; being Web site administrator of the Catholic Labor Network and sponsoring meetings in Washington in conjunction with the annual Catholic Social Ministry Gathering; and being on the board of directors of Interfaith Worker Justice.

Now, what could a man like that do that would combine all of those interests and avocations?

Would you believe working one month every year as a seafarer — using his accumulated vacation time from priestly ministry to do so?

Father Oubre, 50, first started working on boats as a seminary student during the summer to help pay for tuition. Now he does it to keep active his membership in the International Seafarers' Union, and as a change of pace from parish life.

But on board Father Oubre isn't totally away from the priesthood.

"I'll have my Mass kit with me and I say Mass in my room and sometimes they (other seafarers) join me," said Father Oubre.

Because the other seafarers on the ship know he's a priest, they'll come to him with their troubles, such as the difficulty they are facing in becoming a Catholic or getting married in the church — with their crew schedule, they don't have shore leave to attend classes required by the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults program or the marriage preparation classes they need.

"Usually I try to explain to them what they need to do," Father Oubre said.

The priest has other interests, among them cigars, baseball and Lionel trains. He also likes riding Harley-Davidson motorcycles.

At sea, Father Oubre said, his day is dictated by the hours of the watch — "12 to 4, 4 to 8, 8 to 12. You stand (for) two four-hour watches every day. You do the watches and then usually you work four hours of overtime a day. So basically you're doing 12 hours of work a day," he said.

Father Oubre is usually sailing on a U.S.-flagged tanker carrying refined petroleum products to Florida, Louisiana or up the East Coast. His latest seafarer stretch was in January — he sailed to relieve a crew that was assisting a tanker 20 miles off of Puerto Rico.

"I've been in 15-foot seas," Father Oubre said. "We were beat up pretty bad in January. There was a cold front in January that spawned a number of destructive tornadoes."

Father Oubre is an able-bodied seaman, known as AB.

"In the old days, the 'AB' guys were the guys who were able to go up into the mast," he said, which implied that one had the skill to handle heights and "a lot of other stuff."

"I'm getting a little old to do this stuff," he said with a laugh. He hopes to join another crew in November.

Bishop apologizes for 'tragedy' of abortion aided by Charities' staff

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Bishop Francis X. DiLorenzo of Richmond, Va., expressed his "profound apology for the loss of the life of one of the most vulnerable among us" after employees of a Catholic Charities office in his diocese helped a refugee minor obtain an abortion last January.

"I apologize for the profound embarrassment this has caused the Catholic Diocese of Richmond, and Catholics throughout the United States," Bishop DiLorenzo said June 30.

Calling the abortion a "monumental tragedy," the bishop said, "I join my sadness to yours at the loss of the life of an unborn child whose teenage mother was in the foster care of Commonwealth Catholic Charities."

Bishop DiLorenzo was notified about the abortion the day before it occurred and "was very explicit in saying, 'I forbid this to happen,'" according to a July 1 statement by Joanne D. Natrass, executive director of Commonwealth Catholic Charities.

However, "based on erroneous and incorrect information provided to Natrass, the bishop was told it could not be stopped," the statement said.

News of the Jan. 18 abortion and an exchange of letters from federal and church officials in April surfaced in mid-June.

The abortion already has led to the firing of four employees of Commonwealth Catholic Charities who were involved in facilitating the abortion or helping the minor obtain a contraceptive device. An employee of the U.S. bishops' Migration and Refugee Services responsible for supervising them also was suspended.

But the case also could involve violations of federal law, which prohibits the use of tax money to fund abortions, and Virginia law, which requires parental consent before a minor's abortion. One of the Catholic Charities workers signed to give consent for the minor, whose parents could not be located.

Pope asks Catholics to pray for WYD; Vatican announces indulgences

CASTEL GANDOLFO, Italy (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI asked Catholics around the world to pray for the young people who will gather with him in Sydney, Australia, for the celebration of World Youth Day.

To help encourage the prayers of all, the Vatican announced July 5 that the pope had authorized a special indulgence for anyone who, "with a contrite spirit," raises a "prayer to God, the Holy Spirit, so that young people are drawn to charity and given the strength to proclaim the Gospel with their life," a Vatican decree said.

Pope Benedict spoke about his July 12-21 trip to Australia at his summer villa south of Rome for the July 6 recitation of the Angelus. World Youth Day runs July 15-20 in Sydney.

Focusing on prayers for a new outpouring of the Holy Spirit on Catholic youths around the world, the Sydney celebration can be "a renewed Pentecost," the pope said.

The pope asked everyone to join him in praying that the Spirit would fill the hearts of young Catholics with "interior light, love for God and their brothers and sisters, (and with) courageous initiatives" to bring Jesus to every land and every sphere of life.

The July 5 decree about indulgences connected to World Youth Day included the offer of a plenary, or full, indulgence to all the young people who will gather with the pope in Sydney.

An indulgence is a remission of the temporal punishment a person is due for sins that have been forgiven. The conditions necessary for receiving a plenary indulgence include having recently gone to confession, receiving the Eucharist and offering prayers for the intentions of the pope.

Vatican regrets Church of England's move toward women bishops

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican has expressed its disappointment with a July 7 decision by the Church of England, the mother church of the Anglican Communion, to move ahead with plans to allow the ordination of women bishops.

"We have learned with disappointment of the news of the vote by the Church of England that opens the way to the introduction of legislation that leads to the ordination of women bishops," said a July 8 statement from the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity.

"Such a decision means a break from the apostolic tradition maintained by all the churches of the first millennium and is, therefore, a further obstacle for reconciliation between the Catholic Church and the Church of England," said the statement.

The 428 bishops, clergy and laypeople who make up the General Synod of the Church of England spent more than six hours July 7 debating what, if any, kinds of accommodation would be made to allow Anglicans who object to women bishops to continue to be part of the church.

The synod voted to reject all special forms of accommodation and instead to draft a "national code of practice," which could include suggesting a woman bishop delegate her care for objectors to a "complementary bishop" who would be male.

The July 7 vote was seen as a clear signal that the majority of the members of the Church of England support ordaining women bishops and that the church intends to do so.

Before that vote, Cardinal Walter Kasper, the Vatican's chief ecumenist, had told top members of the Church of England that ordaining women bishops would mean that the goal of restoring full communion between Catholics and Anglicans "would realistically no longer exist" because it could not exist "without full communion in the episcopal office."

He had said a further consequence of a resolution in favor of women bishops would be that the Catholic Church would inevitably continue to refuse to recognize the validity of Anglican orders.

On several occasions, Pope Benedict XVI and Cardinal Kasper have expressed their hopes that the Anglican Communion can remain united. But they have said unity must be based on fidelity to the Scriptures and tradition, including moral issues.

DIOCESAN REQUIREMENTS FOR REPORTING MINISTRY-RELATED SEXUAL ABUSE OF A MINOR

1. Any individual having actual knowledge of or reasonable cause to suspect an incident of ministry-related sexual abuse is to immediately report the incident to the Chancery.
2. The Chancery will then report the incident to the proper civil authorities. The individual reporting the incident to the Chancery will be notified of the particulars regarding the Chancery's filing of the incident with civil authorities.
3. This reporting requirement is not intended to supersede the right of an individual to make a report to civil authority, but is to ensure proper, complete and timely reporting. Should an individual choose to make a report to civil authority, a report is still to be made to the Chancery.

Grants distributed to local organizations

Event celebrates anti-poverty efforts in North Carolina

CANDLER — More than 70 people representing 19 organizations gathered recently to receive local check grants from the Diocese of Charlotte's Catholic Campaign for Human Development (CCHD) program.

The grants were presented during a luncheon at St. Joan of Arc Church in Candler May 22.

The event also offered an opportunity for the recipients to network with other organizations working to address poverty in western North Carolina.

The organizations represented the wide-ranging intent of CCHD funding — to support community-based solutions to poverty.

CCHD is the domestic anti-poverty, social justice program of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, funding community development projects around the country.

Mary Jane Bruton, diocesan CCHD director, greeted the local grantees, who traveled to the luncheon from locations across the diocese.

Bruton thanked "first and foremost" the Catholics of the Diocese of Charlotte, whose generosity in the annual CCHD collection made possible the 2008 local grant monies of more than $45,000.

Ralph McCloud, CCHD national director, also spoke during the event.

He applauded the efforts of the organizations present and urged them to continue to involve the poor in developing resources to address the challenges of daily living and strategies to improve their options for the future.

Representatives of two grant recipients also took to the podium.

Deni Graves, executive director of the Hurlbert-Johnson Friendship House in Murphy, described her organization's work to provide temporary housing and resources to homeless people to help them obtain long-term housing and employment.

Kevin Drexel, board member with the Burnsville Land Community, a nonprofit that represents residents of a manufactured housing park, thanked CCHD for its funding of this innovative rural housing program.

"This project, the first of its kind in North Carolina, addresses a need at a time when traditional affordable housing is not available to this community," he said.

"CCHD has provided critical financial support at this early stage," said Drexel.

"You are the people at the grassroots who know the problems associated with poverty and you have demonstrated your ability to devise means of bringing people in your communities together creatively to achieve social justice," he said.

"We need thousands more like you and this is what CCHD wishes to encourage," he added.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis (center) and Father John Putnam, pastor of Sacred Heart Church, take part in a ceremonial groundbreaking at the construction site of the new Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury June 29. Also participating (from left) are Wendy Roueche-McCullough, chairman of the parish pastoral council; Mercy Sister Mary Robert Williams, parochial associate; Dominican Sister Anastasia Pagullayan, principal of Sacred Heart School; and Father Jean Pierre Swamunu Lhoposo, parochial vicar.

Sacred Heart Church celebrates 125 years

Later that day, in a fitting tribute to the two saints known as the founders of the Catholic Church, a commencement ceremony took place to mark the laying of a literal foundation — the one for the building of the new Sacred Heart Church and school.

"Celebrating 125 years here in Salisbury is a true milestone for our parish because it reminds us that in this world that is forever changing, the eternal truths of Christ and his church remain steadfast," said Father Putnam.

The first Sacred Heart Church was built in 1882, long before the Diocese of Charlotte was established in 1972, and dedicated by Bishop Henry Northrup of Charleston, S.C.

A few Catholic families had resided in the area since the 1830s, and it was through their efforts that the founding of the church was brought to fruition.

"We celebrate the sacrifices that were made by those first Catholics back in the 19th century," said Father Putnam.

The legacy of those founding families has been carried on over the years and many of their ancestors are parishioners to this day.

"We celebrate all of the wonderful accomplishments and contributions that our parishioners have made both in this parish and in this community over the years," said Father Putnam.

In 1910, Sisters of Mercy from Belmont opened a private convent and school near Sacred Heart Church. It became a parish institution in the early 1940s. Today approximately 220 students are enrolled in the kindergarten-through-eighth-grade Sacred Heart School.

"It shows the great progress that has been made through the church," said Mercy Sister Clara Virginia Kelly, who grew up attending both the parish and Sacred Heart School.

Sister Kelly is one of seven men and women from the parish to have answered the call to the priesthood or religious life.

"We have so much to be thankful for because of the people of the church," she said.

"We're a big family," said Gail Mintz, lifelong parishioner and business manager at Sacred Heart School.

"I've received every single one of my sacraments in this church," she said. "It has been an extremely important part of my life."

Fellow lifelong parishioner Michele Moore Vaeth agreed. "I have loved this little church," she said. "It will be hard to leave this spot."

"But with change, good things come," she added.

The new church and school will be built on 104 acres of land.

"I think it is an absolutely wonderful opportunity for the church," said Mintz who is looking forward to having the extra space for the students to play.

"For the school we see grass," she said. "All we have now is concrete."

"It's beautiful rolling pasture land," said Vaeth. "You feel like you are out there in God's country because it is so peaceful and beautiful."

The land was acquired through a trade in 2007. A cemetery to include 660 plots has already been established and was blessed by Bishop Jugis Sept. 1, 2007.

The building project is expected to be completed in 12-13 months, according to Mike Vaeth, chairman of the building committee. The project is estimated to cost $8.9 million excluding the land, which is already paid for.

"The church is overcrowded," said Vaeth. With the new property, there will be a "lot of room for the parishioners to move around," he added.

The new church will seat approximately 800 people — four times as many as the old church.

"The parish exists to further Jesus' mission of salvation," said Bishop Jugis. "Jesus came for the salvation of all humanity. Sacred Heart Parish plays an important role in that universal mission."

"You are meant to be a haven for society, providing the haven of Christ's presence to this community," he told parishioners.

In terms of what will be next for Sacred Heart Church, Father Putnam said, "We celebrate our hopes for a bright future dedicated to proclaiming the Gospel message and the truths of Christ and his church for many years to come."

Join Father Timothy Reid, pastor of St. Ann Church in Charlotte, and others for a Pilgrimage to Saint Anne-de-Beaupre Shrine near Quebec City in Canada

October 8 - 13th

The year 2008 marks the 350th anniversary of the first chapel erected on the site of the Saint Anne-de-Beaupre Shrine, one of the oldest pilgrimage sites in North America.

This special pilgrimage will leave Charlotte Wednesday, October 8, and fly to Montreal where the first two days will be spent touring that fascinating city and its beautiful churches, including the Oratory of St. Joseph. The group will then travel to Quebec City for the special weekend celebrations honoring the 350th anniversary of the historical chapel. On October 13, the group will return to Montreal and fly back to Charlotte.

The cost is $2,030 per person (double occupancy) and includes roundtrip airfare from Charlotte, hotels and hotel taxes, breakfasts, dinners, land transportation, all transfers and baggage handling at hotels.

Registration deadline is: FRIDAY, AUGUST 1st.

Check our web page at www.stannsparish.org/announcements.html for the application or call the St. Ann Church office at 704-523-4641 for more information.

(This is a privately-organized tour, not sponsored by the Diocese of Charlotte.)

Faith in the family

Mission of the church begins at home, says theology expert

BY KATIE MOORE
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — Families of all shapes, sizes and backgrounds recently gathered to affirm the idea that the foundations of faith must be built in the home.

The Re-evangelization of the Domestic Church Conference was held in the parish activity center of St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte June 13-14.

"The home is a church," said Rachida Faille, parishioner of St. Vincent de Paul Church and coordinator of the event. "That is where the church comes from."

The conference began on Friday with an introduction by Father Mark Lawlor, pastor of St. Vincent de Paul Church, and included talks on topics such as "The Family Table as Shrine and Sanctuary" and "God's Vision of the Family: The Nature of Man and Woman."

It continued on Saturday with Mass and talks on "The Family, Part of God's Plan of Salvation" and "Developing a Catholic Culture in the Domestic Church."

The conference featured keynote speaker Dr. Joseph Atkinson, associate professor of Sacred Scripture at the John Paul II Institute at The Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C., and a leading expert in theology of the domestic church.

A children's mission was held simultaneously, providing catecheses for children who attended the event with their parents.

"My goal was to help the people of St. Vincent de Paul Church understand clearly what the biblical vision of marriage and family was," said Atkinson.

"There are so many forces which today seek to distort and even destroy the family, and we need to hear God's truth so we can be set free from all the false notions that fill our society," he said.

A reoccurring theme throughout the conference was the idea that parents must be responsible for teaching the faith to their children.

The idea that evangelization must

"There are so many forces which today seek to distort and even destroy the family ...."

— Joseph Atkinson

begin within the family is rooted in the concept of the "domestic church."

"The domestic church is a term that refers to the baptized family," said Atkinson. "It means that the family that is baptized into Christ shares in both the nature and the mission of the church."

"The goal would be for families to prioritize the spiritual life with the many competing ideas in society," said Father Lawlor.

It is the responsibility of "parents to be very deliberate," he said. Leading, "not by force or pressure," but by "good example and by being steadfast."

Another goal of the conference was for families of different cultures and backgrounds to come together on a Christian level.

A unique effort was made to include Latino members of the parish through the use of a translator and special technology.

"St. Vincent's is very heavily populated with Latinos, whose culture comes to us with a strong family community," said Faille. "I felt that we could not let that fall to the wayside."

"This was the first time that my slides and talks were translated," said Atkinson. "The Latino community greatly participated in this event and was very involved."

"Because everything was translated, they could understand, participate and contribute," he said. "It was a model for how churches can help to include all parishioners."

All smiles for athletes and volunteers at Camp SOAR

turned away from regular summer camps because they required too much assistance.

He changed all that when he started Camp SOAR, a Special Olympics Athletic Retreat for people with disabilities.

Bowler has been involved with the Special Olympics in Charlotte for the past 30 years. He noticed that there were not many activities available to special athletes during the summer months.

"I kept thinking about it and praying about it," he said.

He came up with the idea for the camp and approached the director of the Sandra and Leon Levine Jewish Community Center (JCC) about using the facility.

"I told him, 'I don't have any money, just a lot of dreams,'" said Bowler.

He was granted use of the facility and its staff. This year the camp was held June 16-20.

It was free and open to all special needs individuals ages 10 and up. Overall, nearly 300 athletes participated.

The first two days of the camp were devoted to the older athletes, ages 25 and up, while the rest of the week was for the younger set. On Friday, all the athletes came out for the conclusion of the camp featuring a pizza party, dancing, entertainment and health screenings.

The goal is to provide a full summer camp experience.

The mornings are devoted to sports including bocce, tennis, soccer, basketball, floor hockey and swimming. After lunch there is bingo, arts and crafts and bowling, the only off-campus activity. Everything else takes place on the 54-acre campus of the JCC.

A unique aspect of the camp is its buddy system. Each athlete is paired with a volunteer, ensuring all athletes are provided with one-on-one attention.

This year there were more than 200 volunteers, 70 of whom are students at Charlotte Catholic High School.

"All our volunteers are very special," said Stern. "They are the heart and soul of the camp."

"We really feel that Charlotte Catholic is an integral part of this thing," said Al Tinson, media relations volunteer for Special Olympics Mecklenburg County and parishioner of St. John Neumann Church in Charlotte. "We could not do this at the level that we do without these kids."

Bowler said he's impressed by the dedication of the student volunteers.

"I think it shows that they are really being taught the principles and values of life," he said.

In the end, "they get more out of it than the campers," he added.

"The first year I was a little nervous," said Charlotte Catholic rising senior Sara Poffenbarger, a parishioner of St. Gabriel Church. "I didn't know what to expect."

Now in her third year as a volunteer Poffenbarger said, "I come home everyday a little bit tired, but always excited for the next day."

Another unique aspect of Camp SOAR is how its benefits carry over into other aspects of the participants' lives.

For the athletes, it "builds self-esteem and self-confidence," said Bowler.

"When they come back year after year, you know it's making an impact on their lives," he said.

And for the volunteers, "It makes them better people," said Bowler.

"The teenage volunteers are really special because they take the experience with them to their college years and future lives," said Stern.

"I've learned to be grateful for what I have and not take the little things that I can do for granted," said Charlotte Catholic rising senior Hannah Roy, a fifth-year volunteer and parishioner of St. Mark Church in Huntersville.

"I've learned that I want to work with people like the campers when I get older," she said.

Many students agreed that the best part of the volunteering at the camp is working with the athletes.

"You can see the difference you're making by bringing a smile to any one of the campers' faces," said Charlotte Catholic rising junior Brandon Shell, a parishioner of St. Peter Church in Charlotte.

Bowler agrees. "I just love to see the smiles," he said. "It brings tears to my eyes."

The Ad Altare Dei ("to the altar of God") emblem is available to Catholic Boy Scouts; the program emphasizes study of the seven sacraments. Pictured are (from left) Matthew Marchese of Troop 234, Jonathan Lomboy of Troop 351, Robert Liljeberg of Troop 351 and Matthew McAnulty of Troop 234.

Locks of love

Anne Vickers, 12, and Bonnie Aberle, 11, hold the locks of their hair they are donating to Locks of Love, a nonprofit organization that provides hairpieces to financially disadvantaged children suffering from long-term medical hair loss from any diagnosis. Anne, a parishioner of St. Dorothy Church in Lincolnnton, and Bonnie, a parishioner of St. Joseph Church in Newton, are pictured in a Hickory hair salon May 13.

They read about the Locks for Love program in The Catholic News & Herald and, when one of their classmates was diagnosed with alopecia, a hair-loss condition, they decided to help.

"I sure hope people would donate hair if I had alopecia," said Bonnie. "I'm happy to share this gift that God gave me."

The elusive Catholic voter

A somewhat contradictory statistical look

BY PATRICIA ZAPOR
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — If you could program a computer to design a person according to the statistical portrait of U.S. Catholics depicted in the latest data from two surveys, someone like the fictional "Susan Shea" might emerge as an "average" representation of who makes up the church.

This "average" Catholic may not be affiliated with either party, but leans toward the Democrats, believes abortion should be legal in most cases and supports stricter environmental regulations.

She would prefer diplomacy over military intervention but would just as soon the United States stayed out of international problems.

Her attitudes about government and public affairs are shaped largely by her personal experience and what she learns from the news media, rather than anything she has been taught by the church.

And she pays pretty close attention to what's going on politically, at least some of the time.

"Shea" is pretty happy with her own standard of living and very satisfied with her family life and doesn't worry much about crime or terrorism affecting her personally.

But she's not so pleased with the way things are going in the country. For one thing, she's pretty dissatisfied with the way the U.S. political system works.

She thinks the government should do more to provide health care and help the needy, even if it means more national debt and bigger government.

After exit polling from the 2004 presidential election found that "moral values" stood out as the most important consideration for voters, campaign strategists have focused more than ever on how to appeal to voters of various faiths.

With another close presidential election shaping up, analysts working for both parties will no doubt be parsing any faith-based polling for clues as to how to appeal to Catholic voters.

Two sets of public opinion survey data released over a few days in June complement each other in suggesting what might define the "Catholic voter" this election year.

Reams of information were included in data from the U.S. Religious Landscape Survey by the Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life released June 23. This followed the release a few days earlier of an election year forecast of who will constitute Catholic voters by the Center for Applied Research in the Apostolate at Georgetown University.

The CARA study of 1,007 Catholic voters found 41 percent unaffiliated with either the Democratic Party or Republican Party, with 38 percent who are registered Democrats and 21 percent who are registered Republicans.

In the CARA study:

— Seventy-eight percent said the U.S. should guarantee basic health care for all citizens.

— Fifty-eight percent said a woman should have the right to choose an abortion.

— Forty-one percent said they believe all human life, from conception to natural death, is sacred.

In the Pew study, the largest segment of the Catholics surveyed, 35 percent, said they are most influenced by personal experience in their thinking about government and public affairs.

The next-largest segment was 23 percent who said they're most influenced by the news media, followed by 14 percent who cited their education. Just 9 percent said religious beliefs are their biggest influence.

When it comes to deciding questions of right and wrong, "practical experience and common sense" were cited as the strongest influence by 57 percent, followed by 22 percent who said religious teachings and beliefs are their main influences.

According to Pew's survey of more than 35,000 people nationwide, including more than 8,000 Catholics, the following characteristics define Catholic Americans' views on political issues. Unless otherwise noted, the figures for Catholics mirror those for the population as a whole within 5 percentage points or less.

— Thirty-six percent describe their politics as conservative, 38 percent say they're moderates and 18 percent describe themselves as liberals.

— Sixty percent of Catholics say stricter environmental laws and regulations are worth the cost.

— Sixty-four percent say good diplomacy is the best way to ensure peace, compared to 25 percent who said the best way to ensure peace is through military strength.

— Just over half, 55 percent, said the U.S. should concentrate on domestic problems instead of overseas concerns, compared to 36 percent who said "it's best for the future of the country to be active in world affairs."

— Sixty-three percent said the government should do more to help the needy and 51 percent said they prefer a bigger government with more services.

— Sixteen percent believe abortion should be legal in all cases, and another 32 percent say it should be legal in most cases. Just 18 percent said it should be illegal in all cases; 27 percent said it should be illegal in most cases.

— Seventy-seven percent said they are very satisfied with their family life; another 16 percent are "somewhat satisfied."

— Seventy-seven percent said they are at least somewhat satisfied with their standard of living.

For the Pew data, the statistical margin of error for the sample of 8,054 Catholics has a margin of error of plus or minus 1.5 percentage points.

CARA's data, with parts of it gathered over several years, has a statistical margin of error ranging between plus or minus 2.3 percentage points and plus or minus 3.1 percentage points.

N.C. bishops launch Catholic Voice NC Web site

and caring for the least among us means supporting leaders and policies that promote the common good and protect society's most vulnerable members," said Bishop Jugis to reporters, news cameras and crowd of approximately 50 people.

Bishop Burbidge concurred in stating, "Catholics bring a lot of experience to the political dialogue. We have worked for centuries in education, health care and social services to serve the public and to make our society better."

The bishops invited interested Catholics to visit the Web site and to register. The site contains background information, statements from the bishops and documents from the Vatican and the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops on four issues on which Catholic Voice NC will initially focus — anti-abortion, stem-cell research, immigration and end-of-life issues such as euthanasia.

Catholics and others who register on the Web site will receive newsletters from the two bishops regarding legislation under consideration in Raleigh.

In addition, registered participants will receive occasional e-mail alerts from the bishops asking them to contact legislators about specific legislation.

The Web site will identify the legislators involved and will supply the participants with contact information for each legislator. Participants also will have the ability to send e-mails directly to legislators.

Catholic Voice NC is working with VoterVoice, a Louisiana-based Web company that provides similar database support to statewide Catholic conferences around the country. It provides the services used to match Catholics from throughout a particular state with their respective legislators.

Bishop Jugis pledged to reporters that neither diocese nor VoterVoice will sell, loan or give any of the personal information gathered to any individual or organization.

COURTESY PHOTO

Bishop Peter J. Jugis of Charlotte, along with Bishop Michael F. Burbidge of Raleigh, announces the launch of Catholic Voice NC outside the State Legislative Building in Raleigh July 2.

Also at the press conference Bishop Burbidge announced Catholic Voice NC will conduct a survey of the positions held by legislative candidates and candidates for governor.

The candidates will be asked whether they support or oppose legislation across a wide range of issues, including abortion, immigration, embryonic stem-cell research, same-sex marriage and the death penalty.

Survey results will be published in late September on the Web site, as well as in The Catholic News & Herald and NC Catholics, a publication of the Diocese of Raleigh.

Since the bishops' announcement, the Catholic Voice NC Web site has been "... Caring for the least among us means supporting leaders and policies that promote the common good and protect society's most vulnerable members."

— Bishop Peter J. Jugis

well trafficked, registering an average of approximately 100 new participants per day.

CatholicVoiceNC will seek additional participants through advertising in diocesan media and bulletin inserts.

The N.C. legislature is expected to continue its short session until late July. Three pieces of legislation currently being watched by Catholic Voice NC are a constitutional amendment that would stipulate marriage as the union of one man and one woman only; a "Choose Life" specialty license plate, which raises funds for anti-abortion crisis pregnancy centers; and support for the Senate version of the School Violence Protection Act.

Detailed information about each initiative can be found on the Catholic Voice NC Web site.

After the November general election, the legislature will convene anew in January 2009.

Funding for Catholic Voice NC is shared equally by the two dioceses.

Carmelites honor Father Kavanaugh for life's work as translator

BY PAT MORRISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

TOLEDO, Ohio — Discalced Carmelite Father Kieran Kavanaugh has reached a milestone as a translator of Carmelite spiritual classics.

With this year's publication of the second and final volume of "The Collected Letters of St. Teresa of Avila" by the Washington-based Institute of Carmelite Studies, Father Kavanaugh has now translated all of the works of the Carmelite mystics and spiritual giants St. John of the Cross and St. Teresa of Avila for the contemporary English-speaking world.

To mark the 50 years of Father Kavanaugh's life's work and the completion of the translation project, his Carmelite confreres at the institute contributed essays to a book honoring the priest-translator, titled "A Better Wine: Essays Celebrating Kieran Kavanaugh, OCD."

"A Better Wine" takes its title from the story in John's Gospel of the wedding at Cana, in which, after Jesus changes water into wine, the steward announces to the wedding's host, "You have saved the better wine until now."

According to the book's editor, Discalced Carmelite Father Kevin Culligan, the title is an apt one to celebrate Father Kavanaugh's life and ministry: Eucharist — bread and wine becoming the body and blood of Christ — is transformation without parallel; the contemplative living taught by the Carmelite saints is similarly God's great work of transformation of the human person.

Thus, the Cana image seemed doubly appropriate to celebrate "a Carmelite priest whose ministry for 50 years has been the transformation of our lives in God through love," Father Culligan said in a phone interview.

The nine essays by Carmelite scholars range from St. Teresa's Christology, to a psychological interpretation of a selected chapter of St. John's "Dark Night," and learning how to meditate.

The 353-page volume also includes essays on the Holy Spirit, Mary, St. Therese of Lisieux, St. Teresa's humor, modern concentration camp Carmelite martyrs St. Edith Stein and Father Jacques Bunel, and the contemporary influence of the Carmelite mystical school.

The celebratory volume has been a long-awaited gift for Father Kavanaugh. It was first planned for his 75th birthday, then for his 50th anniversary of ordination to the priesthood.

When "A Better Wine" came off the press last year, the timing was even more significant: The order presented the book just as Father Kavanaugh completed his translation of the last volume of St. Teresa's letters — an accomplishment that effectively marked the close of his lifetime of translating the works of St. John and St. Teresa.

Since 1957 — almost his entire priestly ministry — the Milwaukee native has dedicated his life to translating the thousands of pages that comprise the works of the 16th-century Spanish Carmelite spiritual masters, Sts. Teresa of Avila and John of the Cross, from the original Spanish into standard American English.

The fresh translations — which Father Kavanaugh regularly updated with new scholarship — have helped to bring the spiritual teachings of these two famous but often previously unread Carmelite saints into the lives of modern scholars of all religious traditions. Today these affordable translations are available from the United States to the Philippines, and from Africa to Great Britain.

Father Kavanaugh is not only known for his translations, but is also an internationally recognized expert on Carmelite saints and spirituality. His 10-page bibliography lists 82 published articles, essays, reviews and translations on Carmelite themes, published in English, Spanish and Italian.

Currently, he is the Washington province's postulator, or promoter, of causes for canonization of Discalced Carmelite friars, nuns and lay members.

God sees our hearts, knows our prayers

BY JEFF HEDGLEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Years ago, tragedy struck a family when the son was skipping school and goofing around with some friends and an air-powered BB gun. This was a recipe for disaster. Just before the party ended, the son was shot in the head. The BB hit him in the center of his forehead and went halfway into his brain. He was rushed to the hospital.

By the time I arrived he was in surgery, and I went looking for the family. When I found them the scene was a restless concoction of fear, shock, prayer, tears, blind hope, loss, faith, despair and numbness.

The doctors finally came out and told the family that their son's condition was not good. Even if he survived, they said, there was no guarantee that this honor student would ever walk again, much less finish high school.

But over the next several years, many hours of therapy and hard work saw this young man graduate from high school, and now he is working on his second college degree.

Long after the accident his mother recalled what she felt in that waiting room. She said she had been so numb that she couldn't find the words to pray.

This woman who I consider to be deeply faith-filled, wanted to call out to her savior, but no words would come. The only thing she could get her brain to say to God was the prayers of the rosary.

Her family had prayed it every time they got in the car when she was a child, and so these prayers were imbedded within her.

This is the form of prayer that St. Paul speaks of when he says: "And the one who searches hearts knows what is the intention of the Spirit, because he intercedes for the holy ones according to God's will."

Through the tear-filled prayers of the rosary beads, the Spirit of God interceded for this mother in her greatest hour of need. Just because the right words do not come does not mean the prayer is not prayed.

There is no doubt in my mind that the groanings of this mother in the waiting room, while too deep for words, made it to the heart of God.

Question:

What does knowing that the Spirit intercedes for our inexpressible prayers tell you about God?

"REVIVAL OF THE SPIRIT 2008"

This year's themes include Experiencing Healing through the Eucharist, Getting a New Attitude through the Beatitudes, and Running and Sowing Seeds for the Kingdom: True Discipleship for This Generation.

Our revivalist is Fr. Norman Fischer, a dynamic diocesan priest from Lexington, Ky.

Currently, he serves as the full-time chaplain of Lexington Catholic High School and parish priest of St. Peter Claver Church near downtown Lexington. Fr. Norman has been blessed to be able to travel extensively throughout the United States, preaching a message of hope and healing for God's youth, young adults and elders. Fr. Norman believes that, "If we are to move ahead in society as Catholic Church, we must move within, discovering the power of our sacraments and the power of God's mercy and love!!!"

Young actress in 'Kit Kittredge' says Bible is her favorite book

BY MARIA WIERING
 CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ST. PAUL, Minn. — Brieanne Jansen is like a lot of other 11-year-old girls. She enjoys writing stories and singing, and she calls herself a "bookworm."

This gregarious girl's favorite read is the Bible, especially the Psalms. Now Brieanne is adding acting to her list of loves after finishing her first major motion picture, "Kit Kittredge: An American Girl."

She auditioned for the part on a whim; her only previous acting experience was in a 45-minute Christmas play at her Presbyterian church.

"I was ecstatic," she said of hearing she got a part.

She already was a fan of the American Girl books, a series about American girls living during significant historical events.

A native of Ontario, in Canada, Brieanne moved with her family to California in 2001. Nineteen days after the move, her family was held hostage in their 600-square-foot studio apartment by a drug runner evading the police.

The total trust she placed in God during the situation's terrible 45-minute duration deepened her faith and that of her family, she said.

"I really believe that God was there protecting us," she said.

The movie's titular character, Kit Kittredge, is a 10-year-old budding journalist growing up during the Great Depression. She employs her investigative skills to clear the name of a homeless friend after he's accused of theft.

Brieanne's character, Frances Stone, is only in about five minutes of the movie, she said.

"Frances is like me, where she can be strong, but she's a little bit anxious some of the time," Brieanne said.

Madison Davenport, Abigail Breslin and Brieanne Jansen star in a scene from the movie "Kit Kittredge: An American Girl."

In the midst of Frances' efforts to secure her younger sister's membership in Kit's treehouse club, the Stone family loses their Cincinnati home to foreclosure and has to eat at a soup kitchen.

Realizing that the plight of Frances' family in 1934 mirrored those whose homes went into foreclosure in California, Brieanne began a campaign in April to raise $10,000 and 1,000 pounds of food for her local Second Harvest food bank.

She has asked fellow Canadian-Americans and actors to give to the food bank, which serves San Joaquin and Stanislaus counties, ranked second and third in the nation for the highest number of foreclosed homes, she said.

Currently, Brieanne is looking for an agent who will honor her commitment only to act in movies depicting Christian values and moral character, she said.

"Kit Kittredge: An American Girl" can teach girls to work hard and keep hope, Brieanne said.

"I think girls should go to this movie because it's a great movie. ... No matter what you're looking at in the movie, it will teach you a lesson on something," she said.

ARCHIVAL ANECDOTA

For the month of July, here are some historical facts about Belmont Abbey Basilica.

Significant Dates

- April 21, 1876: Benedictine Father Herman Wolf arrives at the former Caldwell Farm in Gaston County with two students to establish a priory and school. The newly founded institution is a mission of St. Vincent Abbey in Pennsylvania and officially is placed under the patronage of Mary Help of Christians in 1878.
- Nov. 9, 1884: Maryhelp Priory is elevated from priory to abbey status, thereby making it independent of St. Vincent Abbey (now Archabbey) in Pennsylvania.
- July 14, 1885: Benedictine Father Leo Haid is elected first abbot of Maryhelp Abbey.
- July 1, 1888: Abbot Haid is consecrated bishop by Cardinal James Gibbons and becomes the third and final vicar apostolic of North Carolina.
- April 11, 1894: Maryhelp Church is dedicated by Cardinal Gibbons.
- June 8, 1910: Belmont Abbey is elevated to rank of Abbatia Nullius Diocesis, the only abbey in the United States ever to hold that rank. An Abbatia Nullius is outside the jurisdiction of any diocese and therefore its abbot enjoys a dignity like a bishop and its church is elevated to the rank of cathedral.
- Jan. 1, 1977: Belmont Abbey's Abbatia Nullius is suppressed and Maryhelp Church loses its status as a cathedral.
- July 27, 1998: Maryhelp Church, Belmont Abbey elevated to rank of basilica.
- March 22, 1999: Maryhelp Church solemnly proclaimed the Basilica of Mary Help of Christians.

Interesting Facts

— Father Jeremiah O'Connell, a missionary priest who was once pastor of historic St. Joseph Church in Mount Holly, bought and donated the land known as the Caldwell Farm to the Benedictine monks of St. Vincent Abbey (Pennsylvania) through then-Bishop James Gibbons.

— St. Katherine Drexel donated $4,000 for the construction of the Belmont Abbey Basilica.

Abbey Motto

"In his first month at the abbey, [Abbot Leo] Haid happened upon a brother about to fell a cedar near the front entrance of the chapel. The abbot stopped the effort with the Latin command 'crescat,' which means 'let it grow.' The 'crescat tree,' as it came to be known, then stood until 1960 when lightning finished what the brother had started.

"The image of the tree was impaled in 1885 on the abbot's and the abbey's first escutcheon, and 'crescat' was designated Maryhelp's motto."

— Benedictine Father Pascal Baumstein, "My Lord of Belmont," p. 71

Maryhelp Church

"[Father Felix] Hintemeyer told [Abbot Leo] Haid to start building the grand brick church he really wanted, knowing he could not possibly meet the expense, but having the courage to trust God to provide. ... And so, at Hintemeyer's insistence, Leo Haid embarked on the construction of a sixty thousand dollar 'cathedral,' the largest Roman Catholic Church in the state, with no earthly means of financing it."

— Father Baumstein, "My Lord of Belmont," p. 115

Description of Maryhelp Church interior after construction

"The arched ceiling was painted light blue, and covered with gold fleurs-de-lis. The sanctuary ... was bordered by a gilt railing of 'butternut' with an 'Episcopal throne, 26 feet in height, approached by three oak steps. ... The main altar, and this too was of gilt oak, stood 36 feet in height and included three niches with blue ceilings dotted with stars...' and '...at its highest pinnacle an arresting statue of Maryhelp in support of the Christ child. ... Maryhelp was flanked by images of Saints Joachim and Anne. Scholastica and Benedict had altars to the side."

— Father Baumstein, "My Lord of Belmont," pgs. 122-123

Mercy Sister Mary Annette McBennett: 1919-2008

Sister remembered for loyalty, devotion, ministry

BELMONT — Mercy Sister Mary Annette McBennett died at Marian Center at Sacred Heart Convent in Belmont June 9. She was 88.

Received as a Sister of Mercy Feb. 2, 1938, Sister McBennett was in her 70th year as a Sister of Mercy.

A Mass of Christian burial was held June 12 at Cardinal Gibbons Memorial Chapel, with burial following at Belmont Abbey Cemetery.

Sister McBennett was born Sept. 10, 1919 in Fayetteville, N.C. Her secular name was Alice Annette McBennett; she took the name Sister Mary Annette upon entering the Sisters of Mercy in 1937.

Sister McBennett received a bachelor's degree in education from the Catholic University of America in 1946 and a master's degree in library science in 1956.

From 1940 to 1946, she ministered at schools in the Charlotte and Newton Grove areas. She was then assigned — along with Mercy Sisters Mary Louise Wiesenforth and Mary Inez Underwood, her fellow pioneer members from the Sisters of Mercy N.C. Regional Community — to Guam, charged with establishing a new foundation there.

"My ministry on Guam began immediately following World War II and it was both a delight and an eye-opener," she said.

She returned to the United States in 1950 and, until 1956, ministered in schools in the Charlotte, Wilmington and Asheville areas.

From 1956 to 1960, Sister McBennett served as novice directress for the Regional Community. From 1960 to 1978, she taught and served as campus library director at Sacred Heart College.

She served as chairperson and secretary-treasurer for the North Carolina unit of the Catholic Library Association, and has been a member of various library scholarly associations. She held the position of parliamentarian of the Sisters Senate for the Diocese of Charlotte in 1972, and gave numerous talks around the country and wrote for several publications.

In 1978, Sister McBennett received her certificate in pastoral care from St. Mary's Hospital in St. Louis, Mo.

Mercy Sister Mary Annette McBennett

In 1979, she began the Pastoral Care Department at St. Joseph's Hospital in Asheville. In 1985, she started the same department at Mercy Hospital in Charlotte.

In 1996, she returned to Sacred Heart Convent in Belmont to institute a reading room and library for the residents. Until her death, Sister McBennett continued her pastoral care by visiting and praying with the Sisters and family members who reside in the Marian Center.

Her lively sense of humor, loyalty and devotion to her many dear friends were certainly keynotes in her community life.

She is survived by her regional community and numerous nieces and nephews. Memorials may be made to the Sisters of Mercy, Sacred Heart Convent, 100 Mercy Drive, Belmont, NC 28012-4805.

The relics of six Mexican priests who were martyred for the faith during the religious persecution in Mexico in the 1920s are seen on display at the Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception in Denver, Colo., May 7, 2006. The relics will visit cities throughout the country — including four in the Diocese of Charlotte this month — in a tour promoted by the Knights of Columbus.

Relics of martyrs to visit churches throughout N.C.

25 Mexican martyrs canonized by Pope John Paul II in 2000 began a pilgrimage in Mexico City in September 2005 to mark the centennial of the Knights of Columbus in Mexico.

Since then, the relics have visited churches all over the United States.

"This pilgrimage seeks to promote knowledge of and devotion to the Knights of Columbus priest martyrs of Mexico and all those who sacrificed their lives for their faith during the Mexican persecution," said Supreme Knight Carl Anderson in a 2006 interview.

"This pilgrimage seeks to promote knowledge of and devotion to the Knights of Columbus priest martyrs ...."

— Carl Anderson

Each of the six whose relics were displayed — Sts. Pedro de Jesus Maldonado, Luis Batis Sainz, Jose Maria Robles Hurtado, Mateo Correa Megallanes, Miguel del la Mora de la Mora and Rodrigo Aguilar Aleman — was a priest and a member of the Knights of Columbus. All 25 were martyred during the persecution of the church in Mexico in the 1920s and 1930s.

During that time thousands of missionaries were expelled from Mexico, Catholic seminaries and schools were closed, and the church was forbidden to own property. Priests and laypeople were told to denounce Jesus and their faith in public — if they refused, they faced not just punishment, but torture and even death.

The relics are scheduled to arrive in North Carolina July 11. The pilgrimage will begin in Raleigh July 12 and will include stops in both the dioceses of Raleigh and Charlotte.

The relics will arrive with a supreme escort and will be accompanied by a past state deputy of the Knights of Columbus.

Each church will host the relics for one day only.

Scheduled visits at churches in the Diocese of Charlotte include Divine Redeemer Church in Boonville July 14, St. Aloysius Church in Hickory July 15, St. Joseph Church in Kannapolis July 16 and Our Lady of Lourdes Church in Monroe July 17.

Someone else will 'a-sweepy'

Volunteers who clean up parish are serving God, bringing heavenly order

"Someone else will a-sweepy!" That's what our maintenance man, Thomas Paul (T.P.) usually says when he encounters a mess someone left behind.

When he says it, he is not too happy — because the "someone else" who will "a-sweepy" is usually T.P.

Some people make a habit of leaving church events early, always assuming that the cleaning up will magically get done by someone else.

They are right about that, of course. But it will fall on the same loyal and sturdy parishioners who always stay around for the cleanup.

A Dominican priest I know says it is no different in religious orders. Some people are always at the service of the community while others freeloader.

"The true measure of a community man is whether or not they are around for the cleanup," he says.

Like most Catholic parishes, we have a lot of cleaning up. We have five big buildings, acres and acres of lawn, a parking lot, cemetery and athletic fields.

Our buildings are full of kitchens and bathrooms. We have six kitchens and, at last count, 16 bathrooms of varying sizes.

We also have locker rooms, dressing rooms, sacristies and nurseries. Every room has a closet. Every building has a storage shed. Some buildings have basements. It is a law of nature that every empty space fills up with junk.

It takes a lot of community men and women to keep things in order. Fortunately, I have a lot of helpers. More than 250 people give at least one hour per week to our parish, much of it in cleaning, raking, pruning, weeding, cutting, polishing, washing, ironing and, of course, sweeping.

We could not function without every goodhearted volunteer.

I figure even the pastor should take a turn at the cleaning. It is good for the soul.

Every now and then I go on a cleaning binge and clean out some closet or pantry. This usually happens when I have a writing deadline.

My secretary says she knows when I have an article due because I start organizing the parish library.

Cleaning things is the time-tested cure for writer's block. Somebody once asked Hemingway how to start writing a novel. He said, "First thing, defrost the refrigerator."

Anyway, I think nothing is as spiritually cleansing as a good scrubbing of the kitchen floor. It is therapy.

Sometimes when you open a closet or refrigerator door, you see the need

Parish Diary

FATHER PETER DALY
CNS COLUMNIST

for cleansing grace.

God is in order. After all, it is God who brings order out of chaos in the creation in Genesis. As Alexander Pope remarked, "Order is heaven's first law."

Volunteers who serve their fellow parishioners by staying around for the cleanup are serving God too. They are bringing heavenly order.

My Dominican friend also says, "Nobody can do everything, but everybody can do something."

The most important thing I can do is thank people for their efforts, especially considering active volunteers don't usually expect to be thanked, and they seldom complain.

Usually it is people who seldom go to church who complain. It is the weddings-and-funerals Catholic who is the first to complain that the toilet paper has run out in the ladies room or the kids have spilled the hand soap on the floor.

Things don't have to be sterile, just in good order. It takes a little effort from everyone.

Next time you go to a parish event, look at the pile of trash generated. Then hang around for the cleanup and see how much work it is.

Don't walk out thinking, "Someone else will a-sweepy!"

The point is not the prestige pregnancy pact

Attention should be focused on cause, not outcome, of story

If you hear a giant clacking sound, it might be thousands of computer keyboards as would-be script writers work furiously to be the first to create a TV "Movie of the Week" based on the events in a New England fishing town.

A title could be "Prestige Pregnancy Pact."

The background, of course, is the statistics-defying increase in pregnancies among sophomore girls at a Gloucester, Mass., high school. The 17 reported pregnancies are four times as many as had occurred at the school the previous year.

What thrust the story into international headlines was an article in Time magazine in which high school principal Joseph Sullivan said eight of the girls made a pact to become pregnant and raise their babies together.

What is interesting is how the story played out: civic face-saving, semantic arguments, high school birth control, even a little bit of anti-Catholic bigotry.

Everything was a matter for discussion and concern — except the most important thing: the cause.

No one disputes as fact that 17 girls at the high school became pregnant this year. A Time magazine reporter looking into that aberration talked with Sullivan, who said several students sought pregnancy tests several times.

When told the results, "some girls seemed more upset when they weren't pregnant than when they were," said Sullivan, who was prompted to talk with the 17 students.

That word — pact — did it. Rather than concern about an exponential increase in teenage pregnancies, the town politicians zeroed in on "pact": Was there or wasn't there one?

Dictionaries define "pact" as to agree to or to contract, to be a formal agreement such as between nations.

News organizations flooded Gloucester with cable, broadcast trucks and satellite dishes.

The mayor convened a closed-door meeting with city, school and health leaders. Next she appeared before banks of microphones, saying there is absolutely no evidence of "any planned blood oath bond to become pregnant."

There's no evidence of a "pact"? These are early teens, not United Nations delegates. These are eight girls — none older than 16 — with the planning skills of cocker spaniel puppies who no doubt did not sit at a table and execute any sort of formal agreement.

The fact is that there are 17 unwed soon-to-be mothers who may be pawns in arguments over school health policies.

The school health clinic is administered by the town hospital. The school's nurse practitioner, after administering 150 pregnancy tests, conferred with the pediatrician. Both advocated providing contraceptives without parental consent. The hospital director rejected this idea; the two resigned in protest.

Then there is this in an Associated Press article: "The heavily Roman Catholic town, which has a large Italian and Portuguese population, has long been supportive of teen mothers. The high school has a day care center for students and employees."

Wink, wink, nudge in the side: "Oh those fanatically fertile Catholic types."

Whether or not there was a pact is irrelevant. How closely this mirrors some Hollywood fiction is irrelevant. Political arguments over the school health policies are irrelevant.

Parents there have a profound lack of understanding of their children. They should look to reasons for the daughters' low self-esteem, for creating and allowing such misunderstanding of parenting rather than posturing in the media about the meaning of a pact.

Gloucester was the home port of the fishing boat featured in the "The Perfect Storm," a movie about a confluence of weather factors that came together to create disaster.

The present situation is not imitating Hollywood, which has yet to imagine such a plot.

The Gloucester situation more closely resembles "It Takes a Village to Raise a Child" — or to ruin several.

The blessed Eucharist

Jesus helps us produce rich, abundant good fruit

Many Catholics who receive holy Communion weekly do not have a clear conviction that the risen Jesus is truly present in the Eucharist.

They don't seem to connect with him on the level of true faith.

By reducing the reception of holy Communion to a pious ritual with no belief in the central meaning of this holy sacrament, they miss so much.

In one of Thomas Merton's final letters written before his journey to the Orient, from which he never returned, he expressed his views on the Eucharist in this way:

"As for the topic of the Real Presence, I am living in a hermitage where I now have the Blessed Sacrament, which is a great blessing, a very great help in prayer and meditation; in fact a quite indescribable privilege.

"The people who dilute the idea of the Real Presence, it seems to me, are the ones who have forgotten the meaning of prayer" (The Tablet of London, December 1968).

"Every commitment to holiness, every activity aimed at carrying out the church's mission, every work of pastoral planning must draw the strength it needs from the eucharistic mystery," wrote Pope John Paul II in "Ecclesia eucharistica."

"In the Eucharist we have Jesus, we have the gift of the Holy Spirit, we have the love of the Father," he wrote. "Were we to disregard the Eucharist, how could we overcome our deficiency?"

St. Paul saw the meaning of the Eucharist so clearly: "In him we live and breathe and have our being."

This sacrament of the church confirms the immanence of God. With Christ's presence among us, we learn that the Eucharist is infinitely more than a pious symbol; it is truly the body and blood of Christ under the appearance of bread and wine.

Jesus shares his very life with us in a most intimate, life-giving way.

The fathers of the Second Vatican Council back in the 1960s consisted of about 2,000 bishops from all over the world. In union with Pope Paul VI they proclaimed the Eucharist "the source and summit of the Christian life" ("Lumen Gentium").

The section of another encyclical on the Eucharist that really appeals to me — Pope John Paul's "Ecclesia de Eucharistia" — says:

"It is also a source of joy to note that Catholic ministers, in certain particular cases, are able to administer the sacrament of the Eucharist, penance and the anointing of the sick, to Christians who are not in full communion with the Catholic Church, but who greatly desire to receive these sacraments, and freely request them, and manifest the faith, which the Catholic Church professes."

The Eucharist is also called the "Bread of Angels;" but you don't have to be an angel to draw strength from this heavenly food.

What you do have to be, however, is a true believer in the real presence of the risen Christ under the appearances of bread and wine.

Some reason falsely that we don't need a personal savior or a belief system in order to be spiritually alive. To me, the idea that you can cut the branch off the vine and still hope to produce grapes makes no sense.

We Catholics are truly privileged people. Let us be on guard to profess our true faith in this precious gift. Jesus Christ comes to help us produce rich, abundant good fruit.

Pope says St. Paul represents sublime figure for today's Christians

The Pope Speaks

Editor's note: The pope is on his summer break. This is from last week's audience.

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — To learn about Christ and how to live the right way, today's Christians should look to St. Paul, Pope Benedict XVI said at his last weekly general audience before his summer break.

St. Paul the Apostle represents a "sublime and almost inimitable figure" who serves as an example because of his "total dedication to the Lord and his church, as well as his great openness to humanity and its cultures," the pope said July 2.

In his first audience after the June 28 opening of the Pauline year, the pope said the catechesis would be the first of a series dedicated to learning more about this "stimulating figure." The jubilee year will run until June 29, 2009, in commemoration of the 2,000th anniversary of the apostle's birth.

The weekly general audiences are scheduled to resume Aug. 13.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

Last Sunday, the Solemnity of the Apostles Peter and Paul, marked the beginning of a year dedicated to the figure and teaching of the Apostle Paul. Today's audience begins a new series of catecheses aimed at understanding more deeply the thought of St. Paul and its continuing relevance.

Paul, as we know, was a Jew, and consequently a member of a distinct cultural minority in the Roman Empire. At the same time, he spoke Greek, the language of the wider Hellenistic culture, and was a Roman citizen.

Paul's proclamation of the Risen Christ, while grounded in Judaism, was marked by a universalist vision and it was facilitated by his familiarity with three cultures. He was thus able to draw from the spiritual richness of contemporary philosophy, and Stoicism in particular, in his preaching of the Gospel.

The crisis of traditional Greco-Roman religion in Paul's time had also fostered a greater concern for a personal experience of God. As we see from his sermon before the Areopagus in Athens (cf. Acts 17:22ff.), Paul was able to appeal to these currents of thought in his presentation of the Good News.

Against this broad cultural background, Paul developed his teaching, which we will explore in the catecheses of this Pauline Year.

Oh, that rainbow!

Symbol of God's covenant often appears when most needed

Anyone aware of the honors given to Tim Russert, the longtime moderator of Meet the Press, after his untimely death on June 20 had to be impressed with how he was repeatedly characterized: "He was a faithful, devout Catholic."

Similar accolades were heard subsequently at the John F. Kennedy Center in Washington: Tim Russert had remained ever devoted to his Catholic faith, his Jesuit training, and his family and friends.

This good man left us with a clear reminder of what a joy and a privilege it was for him to be a Catholic.

Then there was one last gift witnessed by family and friends leaving Russert's memorial. There in the sky was a large, beautiful rainbow arching over the buildings.

From the comments it was evident that some saw this as some kind of heavenly sign about Russert's new homeland!

Oh, that rainbow! Seeing it on the screen immediately took me back to the day my seven brothers and sisters and I drove through torrential rain to the cemetery after the burial Mass for our father. We were very grateful when the rain suddenly stopped when we got to the site.

We encircled Dad's coffin, each leaving a flower. Suddenly, the sun burst through the clouds, revealing the most extraordinary rainbow any of us had ever seen! We believed it meant Dad was with us.

About 10 years ago Claire Twitchell, a reader of my columns, sent me a story that emphasized again for me that there may be more to rainbows than a weather phenomenon. She wrote that her family had been given a "gift" after her granddaughter Rebecca was killed in a car crash.

Claire related that Rebecca's mom, Terece, had always called her daughter her "rainbow girl." She even had a big picture of a rainbow Rebecca had drawn stuck to the refrigerator door with a rainbow magnet.

Terece asked her daughter's spirit to help her get through this ordeal by sending her a sign — a rainbow — to let her know she was all right.

Well, not only did the family get a rainbow the next day, it was the most magnificent rainbow they had ever seen — a great big band of colors that came down out of the clouds. Every color was represented, vivid and bright, intensifying as the family watched, Claire said.

Rainbows have a sacred origin, going all the way back to the Book of Genesis, which tells how God told Noah that the rainbow would be the sign of the covenant established between himself and "every living thing found on earth":

"I set my bow in the clouds to serve as a sign of the covenant between me and the earth. When I bring clouds over the earth, and the bow appears in the clouds, I will recall the covenant" (9:13-15).

Poet James Weldon Johnson penned a picture of this promise:

"And God smiled again,
"And the rainbow appeared,
"And curled itself around his shoulder."

It's not hard for me to believe that curled within God's arms — and the rainbow — are his good people who have traveled to him before us.

Eucharistic Congress attendees embrace the 'Living Bread'

BY ANDREW NELSON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

COLLEGE PARK, Ga. — Carlos Garcia believes that “everyone who comes with an open heart” to the Archdiocese of Atlanta’s annual eucharistic congress “leaves differently.”

“It’s better than going to any sports arena. You feel the love and the presence of the Lord,” said Garcia, a computer administrator at Christ the King Cathedral in Atlanta, Ga.

The archdiocese’s 13th annual congress drew 20,000 to 30,000 Catholics to the cavernous Georgia International Convention Center in College Park June 20-21.

The convention center mirrored the diversity of the 750,000 people who pray regularly in the 100 churches and missions in the 69-county archdiocese. The center’s hallways were jammed with people speaking English, Spanish, Korean, Vietnamese and other languages. All had come to hear speakers and join in worship services.

The congress theme was “I Am the Living Bread.” And Atlanta Archbishop Wilton D. Gregory reminded people in his morning homily June 21 that bread is a food staple across the world.

“This common substance that exists in many and varied forms throughout the human community was chosen to serve as a symbol of God’s bounty and his compassion for his people,” he said.

The congress agenda included a healing Mass June 20 and adoration and exposition of the Blessed Sacrament June 21. Workshop sessions were organized into several tracks.

Speakers included Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin of Charlotte, N.C., who shared personal stories of his working relationship and friendship with Blessed Mother Teresa of Calcutta.

Also speaking was Helen Alvare, an associate professor of family law at George Mason University in Virginia.

She said two of the “essential sacraments” of the church are the Eucharist and marriage. And the relationship between the two is tied together with self-sacrifice, mutual giving and faithfulness, she said.

“These are not theoretical sacraments; these are not theories about how to live life or how to encounter God,” she said.

Alvare, a former pro-life spokeswoman for the U.S. bishops, said marriage and family life are key issues the culture and the church are facing.

On the debate surrounding same-sex marriage, Alvare said the Catholic Church approaches the question from an understanding of marriage, not the morality of homosexuality.

She said many of the court decisions on same-sex marriage wrongly state that marriage has no relationship to human nature, human bodies or the bearing of children, she said.

Speaker Father Ricardo Bailey, the chaplain at Blessed Trinity High School in Roswell, Ga., said the Eucharist “changes us, it empowers us, but most of all, it causes us to go out and transform the world.”

“That’s why in essence we are here, to celebrate who we are, whose we are, and what it is God calls us to become,” the priest said.

About 500 volunteers worked during the two days of the congress. Organizers needed 10,000 hosts to distribute for Communion.

They needed 128 collection baskets, 250 banner stands, 12 wax candles for the altar, and a case of water bottles for purifying the chalices after Mass, among many other things.

Msgr. Joe Corbett, a vicar general for the archdiocese and a key congress organizer, said his favorite part of the event is seeing the tremendous crowds show up year after year.

“The verse from Romans (that says) ‘So we, though many, are one body in Christ’ kept singing in my ears on Friday evening and all day Saturday, as I met parishioners and clergy from some of the many parishes and school communities I visit as vicar general,” he said. “It was a beautiful thing.”

CHARLOTTE — A group of Charlotte-area Knights of Columbus recently completed a handicap-accessible ramp for a local Catholic man.

Fourteen volunteers from Knights councils at St. Matthew Church in Charlotte, Our Lady of Lourdes Church in Monroe and St. Philip Neri Church in Fort Mill, S.C., as well as St. Matthew Church parishioners, all helped construct the ramp May 17-18.

Installed at the home of John Mullis, a parishioner of St. Matthew Church, the ramp's construction was accomplished through the Knights' Operation Exodus program.

"John Mullis and his family have been very pleased with the use they get out of his ramp," said Robert Wilcocks, Operation Exodus director.

A BUZZ ABOUT CHURCH

Chuck Crimmins displays bees June 20 at Heifer Ranch in Perryville, Ark., after they had been resettled from the guttering atop the northeast corner of the Cathedral of St. Andrew's apse wall in Little Rock, Ark. Cathedral maintenance supervisor John Hodge, whose father-in-law was a beekeeper, said he had never seen bees nest that high in the air, about 30 feet off the ground.

Beekeeper has sweet success moving bees from cathedral to new home

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. (CNS) — Unlikely though it may be, about 10,000 honeybees made a home for themselves at Little Rock's Catholic cathedral in the rain gutters atop the apse wall.

Many might think these new parishioners were unwelcome, but, in fact, staff members at the Cathedral of St. Andrew went out of their way to make sure the bees found a new residence at Heifer Ranch in Perryville.

By mid-July, after about a month in their new home, the cathedral's bees were growing into a stable colony, according to Chuck Crimmins, garden and forestry coordinator at the ranch, one of five learning centers for Heifer International.

The nonprofit international organization, based in Little Rock, works to end world hunger and poverty through self-reliance and sustainability.

On May 27 John Hodge, cathedral maintenance supervisor, discovered the bees in the gutters, which are about 30 feet above the ground. Hodge, whose father-in-law was a beekeeper, said he had never seen bees nest that high in the air, much less in an urban area like downtown Little Rock.

He became concerned for the bees and called several agencies for help. He eventually reached Crimmins, whose job includes serving as ranch beekeeper.

Crimmins went to the cathedral, climbed a ladder to get a closer look and was amazed at what he saw: At least 10,000 bees had "eight or 10 frames of honeycomb already drawing out, full of honey and baby bees."

Once bees colonize, "they're not going to leave. They had changed from looking for a home to saying, 'This is home,'" said Crimmins, who is a member of St. John Latin Mass Community in North Little Rock.

He needed to use a cherry-picker lift borrowed from a parishioner to go after them.

Early in the morning June 13, he and cathedral maintenance man Scott Brecht, clothed in protective jackets, veils and gloves, took a 10-framed wooden beehive box up in the lift and began dislodging sections of honeycomb and attaching them to the wooden frames inside the box.

They wanted to preserve what the bees had already built and encourage them to continue the process inside the frames.

After they finished, he and several onlookers enjoyed a sweet snack by sucking honey out of the excess honeycomb.

At the ranch the bees have permanently attached their honeycombs to the frames and Crimmins has stacked another 10-frame box onto the first.

He hopes to give the first batch of honey from the cathedral's bees to Bishop Anthony B. Taylor of Little Rock this fall.

"As far as I'm concerned, it's his honey," he said, and they're "his bees."

No state charges in Charities abortion case; federal inquiry ongoing

RICHMOND, Va. (CNS) — Richmond Commonwealth's Attorney Michael Herring said he will not bring charges against a Catholic Charities worker who signed a consent form for an abortion performed on a 16-year-old Guatemalan in foster care.

Herring said July 16 the Commonwealth Catholic Charities employee and others working with her believed they had the authority to sign the consent form. Virginia law requires that a parent, legal guardian or person acting in the place of a parent sign the consent form before a minor receives an abortion.

Although the Charities staff member did not have legal authority to sign the form, there was no criminal intent, Herring said. "She truly believed she was doing an appropriate thing at the time."

Meanwhile, the inspector general for the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services was exploring whether any federal laws were violated by the abortion. The use of federal funds to pay for abortion is prohibited, except in limited circumstances.

Kenneth Wolfe, deputy director of the Office of Public Affairs in the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services' Administration for Children and Families, said July 18 that the inspector general's investigation was continuing and he could not comment on the Richmond case until that was completed.

The four Commonwealth Catholic Charities employees who helped the minor with the abortion or with obtaining a contraceptive device have been fired, and an employee of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops' Migration and Refugee Services charged with supervising them was suspended.

Bishop Francis X. DiLorenzo of Richmond apologized "for the loss of the life of one of the most vulnerable among us" and said "the guilt and depression that many of us experience as a result of the behavior of a few is something that we will bear for a long time to come."

FROM THE VATICAN

Newly inaugurated Vatican agency regulates workers' health, safety

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — A newly inaugurated Vatican agency is dedicated to regulating and overseeing workers' health and safety.

Cardinal Giovanni Lajolo, president of the commission governing Vatican territory, presided over a July 21 ceremony blessing the Vatican safety inspectors' new headquarters. The offices are part of a total revamping of how the Vatican protects and safeguards the rights, health and safety of people who work on Vatican territory.

In December the Vatican announced a new law to improve worker safety and rights. Most Vatican regulations follow Italian norms, but the Vatican wanted to cut bureaucracy and customize rules to take into account the Vatican's unique situation, said Gianluigi Marrone, a Vatican City judge.

The law called for the creation of a new agency specifically dedicated to worker safety, he said in an interview published July 23 in the Vatican newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano.

The agency was established this year and is staffed by a doctor, an engineer, an architect and an official from the Vatican's fire brigade.

The new regulations emphasize education and safety training courses and will require Vatican departments to compile and update lists of all workplace risks and workers' needs.

Some initiatives include providing better access for handicapped employees, and plans are in place to provide special rooms for nursing mothers and to help Vatican employees find day care for their children, Marrone said.

Workers' rights and safety regulations will extend to non-Vatican employees such as laborers working for outside companies subcontracted by the Vatican, the judge said.

Vatican official: Ignoring Christian tradition like 'spiritual Alzheimer's'

LONDON (CNS) — A Vatican official told the world's Anglican bishops that ignoring Christian tradition and making decisions apart from the wider church are like degenerative diseases.

At the Lambeth Conference, where the Anglican bishops are struggling with such issues as the ordination of women, gay bishops and gay unions, Cardinal Ivan Dias appeared to allude to a "spiritual Alzheimer's" threatening to destroy the historical memory of the Anglican churches.

"Much is spoken today of diseases like Alzheimer's and Parkinson's," Cardinal Dias, prefect of the Vatican's Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples, told the plenary session in Canterbury July 23.

"By analogy, their symptoms can, at times, be found even in our own Christian communities," he said. "For example, when we live myopically in the fleeting present, oblivious of our past heritage and apostolic traditions, we could well be suffering from spiritual Alzheimer's."

"And when we behave in a disorderly manner, going whimsically our own way without any coordination with the head or the other members of our community, it could be ecclesial Parkinson's," the cardinal said.

He added that the joint efforts of Anglicans and Catholics to spread the Christian faith depended on their "unity and cohesion."

This was the second time in less than a week that Vatican officials have made their concerns known to delegates at the July 16-Aug. 3 conference, held once every 10 years.

Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, the Vatican secretary of state, earlier said internal divisions within the Anglican Communion "pose a further and grave challenge to the hope for full and visible unity that has been the longstanding goal of our joint ecumenical endeavor."

Earlier in July, the General Synod of the Church of England voted in favor of the ordination of women as bishops, following the examples of Anglican churches in the U.S., Scotland, Canada, Australia and New Zealand.

More controversial within the Anglican Communion is the ordination of homosexuals as bishops.

Former Colombian hostage makes pilgrimage to Lourdes sanctuaries

LOURDES, France (CNS) — Accompanied by her mother, sister and children, former Colombian presidential candidate Ingrid Betancourt made a pilgrimage to the Sanctuaries of Our Lady of Lourdes less than two weeks after she was freed from years in captivity.

Betancourt went to the Marian grotto at the shrine in the French Pyrenees July 12. Surrounded by police and pilgrims, she was greeted by Bishop Jacques Perrier of Tarbes and Lourdes.

The Catholic politician prayed before a crowd of thousands in thanksgiving for her life and freedom. Betancourt was abducted in 2002 by the rebel Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia while she was running for president.

On July 2, the Colombian army staged a bloodless military operation and liberated Betancourt and 14 others.

"Take care of those who are left behind me," Betancourt said, referring to the estimated 700 hostages still held in Colombia. "They need your strength, your hope and your life."

The politician said she had "tried to maintain dignity" by meditating and praying, despite being bound and beaten by her captors. She added that she hoped to travel to Rome in August to meet Pope Benedict XVI, who had made several appeals for her release.

"I have to do two things: forget and find spiritual peace, and be able to forgive. When I do this, I'll also have to recall my memories. But perhaps, in time, these won't be so painful."

Betancourt said she had made a rosary from buttons and old string during her captivity.

Justice for Immigrants director discusses details, myths

Waters Catholic Reflection Center in Maggie Valley and St. Francis of Assisi Church in Franklin.

Cube plans to return in the fall to speak in the southern and eastern parts of the Diocese of Charlotte.

Altogether, more than 200 people, including Bishop Peter J. Jugis and Msgr. Mauricio W. West, chancellor and vicar general of the diocese, attended the presentations. The Diocese of Charlotte's Office of Hispanic Ministry and Catholic Social Services sponsored the program.

"I'm trying to get the word out (about comprehensive immigration reform), answer questions, debunk myths, and hopefully change some minds and hearts," Cube said.

The Justice for Immigrants campaign seeks to educate the public about church teaching on migration and immigrants, create political will for positive immigration reform, enact legislative and administrative reforms based on the principles articulated by the bishops, and organize Catholic networks to help qualified immigrants obtain the benefits of the reforms.

The bishops are not in favor of unlawful entry into the United States or amnesty for those undocumented immigrants already here. Rather, they seek comprehensive immigration reform, which has four provisions: a pathway to legalization for the undocumented, no deportation that splits families, immigrants' home countries must address the root causes of why people leave, and America has the right to protect its borders.

The bishops specify that all four provisions must be enacted together because all four work together.

Pathway to legalization

"The Catholic bishops are proposing an earned legalization for those in this country in an unauthorized status and who have built up equities and are otherwise admissible," the Justice for Immigrants campaign Web site states.

"Amnesty," as commonly understood, implies a pardon and a reward for those who did not obey immigration laws, creating inequities for those who wait for legal entry," it says.

"The bishops' earned legalization proposal provides a window of opportunity for undocumented immigrants who are already living in our communities and contributing to our nation to come forward, pay a fine and application fee, go through rigorous criminal background checks and security screenings, demonstrate that they have paid taxes and are learning English, and obtain a visa that could lead to permanent residency, over time," the site says.

Cube said that the fines might be as much as $3,000 to $9,000 per person, which they could pay in one to three years. These fines would finance the program, so that Congress wouldn't have to allocate other funds.

Coming and going

When many undocumented

immigrants are deported, they may take their U.S. citizen spouses and children with them, or they are separated from them for years while they attempt to obtain the documentation to return legally.

"The backlog of available visas for family members results in waits of five, 10, 15, and more years of waiting for a visa to become available," the Justice for Immigrants Campaign site says. "The bishops call for a reduction in the pending backlog and more visas available for family reunification purposes."

Many people migrate because they cannot provide for their families in their own countries. Comprehensive immigration reform calls for international efforts to help people stay home. "Trade, international economic aid, debt relief, and other types of economic policies should be pursued that result in people not having to migrate in desperation in order to survive," the Web site says.

When we talk about the greater good," Cube asked, "are we talking about just the United States or about our brothers and sisters all over the world?"

Migration myths

One immigration myth is that restricting immigration will make the United States safer.

Yet, the Justice for Immigrants Campaign Web site states that, "Since 9/11, the myriad measures targeting immigrants in the name of national security have netted no terrorism prosecutions.

"In fact, several of these measures could have the opposite effect and actually make us less safe, as targeted communities of immigrants are afraid to come forward with information."

Among the myths about undocumented immigrants is that they don't pay taxes or social security, but Cube said this is not the case.

If an illegal immigrant presents an employer with identification, even a fake social security card, that employer is required to deduct social security and taxes from the person's pay. However, because the person is undocumented, he or she can't derive any benefits from government services.

"Upwards of $6 billion a year is paid into social security by illegals, which is actually keeping social security in the black," Cube said. "If they become legal, they can only collect social security for the time they work after they become legal."

As has often been stated, America is an immigrant nation, but U.S. immigration law is a fairly recent development. The Alien and Sedition Acts, passed in 1798 and repealed or expired between 1800 and 1802, were rarely enforced. Earlier, laws barring entry into the United States focused on convicts and prostitutes.

"Entering the United States did not become a violation until Congress passed a law on March 4, 1929," the Justice for Immigrants campaign Web site states.

"Because of the lack of funding, Congress did not authorize or appropriate funds to enforce the law until the late 1940s. The beginning of our current immigration code, the Immigration and Nationality Act, was enacted in 1965," the site says.

Finally, and perhaps most importantly, as Cube said, "Everyone can be more welcoming of each other. Be mindful that we're Catholic. Catholics have a long history of compassion."

What can Catholics do to help with comprehensive immigration reform?

Antoinio Cube, national director of the U.S. bishops' Justice for Immigrants campaign, suggests:

- When comprehensive immigration reform legislation comes before Congress, contact legislators to say you support it.
- Justice for Immigrants Campaign is working on homily notes for parish bulletins. If your parish uses them, read the information.

— Become educated about immigration. A good information source is the Justice for Immigrants Campaign Web site, www.justiceforimmigrants.org, which includes the U.S. and Mexican bishops' landmark pastoral letter, "Strangers No Longer: Together on the Journey of Hope." Educating yourself will help you respond with correct information when others bring up myths and inaccuracies about immigration issues.

Doctor opens clinic to serve uninsured poor

Medicine clinic in Franklin July 1, that is exactly what he did.

Perpetual Health is a unique medical mission in that it provides quality medical care to the uninsured poor with medical costs subsidized through the annual fees of clinical benefactors.

"When I applied to medical school, this is what I had in mind," said Vargas, who earned his degree from the School of Medicine at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. "I always wanted to work in rural North Carolina to pay back the state that sponsored me," he said.

For Vargas, opening Perpetual Health is a dream come true because it gives him the opportunity to "practice medicine in a meaningful, professionally rewarding way and serve the poor," he said.

The clinic's mission statement, according to its Web site is "to obey Christ's command to serve the poor by providing free medical care to the uninsured of the Macon County, N.C. area through a self-sustaining, community-supported family medical practice."

"Dr. Vargas has been seeking to deepen his love for our Lord and engage the gift of his Catholic faith with greater zeal," said Father Matthew Kauth, Vargas' spiritual advisor and former pastor of St. Francis of Assisi Church in Franklin.

"This project was an answer to the desire in his heart," said Father Kauth.

Vargas' first formal step in initiating the clinic was to seek the approval and blessing of Bishop Peter J. Jugis.

"I thought it showed both filial devotion as well as proper piety that he did not want to begin this project without this blessing," said Father Kauth.

Bishop Jugis sent his official blessing to Vargas in a letter Aug. 1, 2007.

"I am glad to know that you will practice medicine in a manner consistent with the Church's teachings," wrote Bishop Jugis. "You have my prayers for the success of this initiative."

Perpetual Health is only the second medical clinic of its kind nationwide and the first to serve a rural community.

Vargas modeled his clinic after the St. Luke's Family Practice in Modesto, Calif., run by Catholic doctors Robert Forester and Richard Heck.

"It was a delayed sort of epiphany," said Vargas of the moment he realized how the model worked.

"It's like all the pieces that I had aspired to and all of the things that I had done up to that point finally came together," he said.

"It resolved that fear of taking on a challenge where I had to choose between making a decent living and providing for my family or serving the poor. This is a model where I can do both," he added.

The clinic is subsidized by the annual fees of a limited number of benefactors who receive unlimited access to primary care services and help cover the costs of the uninsured.

"It was brought to our attention at the parish at the end of a Sunday Mass about a year ago," said benefactor Nick Murphy, a parishioner of St. Francis of Assisi Church.

It is a way to "meet our Gospel mandate to help our neighbor," said Murphy, who said he was made "aware of the great need for our less fortunate brothers and sisters to have quality medical care."

"I really agree with the idea of the model," said fellow benefactor Helen Jones who said she likes the idea of being able to "provide something for myself but at the same time be able to help people who are part of the working class poor that don't have medical insurance."

Vargas also relies on the generosity of donors and volunteers, as well as partnerships with various local resources and faith communities.

"Communities should be taking care of themselves," said Father Kauth, "that is to say, self-sustaining operations of charity motivated by a love for our Lord who offers us his grace and love in serving."

There are currently eight benefactors enrolled with Perpetual Health and approximately 10 recipients.

Vargas said he can take up to a maximum of 300 clinical benefactors per year, which will allow him to see up to 1,200 recipients.

There may be an unlimited number of supportive benefactors — ones who are not actual patients, but make donations to the clinic.

According to Vargas, interest in the model was initially high, but now that the clinic is up and running, enrollment of benefactors has been low.

"We made a commitment to serve the poor and we could hold onto that commitment and say 'well we want to serve the poor but we'll wait until we have at least 250 benefactors enrolled' so that we can pay ourselves full salaries," said Vargas.

"Or we can open July 1, wherever we're at, and just start serving the poor," he said. "We decided not to wait."

"He's just an unusual physician in my opinion," said Murphy. "He's willing to do more for less if it will be beneficial to his community."

Helping people get to heaven

Envoy Institute strives for evangelization on college campuses and beyond

BY KATIE MOORE
STAFF WRITER

BELMONT — “The devil tempted me in so many ways during my first year of college,” said Emily Eby, a rising sophomore at N.C. State University.

“I definitely had my moments of weakness and times where I was falling fast from the church,” she said.

Like Eby, many young people on college campuses throughout the country are faced with moral challenges that put their faith to the test on a daily basis.

Now there is a support system in place that will reinforce the teachings of the Catholic Church on college campuses and beyond.

The first ever Envoy Institute Conference, “Combating Relativism and the Culture of Death on College Campuses, in the Media and Beyond,” was held at Belmont Abbey College July 11-13.

“The goal of the first annual Envoy Institute Conference was to introduce the institute and make people aware, not only of our existence, but also of what we hope to accomplish — what our goals are,” said institute director Patrick Madrid.

Known for his work in Catholic apologetics, Madrid is the author of 12 books on Catholic themes and the publisher of Envoy Magazine, a journal of contemporary Catholic thought.

He founded the Envoy Institute last summer through a cooperative effort with Belmont Abbey College.

“I have high esteem for Belmont Abbey College and so one benefit, of course, is to be allied with a very prestigious and solidly Catholic institution of higher learning,” he said.

Dr. William Thierfelder, president of Belmont Abbey College, agreed, noting that the presence of the Envoy Institute has been a positive addition to the Belmont Abbey community — “a community that seeks truth and lives in response to it,” he said.

“It is clear to me that the perfection, the excellence and the virtue we strive to attain at the Envoy Institute of Belmont

“The purpose of the Envoy Institute ... is to help people get to heaven.”

— Patrick Madrid

Abbey College is to glorify God and serve humanity through good stewardship of our gifts,” said Thierfelder.

The conference featured a powerhouse line-up of Catholic speakers who tackled the issue of relativism in relation to their particular fields of expertise.

“I believe everyone who spoke was equally effective in that he or she allowed God to work through him or her so, that when the entire weekend is reflected upon as a whole, every talk and message seems to flow together as one long story that God wanted to share with the participants,” said Eby.

Each of the speakers strived to achieve the goals of the institute — “to fortify Catholics so that they can be better Catholics and be more effective in sharing, explaining and defending the faith,” said Madrid.

Dr. Paul Thigpen, a convert to the Catholic faith, tackled the tough issue of evangelization with his presentation, “Evangelization by the Ounce,” which offered 10 simple suggestions for incorporating faith-sharing techniques into everyday situations.

Thigpen is a professor of theology at Southern Catholic College in Dawsonville, Ga., and editor of The Catholic Answer, a national bimonthly magazine that answers questions about Catholic faith, practice and history.

“Not even one ounce of evangelization was ever wasted if it was poured out on a thirsty soul,” he said.

and traced the history of the feminist movement from a pro-life perspective.

“Feminism is a philosophy that embraces the rights of all human beings without exception,” she said. “The truth that every woman knows in her heart of hearts is that women deserve better than abortion.”

Hector Molina, director of the archdiocesan Office of the New Evangelization for the Archdiocese of St. Louis, Mo., talked about how the core of evangelization is rooted within the history of Catholicism.

“Evangelization is a thoroughly Catholic thing,” he said. “It is an obligation for every single one of us to embrace and accept.”

Participants came away from the weekend armed with the tools needed to effectively convey their faith to others.

“For the first time in my life I am not only fearless of standing up for my faith, but am burning to share it with others,” said Eby.

“This conference provided the evidence and the arguments to defeat the lies, making it clear that there are objective truths and God wants us to know them,” said Kathy Schmugge, Family Life Coordinator for the Diocese of Charleston, S.C.

“I left filled with the hope that with the grace of God, we can bring light to the present culture and turn it around,” she said.

Although the Envoy Institute was initially set up to address the needs of Catholic students on college campuses, the conference itself was geared toward “Catholics of all ages,” according to Madrid.

“The purpose of the Envoy Institute at Belmont Abbey College, fundamentally, is to help people get to heaven,” he said.

“In the meantime we want them to have as good and full and as holy a life as a Catholic as possible,” he added.

Eby certainly came away from the conference with a new perspective.

“The Envoy Institute Conference has changed my life and re-ignited a passionate spiritual flame within me that about a year ago had almost been completely extinguished,” she said.

wallaby joey and an echidna.

Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, papal spokesman, said the visit was the idea of Australian church officials; "they are rightly proud of the species that are found only here."

Once the public part of his trip began, Pope Benedict spent his days combining World Youth Day activities with elements of a pastoral visit to Australia.

Before he left Australia July 21, the pope celebrated a private Mass with four Australian victims of clerical sexual abuse and their families. In a small chapel inside St. Mary's Cathedral, the pope also spent time talking to and consoling the victims.

Two days earlier during a Mass at the cathedral, the pope apologized publicly to Australian victims of clerical sexual abuse.

The pope said, "I am deeply sorry for the pain and suffering the victims have endured and I assure them that as their pastor, I, too, share in their suffering."

In his homily for the Mass, which included the consecration of the cathedral's new altar, Pope Benedict prayed for the rededication and renewal of the Catholic Church throughout Australia and asked the country's priests and religious to support fully the bishops' programs for protecting young people, assisting victims and bringing perpetrators to justice.

At an airport farewell ceremony before leaving for Rome July 21, the pope said the World Youth Day "experiences of prayer, and our joyful celebration of the Eucharist, were an eloquent testimony to the life-giving work of the Holy Spirit, present and active in the hearts of our young people."

"World Youth Day has shown us that the church can rejoice in the young people of today and be filled with hope for the world of tomorrow," he said.

Join Father Timothy Reid, pastor of St. Ann Church in Charlotte, and others for a Pilgrimage to Saint Anne-de-Beaupre Shrine near Quebec City in Canada

October 8 - 13th

The year 2008 marks the 350th anniversary of the first chapel erected on the site of the Saint Anne-de-Beaupre Shrine, one of the oldest pilgrimage sites in North America.

This special pilgrimage will leave Charlotte Wednesday, October 8, and fly to Montreal where the first two days will be spent touring that fascinating city and its beautiful churches, including the Oratory of St. Joseph. The group will then travel to Quebec City for the special weekend celebrations honoring the 350th anniversary of the historical chapel. On October 13, the group will return to Montreal and fly back to Charlotte.

The cost is $2,030 per person (double occupancy) and includes roundtrip airfare from Charlotte, hotels and hotel taxes, breakfasts, dinners, land transportation, all transfers and baggage handling at hotels.

Registration deadline is: FRIDAY, AUGUST 1st.

efforts to promote reconciliation with the country's indigenous peoples, who have long been oppressed.

Dance, chants and art from the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islanders were included at many of the papal events, and elders from the two groups prominently welcomed the pope to their land.

The young church

The pope's primary focus was on the thousands of young Catholics who came from some 170 countries to participate in the July 15-20 World Youth Day and reflect on its theme, "You Will Receive Power When the Holy Spirit Has Come Upon You, and You Will Be My Witnesses."

More than 200,000 young people attended the July 19 vigil at Royal Randwick Racecourse and, police said, some 350,000 people were at the track for the July 20 closing Mass. World Youth Day officials estimated the crowd at 400,000.

More than 15,000 pilgrims attended from the United States, including 12 from parishes in the Diocese of Charlotte.

"Words cannot describe the sense of blessing, the power of Pope Benedict's instruction, the pride of belonging to the one, true, holy and apostolic church at a gathering such as this," said Paul Kotlowksi, director of youth ministry for the Diocese of Charlotte.

"To be there with the Holy Father and 400,000 people ... was a truly spiritual experience," said Terry Aiken, youth minister at Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in High Point.

"It was the experience of a lifetime to see the pope," said Megan Shelton, 18, a parishioner of Immaculate Heart of Mary Church.

"It was amazing to see all the other pilgrims from other countries. Everyone was so excited to be there and to see the pope," she said.

"Do not be afraid to say 'yes' to Jesus, to find your joy in doing his will, giving yourself completely to the pursuit of holiness," the pope said in his homily for the Mass, which included administering the sacrament of confirmation to 24 young people from nine countries.

The world needs the transforming power of the Holy Spirit, he said at the Mass.

"In so many of our societies, side by side with material prosperity, a spiritual desert is spreading: an interior emptiness, an unnamed fear, a quiet sense of despair," he said.

The pope told the young people that opening their hearts to Jesus and cooperating with the gifts of the Holy Spirit would transform their lives and help them bring a life-giving witness to the rest of the world.

The youths participated in three days of catechesis sessions at more than 250 locations across Sydney. The sessions focused on the Holy Spirit as the "soul of the church," but also highlighted the youths' roles in the church.

"As a young person, it was nice to hear that we play a crucial part in its mission," said Shelton.

"We are the hope for the church. We keep it young. We are an important part of it," she said. "It was a renewing of our faith."

Respecting God's creation(s)

Repeatedly during the trip, Pope Benedict described the Holy Spirit as God's creative, life-giving and courage-giving force.

The pope also spoke often of the need to protect the environment and respect the gifts of God's creation, but he made it clear to the young people that human beings are God's greatest creation.

"At the heart of the marvel of creation are you and I, the human family, 'crowned with glory and honor,'" as the Psalms say, he told the young people at the July 17 World Youth Day welcoming ceremony.

Just as the natural environment can be destroyed by selfishness and exploitation, he said, so too can human life be destroyed or damaged by not recognizing human dignity and the plan God has for each person's life.

"Experience shows that turning our back on the Creator's plan provokes a disorder which has inevitable repercussions on the rest of the created order," he said.

truth, goodness and beauty, the pope said.

"Our hearts and minds are yearning for a vision of life where love endures, where gifts are shared, where unity is built, where freedom finds meaning in truth and where unity is found in respectful communion," he said.

'Ambassadors of hope'

After watching a dramatic World Youth Day presentation of the Stations of the Cross through the streets of Sydney, the pope went to visit young people recovering from alcohol and drug abuse and other disadvantaged people being helped by the Alive program of Catholic Social Services.

The pope told them they were "ambassadors of hope" to their peers because they have had the courage to turn their lives around.

"The choice to abuse drugs or alcohol, to engage in criminal activity or self-harm, may have seemed at the time to offer a way out of a difficult or confusing situation," he said. "You now know that instead of bringing life, it brings death."

The pope told them that Jesus loves them unconditionally and prayed that the Holy Spirit would be with them and would make them witnesses of the joy that comes from choosing to cherish the life God has given each of them.

Pope Benedict also set aside a morning to encourage ecumenical and interreligious dialogue in Australia by holding separate meetings with Christian leaders and with representatives of Australia's Jewish, Muslim, Buddhist, Hindu and Zoroastrian communities.

A roundup of Scripture, readings, films and more

Author credits late father for helping her with first children's book

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Doreen Cronin's name is on the first book she got published, but the Catholic children's book author credits her father with a big assist.

Cronin is known in the children's book world for more than a half-dozen titles in the Farmer Brown-Duck series and three titles in the "Diary of a ..." series.

She said that her first book, "Click Clack Moo: Cows That Type," must have had some kind of supernatural assistance from her father, who had died only weeks before. Her father, a police officer, had a great sense of humor.

"Click Clack Moo" — it was very special. It took about 20 minutes (to write). It was just weeks after my father passed. It was like I was channeling something. I felt that my father actually wrote it for me," Cronin said.

"It's never been like that since," the best-selling author continued. "Diary of a Spider" took me at least a year. The average is like six months to a year. 'Diary of a Fly' took longer."

The upside of the slow pace, Cronin noted, is that "I can go back and go back and go back until I can get it right."

"Click Clack Moo" has become the unofficial children's book of the labor movement; in the story, the cows go on strike because Farmer Brown won't give them electric blankets at night.

"The very first publicity request I got (for the book) was at a labor law conference. And I was practicing law at the time — and I am not a labor lawyer," Cronin said.

She said she never sits down with any agenda.

"It's not something you should be doing with kids. Unions didn't even cross my mind when I was writing the book," she noted.

Now the mother of two daughters ages 4 and 2, Cronin said she did not have children yet when she wrote her first four books. "And then when you have kids, you don't have any time," she added.

Cronin has had "Diary of a Worm" and "Diary of a Spider" made into films — well, cartoons — for Scholastic's "Storybook Treasures" DVD series.

"It's just a way to extend that reading experience," she said. The cartoons feature a "read-along" option, something grown-ups would call subtitles.

She didn't set out to be a children's book author. But Cronin had always remembered something her first-grade teacher at Waltoffer Elementary School in Bellmore, N.Y., told her at age 6: "My teacher told me — and this is a lesson on how powerful teachers are — she told me I could be a writer and I believed her."

Although she became a lawyer specializing in commercial litigation — "banks, insurance companies, exciting stuff," Cronin said — she kept writing.

"There is a box full of attempts that have no business seeing the light of day. They're clumsy. Some are absolutely horrible," she said of some of her earlier efforts. "There's a lot of kids who want to write books. There are a lot of adults who want to write books. But I have a thick skin. ... You're going to get rejected a lot," she said.

Cronin, whose mother taught catechism classes at their Long Island parish, appreciated the value of being read to as a child.

"It warms my heart when they head for the bookshelves," she said about her own children. "As a parent, you can never go wrong spending time reading with your kids."

She doesn't try to push her own books onto her children.

"My kids have free rein," Cronin said. "My younger daughter will say 'Click Clack Moo.' My older daughter loved 'Dooby Dooby Moo.'"

Cronin added, "My own kids, God bless 'em — there have been times I have been so tired, I was begging my daughter to watch TV and she would hand me a book."

Nourishment of God satisfies, is life-sustaining

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Last week I had a medical procedure that required me to go without solid food for 24 hours beforehand.

The fasting wasn't too difficult until about the 18th hour when my children decided to make pizza and brownies for dinner — two of my favorite "comfort foods."

The tantalizing aromas assaulted me with a force I hadn't thought possible.

My teenage son teasingly tried to console me with the observation that there was nothing like a period of deprivation to make "real food" taste exceptionally good again.

After my procedure the next day, I left the doctor's office, went straight to the nearest restaurant for lunch and proved my son right by exclaiming over every bite as if I had never eaten food before.

The readings for this Sunday are all about "comfort food." It is indeed "rich fare," the kind of sustenance that comes from looking hopefully, listening, heeding and desiring God's life above all else.

It's the sort of food that comes "in due season," often through the experience of deprivation or suffering, when we find ourselves in a "deserted place" as Matthew's Gospel portrays or in a time of great distress as described by St. Paul.

It is the bread of trusting in God's promises and the water of conviction that nothing "will separate us from the love of Christ."

Millions of people today live constantly with the demoralizing burden of hunger, and they must be physically fed in order to survive.

But Mother Teresa of Calcutta described an even more pervasive hunger, observing that "there is more hunger in this world for love and appreciation than for bread," and she declared that this is the reason "Jesus made himself the bread of life to satisfy our hunger for his love."

The nourishment that the Lord promises is not the cuisine that can be bought in a restaurant or prepared in a kitchen.

It is, however, the satisfying, comforting and life-sustaining food of God's love, freely given to those who most hunger for it and gratefully given, in turn, by those who have been filled.

Questions:

For what do you most find yourself hungering and thirsting?

Who do you know that is hungry for the love and appreciation God can provide through your words and actions?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"Heed me, and you shall eat well" (Isaiah 55:2b).

In interview, Lennon called himself 'one of Christ's biggest fans'

LONDON (CNS) — British radio has broadcast an interview with John Lennon in which the late singer-composer claimed the Beatles were a Christian band that wanted to bring people closer to God.

In the interview, aired for the first time in the United Kingdom, Lennon described himself as "one of Christ's biggest fans."

He claimed he was misunderstood when he said in 1966 that the Beatles were "more popular than Jesus," and he expressed disappointment that he could not marry his second wife, Yoko Ono, in a church.

The interview was conducted in Montreal by the Canadian Broadcasting Corp. in 1969 when Lennon, who was raised an Anglican, was at a peace protest. Three years ago, National Museums Liverpool bought the interview, which was broadcast on British Broadcasting Corp. Radio Four's Sunday program July 13.

The Liverpool-born musician was asked to clarify infamous remarks to the London Evening Standard newspaper in which he said that Christianity will "vanish and shrink" and might not outlast rock and roll.

Lennon said: "It's just an expression meaning the Beatles seem to me to have more influence over youth than Christ."

"Now I wasn't saying that was a good idea because I'm one of Christ's biggest fans," he said. "And if I can turn the focus of the Beatles on to Christ's message, then that's what we're here to do."

He said: "If the Beatles get on the side of Christ, which they always were, and let people know that, then maybe the churches won't be full, but there'll be a lot of Christians dancing in the dance halls."

He said he thought "community praying was probably very powerful" but that he was against "the hypocrisy and the hat-wearing and the socializing and the tea parties."

He said he did not have a notion of a "physical heaven," adding that "the kingdom of heaven is within you, Christ said, and I believe that."

The interview was given the year Lennon quit the Beatles and embarked on a solo career that ended with his death in 1980 when he was shot by Mark Chapman in New York.

Knights thank Harris Teeter for assistance

Grocery store recognized for assisting fundraising efforts

CHARLOTTE — The Knights of Columbus recently expressed their gratitude to a local grocery store.

Richard White, grand knight of Knights of Columbus St. Matthew Council 10852 and corporate chairman of the Knights' L.A.M.B. Foundation of N.C., presented a special Award of Appreciation to Harris Teeter in thanks for its work in helping facilitate donation drives for the foundation.

The presentation took place at a Harris Teeter location in south Charlotte June 27.

The L.A.M.B. Foundation is a public nonprofit organization supported by the Knights of Columbus throughout North Carolina to assist the intellectually disabled. The Knights raise funds through their "Operation L.A.M.B." Tootsie Roll drive, by soliciting donations from shoppers outside retail locations as well as from corporations and individuals.

For years, Harris Teeter has assisted in this effort by allowing Knights to distribute Tootsie Rolls at many of its store locations across the state.

Christy Hubbard, Harris Teeter's southern region operations manager, accepted the award on behalf of the Harris Teeter corporate office, along with Bob Ramsey, general manager of a Harris Teeter location in south Charlotte.

"We are extremely grateful to Harris Teeter for its continued support of our Operation L.A.M.B. program through the years," said White.

"Their assistance is instrumental to the growing success of our program, and their steady support is indicative of Harris Teeter's involvement in our community," he said.

For the past 33 years, the L.A.M.B. Foundation of N.C. has raised more than $17 million for local charities supporting people with intellectual disabilities.

Charities that benefit from annual L.A.M.B. funds include Holy Angels in Belmont, Special Olympics, the O'Berry Center, LifeSpan and the Allegro Foundation.

Charlotte-area Knights construct handicap-accessible ramps

Mullis, 90, uses an electric wheelchair and can now navigate in and out of his home unassisted, thanks to the new ramp.

"We installed it in the back yard, which allowed easier access to the driveway and did not deter from the appearance of the front of the house," said Wilcocks.

Operation Exodus was founded 18 years ago by Joseph Moore, then a member of the Knights council at St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte. The program assists local people in need of outdoor, handicap access ramps.

Moore later became a parishioner of St. Matthew Church, bringing the program to that parish and beyond. Operation Exodus pools volunteers from surrounding Knights councils and parishioners to help with construction.

People who qualify for a ramp either have financial difficulties — completed ramps average $2,000 for materials alone — or an immediate need precipitated by an unexpected event.

The Knights usually build them for individuals, but have built a few for adult and young adult daycare facilities, according to Wilcocks.

"We get many referrals from the N.C. State Division of Vocational Rehabilitation Services," said Wilcocks.

"When we install ramps for them, they reimburse us for the materials used. All other ramps are funded by donations and fundraisers of the Knights of Columbus. We never charge for our labor."

Operation Exodus is a "perfect vehicle" for Knights to accomplish their missions of charity, community, family and service to God, said Richard White, grand knight of Council 10852 at St. Matthew Church.

"It almost always touches upon individuals and families who have enough burdens, without them having to worry about finding out how to get an access ramp constructed," he said.

ASHEVILLE — During Mass July 6, a parishioner was asked to stand and receive a special blessing.

Father Wilbur Thomas, pastor of the Basilica of St. Lawrence in Asheville, extended his hand toward Margaret Hauptle in honor of her 100th birthday on July 7. Enthusiastic applause from the congregation followed the moving tribute.

After Mass, family, friends and fellow parishioners gathered in the parish hall to celebrate. Anne Bazarsky, Hauptle's only child, said her mother enjoyed her party and meeting people, and especially enjoyed her three pieces of cake.

Margaret Hauptle was born in Philadelphia July 7, 1908, three months before Henry Ford released the Model T automobile to the public at a cost of $825, and 15 months prior to the completion of the Basilica of St. Lawrence (then St. Lawrence Church) in October 1909.

In 1950, Margaret married Fred Hauptle, an artist and architect, and their daughter Anne was born in a hospital he designed. The family later moved to Florida, where Margaret would work for the Department of Veterans Affairs until she was 70 years old.

After her husband died and she turned 90, Hauptle went to live with her daughter and son-in-law in Houston, Texas. In 2002, they relocated to Asheville and became parishioners of the basilica.

Hauptle is the proud grandmother of five and great-grandmother of three wonderful children. She maintains a healthy lifestyle and takes no medication, except for a daily vitamin.

Anne Bazarsky said her mother's strong Catholic faith has helped her achieve her 100-year milestone.

My mother has always "turned things over to God, prayed to the saints, read her prayer books and received the sacraments reverently," she said.

"She believes in angels and is devoted to Jesus and Mary. She is always eager to get up on Sundays and go to Mass," said Bazarsky.

While few people live to be 100, even fewer of them are able to walk down the aisle of a large church to sit in the front. Instead of letting the Eucharist be brought to her, Hauptle walks up to receive with her daughter.

The two women pray the rosary weekly and other prayers daily. But faith is not the only secret to Hauptle's longevity.

My mother "never complains," said Bazarsky. "Laughter and love keep her going."

Perspectives

A collection of columns, editorials and viewpoints

Offering signs of welcome

Opening wide parish doors to welcome diversity every Sunday

For her prom this year, my 17-year-old daughter Maria's date was a handsome Samoan football player who is as active as she is in the drama department. They're not "steadies," merely part of a big circle of drama friends. Her friend also happens to be a Mormon.

A few weeks later, my daughter took her Scholastic Aptitude Test for college and so did her friend, so they went out for lunch afterward.

It seemed such a normal event that it was only later that I chuckled. My Irish-Italian Catholic daughter and her Samoan Mormon friend went to lunch for — what else? — Chinese takeout.

Welcome to America in 2008!

Some people are surprised to learn that Anchorage, Alaska, is a very culturally diverse place. Our school system now has more "minority" students than Anglo-Saxons, with people hailing from every spot on the map.

I went to a wedding last weekend. The wonderful music was provided by the parish's regular 10:30 a.m. Mass group, a Samoan choir.

The maid of honor, who was from Los Angeles (no stranger to diversity), quizzed me. "But what's with the Samoans?" she asked. "Why would they come to Anchorage?"

Well, why does anyone move anywhere? Why is my Irish-Czech hometown in Nebraska now 50 percent Hispanic? What brings the Vietnamese to Los Angeles? Why is the best restaurant above the Arctic Circle in Alaska Mexican?

Usually the answer has something to do with jobs and economics. It takes a couple of families settling in. Soon a community is born. Sometimes, in the case of the Sudanese refugees who are settling in Anchorage too, it's to escape persecution at home.

That old cliché, that "the most segregated hour of Christian America is 11 o'clock on Sunday morning" is probably still true, yet our changing parishes show us that the world is rapidly coming to our doorstep.

So how do we open our doors with welcome?

Our pastor saw the changing demographics of our parish and held an "international" night. People were invited to read, pray and sing in several languages at Mass.

A potluck followed with flags of various countries flying over tables of ethnic foods. The idea was to make people feel welcome, and judging by the turnout it was a huge success.

But the challenge lies in making people feel welcome "every" Sunday.

As part of a graduate program I'm in, I've attended Lutheran and Presbyterian services, and I've also attended a Hispanic Mass at a nearby parish.

At the Lutheran and Presbyterian services I felt quite at home. I knew friends in the congregations, the sermons were good, and I looked pretty much like everybody else. Despite our liturgical differences, I was comfortable.

But attending the Hispanic Mass was an eye-opener for me. I got a glimpse of what it feels like to be the "other."

Familiar as I am with the Mass, my lack of Spanish made me feel like an outsider. The homily was simply a blur. How I wished I knew Spanish as I sat feeling isolated and alone!

Feeling more comfortable in a Lutheran service than in a Catholic one in another language gave me pause. How hard it must be to feel totally at home in a new parish when one is different from the majority.

The starting place for me is to be conscious that others may feel isolated and alone in my parish. The next step should be reaching out intentionally at every Mass to offer some sign of welcome.

Mission trips on the rise: Are they a good thing?

Trips often expand our world, build bridges and faith

Some people snidely call them "vacationaries." Other people call it "religious tourism."

Whatever you call it, the number of people going on short "mission trips" with churches is dramatically increasing.

The Washington Post recently reported that more than 1.6 million Americans went on short-term international mission trips in 2005. They spent over $2.4 billion on these trips.

On a recent trip to visit our sister parish projects in Nicaragua, our parish delegation was one of at least four church groups on the plane.

Are these missions a good thing?

Some people say no. They argue that these mission trips are a waste of time and money, that it makes no sense to spend thousands of dollars to fly unskilled workers to do some job that could be done more cheaply by the locals who need money, not visitors.

Others argue that these visits are a kind of social "voyeurism" for rich people who gawk at the poor, and that the trips are too short for people to learn much.

I've heard the criticisms. There are problems. But on balance, I still think these missionary trips are a very good thing.

Which would you prefer: young people spending a week on a mission trip fixing up a community center in rural Mexico or at some drunken "beach week" in Cancun? Would it be better if retired folks spend money on five-star hotels or on an orphanage in Guatemala?

These mission trips change people for the good. People learn, grow in maturity. Even without language skills, young people can learn more in a one-week mission trip than in a semester of classes.

These missions often lead to longer missionary efforts. Maybe participants will join the Jesuit Volunteer Corps or one of over 100 Catholic mission groups listed in the "Response" catalogue.

My parish now has a decade of experience with mission trips. Our youth go on religious work camps every summer. We have at least one adult mission trip every year.

We have two sister parish relationships in Mexico and Nicaragua. We have done rebuilding trips after Hurricane Katrina.

All these trips expand our world — and build our faith. We have made mistakes, but I think we have learned a few things.

1. Allow the Holy Spirit to lead. We don't go out looking for "mission trips"; we let them come to us.

Our relationship with Mexico, for example, began because Mexican migrant workers in our area were coming to Mass at our church. Gradually we got to know them and their hometown.

2. Go only where invited. Our trips to Mexico, Mississippi and Nicaragua were the result of an invitation from the local pastors.

3. Each mission involves an exchange. We don't have answers to many problems, but we listen to the local people.

They listen to us too. We invite them to visit us if they can.

4. It takes lots of time to build a relationship. Our first adult mission trip came after a parishioner spent a whole year on a Native American reservation.

In Nicaragua, we sent money to build houses for four years before we visited.

5. It is a spiritual relationship we travel to nurture; we are not going to strangers. We go to see our brothers and sisters in Christ.

They can help us with prayer, just as we pray for them.

All of these mission trips break down barriers and build up bridges. As St. Paul said in his letter to the Ephesians "We are strangers and aliens no longer but fellow members of the household of God."

If these trips teach us that, they are worth it.

Focus on fathers, too

I am in agreement with what columnist Stephen Kent wrote regarding the incident of teen pregnancy in Gloucester, Mass. ("The point is not the prestige pregnancy pact," July 11).

The focus should not be on some sort of pact among the young women, but I would suggest that it needs to go beyond Mr. Kent's suggestion that the parents "should look to reasons for their daughters' low self-esteem." In these situations, society's focus is almost always on the young women and their parents. That focus covers only half the people in this situation. These young women did not become pregnant on their own.

Letter to the Editor

As such, the focus should include the young men and their parents. The young women and men were integral to the pregnancies. The parents of the young women and men are equally integral to the developments in this situation.

Why the embryo matters

Embryo will determine society's value on human life

At their Spring 2008 general meeting, the U.S. bishops overwhelmingly approved a new statement on embryonic stem-cell research.

This is their first formal statement as a body specifically on this issue, though the bishops' conference and many individual bishops have certainly spoken out over the years.

A fair question would be: Why now? What is new to warrant a more formal statement on the principled case against killing human embryos for their stem cells?

Two things are new.

First, the national policy debate is about to be renewed in a more intense way. Next year a new congress and president will face this issue, and currently no presidential nominee supports President Bush's position against funding stem-cell research that requires destroying human embryos.

This is a good time to remind Catholics and others what is at stake.

Second, this debate has reached a turning point in the scientific and medical community, though many politicians are slow to notice this.

For years, the pro-life movement has said there are other and better ways to pursue the medical promise of stem-cell research. It has become increasingly obvious that this is exactly right.

Stem cells from adult tissues and umbilical cord blood have been used in clinical trials to repair heart damage, restore sight and treat conditions such as multiple sclerosis and juvenile diabetes.

A new technique for "reprogramming" adult cells has produced cells with the properties of embryonic stem cells, without creating or destroying embryos — and prominent experts are abandoning embryo research in favor of this approach.

This is not to say that promising alternatives will simply make this issue go away. But the noise about the "unique promise" of embryo research may die down enough to allow the moral argument to be heard.

If we have two promising ways to advance medicine, and one of them is free of moral problems, wouldn't everyone prefer that route?

A deeper question is: Why the embryo? Is this little "ball of cells" worth all the fuss?

The bishops' statement has compelling answers to that question. But in brief, this is where the battle on human life is joined, because it is here that Americans are being told to subsidize deliberate destruction of innocent human lives for a supposed "greater good."

Experts defending this research know that the embryo is a living member of the human species — but they deny that he or she has fundamental rights, because the qualities that they think make up "personhood" are lacking.

Life Issues Forum

RICHARD M. DOERFLINGER
GUEST COLUMNIST

The fact is, those qualities may be lacking in some very young, very old and very disabled people after birth as well, and some ethicists are openly considering how useful it would be for medical progress, or even for cost control, to expand the category of humans with no rights.

The human embryo, like the unborn child generally, has become our society's "canary in the mine" — the helpless creature whose life or death will tell us whether we still hold to the inherent and equal value of each human life, or have allowed a deadly toxin into our culture allowing the strong to oppress the weak in the name of "progress."

That's a question we have to get right.

When evangelization is at its best

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

As I drove by a construction site in Washington, young Hispanic laborers could be seen working. I was again struck by this phenomenon when visiting the Franciscan Monastery where swarms of young Hispanic men were renovating it.

Two words best describe their spirit: proud and energetic. When returning from work in the evening, I couldn't help but notice how they strutted proudly to the subway station.

I had to wonder how many of these young men have that same pride in our church and energize it with their presence.

A recent report from the Center for Applied Research in the Apostolate at Georgetown University states that "Latino(a) teens will soon comprise more than half of all adolescent Catholics in the U.S. However, as a group they are more religiously disengaged than other Catholic teens."

The report brings back memories of national studies I helped conduct for the U.S. bishops that warned that the church stood a good chance of losing substantial numbers of young adult Hispanics in the new millennium. Why is this so?

Hispanics, more often than not, are being assimilated into the profane and secular parts of U.S. society. For example, many of the TV programs they watch display a growing irreverence for the sacred.

Another contributing factor to decreasing numbers is the efforts of evangelical groups using every means possible to attract Hispanics.

Years ago, I co-sponsored a study with Jesuit Father Joseph Fitzpatrick, who specialized in Puerto Rican studies. When I walked up Fordham Lane to Fordham University in New York to work with him, it was like being in Puerto Rico, Cuba and Mexico.

I would often think how easy it is to be swallowed up in the glamour of a big city and lose your faith.

No doubt parishes are doing their best to encourage Hispanic youths to cherish their faith. Much more, however, must be done for those who are religiously disengaged! Hispanic Catholics must be empowered to pull themselves up by their own boot straps!

Years ago I went down to Guatemala to be with Maryknoll missionaries. While there, I witnessed young Mayan men come in from the hillsides, spend days at the cathedral in Huehuetenango preparing to be catechists, and then return to their villages to catechize their people.

I have to wonder what would happen if our Catholic funding agencies helped to create a Hispanic catechetical movement similar to the one in Huehuetenango.

Evangelization is at its best when those evangelizing are of the same culture of those they evangelize.

Purr more, hiss less

Cats give us heavenly lessons for living

I've always loved cats, ever since my beloved father brought home a sweet little kitten as a gift for me when I was 6.

I named her (or him, who knew then???) "Kitty." Immediately I had a bosom friend.

I had Kitty for a year. Then a neighbor who didn't like my cat put poison on the fence between our yards; Kitty died.

I screamed a lot and prayed to God to take care of Kitty in heaven. I had just made my first holy Communion and my new God answered prayers!

My dad immediately got me another cat. We moved to different house, and I was never without a cat for decades after that.

When asked why I liked cats so much, I could only answer with a shrug and a smile. But now I have some answers found in a charming, illustrated book, "Purr More, Hiss Less: Heavenly Lessons I Learned From My Cat."

Author Allia Zobel Nolan was formerly the editor of religious books for children at Reader's Digest.

"Cats can teach us the most profound things about life," says Nolan. "My buddies (cats), for example, have shown me how not to hold grudges (hiss, spit and get over it); the importance of sharing (never bring dead snakes home unless you have enough for everyone); and how to be content in any situation (as long as there is a warm lap to lie in). And that's not the half of it."

I never thought of cats that way! Nolan says she's learned from her tubby cat that "God doesn't care how much you weigh."

From a jealous cat, rejected, it is clear that "you win over more people with a purr than a hiss," Nolan adds, and from the very mistaken cat who tries to carry a pile of everything we are taught not to "be a slave to your possessions."

How about this bit of wisdom from her wise cat: "Life is precious, even if you have nine of them."

I spoke with the author recently, and she convinced me that "we'd all live kinder, gentler, less stressful lives if we took life lessons from our cats."

Here are a few more wise ways that she says her cats have taught her:

— "If at first you don't succeed, take a nap and try again."

— "You're one of a kind; so don't be a copycat."

— "It's better to use your head than your claws."

— "If you must walk over people, do it quickly."

— "It doesn't matter what color you are, or whether you're shorthaired or longhaired."

I could have added to this list, "If you're a mother, be as good as a cat mom," for talking to Nolan brought back so many memories of such a good cat mom.

The momma cat I had when I was 13 moved her litter to our attic for their safety I guess. Then one of her little ones fell down between the inside and outside attic walls.

Unable to reach it, the momma cat then brought her other little ones back downstairs.

I was devastated, crying that my kitty was going to die. But then, my wonderful dad broke through the wall and rescued the kitty.

He gave her back to its momma, who cuddled her lovingly.

CHARLOTTE — Although a fire had scorched a portion of their parish hall, the Charlotte-area Vietnamese Catholics worked to turn a negative into a positive.

After raising funds and performing much of the manual labor, they have repaired and expanded the parish hall at St. Joseph Church in Charlotte.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis dedicated the renovated facility July 27. The event was a visual pageant featuring native Vietnamese dress, music and expression of worship.

"Today is a joyous day for St. Joseph Church," said Bishop Jugis, who celebrated a Mass preceding the dedication.

FROM ATLANTA TO BEIJING

Kathleen Hersey, 18, an All-American swimmer and 2008 graduate of Marist School in Atlanta, is at the Olympic Games in Beijing, China, where she'll compete in the women's 200-meter butterfly. She is pictured in an undated photo.

Catholic school grad to compete in Olympic swimming event

ATLANTA (CNS) — The video camera was on in swim coach Terry Blish's office at Marist School in Atlanta, and all day teachers, friends and teammates stopped by to record words of encouragement and good luck to alumna Kathleen Hersey.

They were sending gold-medal wishes to Hersey, 18, an All-American swimmer and 2008 Marist graduate who will compete in the women's 200-meter butterfly at the Olympic Games in Beijing.

Blish planned to send a DVD of everyone's good wishes to Stanford University, where Hersey was training prior to the Aug. 8-24 games.

At the Hersey home, the swimmer's parents have been speaking to their daughter briefly on the phone every night, trying to keep the conversation light, her father said. They don't talk about swimming.

"As parents we try to be supportive and capture the lighter things, like what are you doing for fun," he said.

Swimming became Kathleen Hersey's life once she took first place at a county meet when she was 6, and it became a natural extension of her parents' lives.

She also played soccer and took ballet, tennis and piano lessons, but soon realized that she wanted to devote all her energy to swimming, said her mother, Regina.

Kathleen joined the swim team when she was accepted at Marist for seventh grade; the school has students in grades 7 through 12.

In her four years on the varsity team, she won 13 individual state titles in the 100-meter butterfly and 200-meter individual medley, breaking school, state and national prep school records, Blish said.

Between 2005 and 2007 she rose from 77th to sixth in world rankings in the women's 200-meter butterfly. Last summer she won four gold medals at the Pan American Games.

At Swim Atlanta, where she trained, she swam three to four hours a day, six days a week. She participated in all Marist team meetings, retreats and meets and maintained a 3.6-grade-point average.

While they will be hoping for a gold medal for their daughter, the Herseys have already had their prayers answered, they said. The St. Jude the Apostle Church parishioners could not have children, but always prayed for a child. Eighteen years ago they adopted Kathleen.

Despite her swimming accolades, it was her gratitude for her adoption that she wrote about in her senior-year essay, said Blish.

"She wrote that she was so grateful that her birth mother chose life and that she was so grateful that her parents are her parents," he said.

Hersey, who will attend the University of Texas on a swim scholarship in the fall, will make a mark in Beijing, said Blish. "It's going to be recognized all over the world what a wonderful young lady she is."

Calls for action, prayer follow professor's desecration of host

ST. CLOUD, Minn. (CNS) — The pastor of the Catholic parish in Morris and a spokeswoman for the Diocese of St. Cloud have urged Catholics to contact the University of Minnesota-Morris to express their anger about a professor who desecrated a host reported to be consecrated.

They also asked Catholics to pray for Paul Z. Myers, the professor, and for others who share his views.

Myers, in a blog posting in early July, vowed to desecrate a consecrated host and asked readers to send him "some consecrated Communion wafers."

On July 24 he posted a photo showing he had put a nail through a host he said he had received in response to his request.

Catholics should "share their outrage that the school continues to employ someone who so blatantly attacks the Catholic Church's beliefs and what she holds to be most holy," said Rebecca Kurowski, director of communications for the St. Cloud Diocese, which includes Morris.

"While we must condemn the attacks he makes, we must not condemn him, but pray for him out of love," said Father Timothy Baltes, pastor of Assumption Church in Morris. "Only God can touch such a heart, and that is what we pray for."

Myers, who teaches biology at the school, announced on his personal blog July 24 that he pierced a Communion host — along with pages from the Quran — with a rusty nail and threw it in the trash. A picture of the act is posted along with the entry. He called the host "a cracker."

"The diocese is horrified about P.Z. Myers' attacks against holy Communion," Kurowski said. "We wholeheartedly condemn the attacks he makes. Yet, legally, there is nothing that we can do to stop this outrageousness."

FROM THE VATICAN

Muslim leader expresses hope that pope will visit Syria for Pauline year

Cardinal: Pope may visit Africa in 2009

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The grand mufti of Syria, Ahmad Bader Hassoun, said he has invited Pope Benedict XVI to Damascus to celebrate the year of St. Paul, the apostle converted on the road to Damascus.

The grand mufti, a leader of Syria's 18 million Muslims, met with Italian journalists who were visiting Damascus as part of their own celebration of the Pauline year.

Vatican Radio reported Aug. 1 that Hassoun said he hoped to meet Pope Benedict in Rome and he hoped the pope would visit Damascus before the Pauline celebrations end next June.

The pope convoked the yearlong celebration to mark the 2,000th anniversary of St. Paul's birth.

The Vatican Radio report said

Syria is not the only country that has extended a Pauline year invitation to the pope.

"Other nations in the Middle East that saw the passage or presence of St. Paul on their territory" have done likewise, Vatican Radio said, although it did not name the countries.

The Vatican has not confirmed any papal trips outside Italy after the pope's Sept. 12-15 trip to Paris and Lourdes, France.

However, in late July, Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, Vatican secretary of state, told an Italian Catholic newspaper that while decisions about papal travel for 2009 have not been finalized, Africa is likely to be on the list.

"The church in Africa deserves a trip by the pope," Cardinal Bertone told the newspaper Avvenire.

Vatican official defends life of Italian woman in vegetative state

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Because Eluana Englaro is alive, caregivers must continue to give her food and water, said the president of the Vatican's Pontifical Academy for Life.

Archbishop Salvatore Fisichella, president of the academy, hailed a July 31 decision by the procurator general's office in Milan to ask Italy's Supreme Court to overturn a lower court decision authorizing the withdrawal of nutrition and hydration at the request of the young woman's father.

The procurator general's office said that when Milan's civil Court of Appeals ruled July 9 that the provision of nutrition and hydration could be stopped, it did so without obtaining a clear scientific opinion that the young woman's condition could never improve.

In addition to saying it would take the case to the Supreme Court, the procurator general's office asked the Court of Appeals to suspend its ruling so that Englaro's family does not act before the Supreme Court can rule.

Now 37 years old, Englaro was injured in a car accident in 1992. She has been in what doctors describe as a persistent vegetative state for 16 years.

Archbishop Fisichella said Aug. 1 that the Italian justice system must "put the value of life back in first place. Eluana is a young woman who is alive; she is not attached to any machine and this does not involve pulling any plug."

Carrying out the appeals court decision would involve "simply not giving her anything to eat or drink and this would be a crime, an immense crime," he said. The Italian justice system, he said, also has to recognize that science cannot say with certainty that her condition is irreversible, "which brings us back to the larger theme of the inviolability of life always, everywhere, despite everything."

At the same time, Archbishop Fisichella said no one who has not had a similar experience can judge the young woman's family or families dealing with similar cases.

"I think we need to make a great effort to be close to these people, very close to the families and insist with great force that no one be abandoned in this condition," left alone to care for their loved ones for years on end, he said.

Indian bishops offer prayers, concern after stampede

NEW DELHI (CNS) — India's Catholic bishops expressed condolences and concern after the deaths of 146 Hindus, including 42 children and 50 women, in a stampede at a northern Indian Hindu pilgrimage center.

"It is a matter of great concern for all of us that similar incidents occur at places of pilgrimage and worship," Divine World Father Babu Joseph, spokesman for the Catholic Bishops' Conference of India, said Aug. 4.

He said it was time that "we created better facilities and enforced discipline for the safety and security of pilgrims."

The bishops want authorities to draw up long-term plans to ensure "similar unfortunate incidents do not repeat," Father Joseph said.

The stampede is the third such incident this year at Hindu pilgrim centers in India.

Fun while following in the footsteps

GASTONIA — In keeping with Pope Benedict XVI's convocation to celebrate the 2,000th anniversary of St. Paul's birth, "In the Footsteps of St. Paul" was the theme of this year's faith and culture camp at St. Michael Church in Gastonia.

More than 70 children of the parish took part in the daily sessions and events July 21-25. Each day's program included Mass and centered on various aspects of St. Paul's life and mission.

"We had a focus each day, such as his conversion, teaching and sharing," said Theresa Webster, parish faith formation secretary.

The children also took part in service projects such as making rosaries, writing cards for shut-ins and collecting items for needy children and the St. Vincent de Paul food pantry.

"With the help of 40 volunteers, the children made crafts, played games, traded holy cards of the Apostles, listened to stories, sang, danced and watched the middle schoolers act out St. Paul's life from Acts each day," said Webster.

The 25 high school and college students who volunteered also spent time in eucharistic adoration and prayer, and visited area churches.

"It was a wonderful week for the children, teens and adults," said Webster.

Bishop Jugis dedicates new parish hall at St. Joseph Church

"Jesus promised that wherever two or three of his disciples are gathered together in his name, he is present there," the bishop said during his homily.

"The parish hall is an important center where we will gather for parish activities now and in the future, and Christ will be present there," he continued. "In the activities that take place in the parish hall, we will come to know the presence of Christ, and we will experience the joy of his friendship and grow in his love."

After Mass, Bishop Jugis; Father Peter Tan Van Le, pastor; and Father Peter Pham, priest in residence, took part in a procession of parishioners in traditional Vietnamese costumes, dancing dragons, banners and drums.

After Bishop Jugis and the priests cut the ceremonial ribbon across the parish hall's doors, firecrackers exploded as parishioners and guests filed inside. They watched proudly as Bishop Jugis blessed the hall and those inside with holy water.

"We are very honored to have him with us on this special event," said Paul Tran, parish finance council chairman.

The parish hall was dedicated in memory of the 117 Vietnamese martyrs, who lived during the 18th and 19th centuries and were declared saints by Pope John Paul II in 1988.

During the ceremony at the Vatican, Pope John Paul said the martyrs had remained patriotic despite persecution for their faith.

Building on beliefs

Persecution was something familiar to the first Vietnamese in Charlotte.

The Vietnamese community in Charlotte began in 1981 as a mission program of three churches — Our Lady of the Assumption, Our Lady of Consolation and St. Ann. The 20 or so original Vietnamese families were political refugees, resettled in North Carolina by a number of humanitarian organizations including Catholic Social Services.

Many of the Vietnamese Catholics had been imprisoned by the Communists for their beliefs prior to coming to Charlotte in search of jobs and religious freedom, said Father Tan Van Le.

The priest, who was imprisoned for 13 years and had to celebrate Mass in secret, came to Charlotte from the Diocese of Vinh Long in Vietnam via a diocesan sponsorship.

The community continued to grow and a Baptist church was purchased in 1998. Then-Bishop William G. Curlin dedicated the cultural center under the patronage of St. Joseph in November 1999, when approximately 1,500 Vietnamese were attending Mass regularly.

A church was constructed next to the existing building and dedicated by Bishop Jugis in May 2004. The existing building became the parish hall, to be used for parish functions and activities,

"In the activities that take place in the parish hall, we will come to know the presence of Christ ...."

— Bishop Peter J. Jugis

and community and cultural events.

The entire facility, which then encompassed almost 22,300 feet, was to serve the spiritual and educational needs of then more than 9,000 Vietnamese in the area.

"The church allows Charlotte's Vietnamese community to have a place of worship, a place of education for young people and a place for us to preserve the mother language, tradition and morals of our culture," said Father Tan Van Le in 2004.

Elevating faith

On Sept. 17, 2006, a flash fire from a propane burner damaged a portion of the parish hall. No one was injured and the Vietnamese Catholic community began making plans to repair and expand the facility.

"About 4,000 square feet were added, with a new kitchen area of about 1,800 square feet," said Charlie Scism, the general contractor who oversaw construction.

"A lot of guys from the church volunteered on the construction," he noted.

"We are grateful for all those who, by their work and their contributions, have helped to build this new parish hall," said Bishop Jugis.

St. Joseph Church was one of four missions in the 46-county Diocese of Charlotte to be elevated to parish status July 1, 2007.

The move came after a 2007 study commissioned by Bishop Jugis to determine which of the 23 missions in the diocese might be ready for parish status. The study took into consideration the missions' registered households, Mass attendance and recommendations from the diocesan strategic plan.

The four new parishes all began as missions to serve immigrants of the diocese — Vietnamese and Hispanic.

Keeping with the diocese's policy of not creating "national" parishes — parishes exclusive to one nationality or culture — the four new parishes were to be territorial, with membership consisting of all Catholics within the parish's geographical boundaries.

St. Joseph Church now serves all Catholics in the Steele Creek community.

and most recently served as business manager of the CSS administrative office. Through it all, she demonstrated her ability to adapt to change and took the challenges of each position in stride.

"The challenges," she said, are what she'll miss the most.

"No two days were ever alike," said Bazluki. "Every day was a different challenge."

Bazluki retired this month. She was honored with a farewell party at the diocesan Pastoral Center in Charlotte July 31.

"In each of the subsequent jobs she has undertaken with CSS, she has demonstrated dedication, compassion and a remarkable skill for organization and implementation of services," said Elizabeth Thurbee executive director of CSS.

"Initially, she was a foster parent and opened her home and her heart to pregnant women who needed a safe place," said Thurbee.

Bazluki said she opened her home to pregnant women because she wanted to provide an alternative to abortion.

"Being Catholic, I always thought that while we didn't believe in abortion you couldn't just tell somebody 'no,'" she said, "you had to provide an alternative."

After years of volunteering, she earned a reputation for her reliability and her willingness to help.

It wasn't long before she was asked to assist in other areas of CSS.

First, she was asked to put her accounting background to use in the Refugee Resettlement Office.

"They were literally three months behind," she said, "so the challenge was not only to catch it up, but then to set up the accounting system."

Then in 1979, she heard about the impending arrival of 100 Cambodian refugees to be resettled in Charlotte. She knew she wanted to help, so she asked for the job.

During that year "everything kind of fell into place," said Bazluki, whose primary responsibility was helping the refugees find homes and jobs.

"I found an apartment complex that was completely empty and had been newly renovated. I found a company that was starting up and expanding and hired all my heads of households, and I got all the kids enrolled in school," she said.

When her work was complete she left CSS. Less than one week later, they asked her to come back.

This time Bazluki worked as an assistant in the Refugee Resettlement Office, where she would eventually become director — a position she held for about 10 years.

"When she was hired as director of the Refugee Resettlement Office, she turned her considerable talents toward helping newly arrived refugees adjust to life in the United States," said Thurbee.

"One of the neatest things was working with the refugees," said Bazluki. "You would go to the airport and pick up broken human beings. And within three to six months they were healthy and vibrant and productive members of society again. It was like a complete rebirth."

Now that she is retired, Bazluki plans to travel and get things done around her house.

"I'm not in a hurry to do anything," she said, "just take one day at a time and enjoy it."

sentence and a maximum of life in prison for first-time child sex offenders.

Known more commonly as "Jessica's Law," the act was first passed in Florida in 2005 and was named after Jessica Lunsford, a 9-year-old who was kidnapped, raped and murdered by a sexual predator who had previously been convicted of sex crimes against a child.

The North Carolina signing took place in Gaston County, where Jessica Lunsford was born and lived with her father until they moved to Florida when she was 8 years old.

"All the laws that are passed — Jessica's law, Amber Alert, Megan's Law — they are all named after dead children," said Morrison. "To me, that is the sad part about it."

"The happy part," she said, "is that for years to come, this law will protect children here in North Carolina and other states around the country and hopefully there won't be anymore Jessicas or Ambers or Megans."

Morrison, who has been advocating on behalf of Jessica's Law for the past three years, views her efforts as a mission from God.

"It was never for me," said Morrison. "I did this for the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ. He wanted me to do something to help the children."

She recalled praying before the image of the Divine Mercy at Our Lady of Grace Church in Greensboro in October 2005 when she heard a voice that said, "Help the children. You can help the children."

At the time, "I didn't know what that "I did it for the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ. He wanted me to do something to help the children."

— Janet Morrison

meant," said Morrison.

"A few days later on one of the television news shows, they talked about Jessica Lunsford," she said.

Morrison remembers watching the program and seeing a map designating states that were lacking strong legislation to protect children from sexual offenders — North Carolina was one of those states.

Then she heard the broadcaster say, "Find out how you can help the children."

"And I said to my husband, 'This is what we are supposed to do. This is what God wants us to do.'"

PROTECTING GOD'S CHILDREN

- The Protecting God's Children program utilized in the Diocese of Charlotte educates and trains adults (clergy, religious, teachers, staff, volunteers, and parents) about the dangers of abuse, the warning signs of abuse, the ways to prevent abuse, the methods of properly reporting suspicions of abuse, and responding to allegations of abuse.
- The program began in response to the Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People (charter) issued by the U.S. bishops in 2002.
- To date there have been 690 workshops held throughout the Diocese of Charlotte.
- 18,200 people have participated in the program.
- 17,400 background checks have been processed.

Not sure exactly where to begin, Morrison started by contacting Joe Dawson, founder and C.E.O. of Child Protection Coalition who had lobbied on behalf of the Jessica Lunsford Act in Florida.

Dawson gave Morrison permission to use his petition.

She spent the next three years traveling across the state, speaking to groups of all sizes and gathering signatures in support of the act.

"I come here and I ask you for your signature on a piece of paper to show your support of children," she told the groups.

"And so that was my mission," said Morrison. "And I was happy to tell the story everywhere I went."

"I just think it is important for people to know that God works miracles and uses us if we listen and we pay attention," she added.

"If we listen, God talks to us all the time. We just have to open our ears and our hearts," she said.

Parishioners donate food to help poor in Haiti

the Missionaries of the Poor is an international monastic order of brothers dedicated to serving the poorest of the poor, according to the order's Web site.

The order, which has grown to more than 500 brothers, serves the poor around the globe with missions in Jamaica, India, the Philippines, Uganda, Kenya and Haiti.

Taking initiative

The Haiti Food Drive at St. Matthew Church was started by parishioner Joe George in 2003.

George had visited Cap Haitien in 2002 and was shocked by the level of poverty and the extreme need for food.

Haiti is the poorest country in the Western Hemisphere, with approximately 80 percent of families living below the poverty line, according to the Central Intelligence Agency.

For them, "a good day is when the kids are healthy and they get enough to eat," said Mark Creasser, who took over the food drive in 2006.

Creasser recalled his first visit to Haiti in 2005: "I went down there thinking that I was going to help them," he said.

WANT MORE INFO?

To learn more about the Missionaries of the Poor, visit their Web site at www.missionariesofthepoor.org.

But after the first day he knew he was going to get more out of the experience than he could ever put in.

"They were helping me realize how blessed I am," said Creasser.

A growing need

This year the food drive is needed more than ever as the cost of food continues to climb.

"Prices are up quite a bit from last year," said Creasser, "so for the parish that was a bit more of a struggle."

Last year it cost $9 for a 50-pound bag of rice, according to Creasser. This year that same bag of rice costs $25.

The cost of food in Haiti is even higher than it is here in the United States. As a result, many Haitian families have cut back to eating only one meal a day or every other day.

"The crazy thing to me is that they're really happy and content with what they have," said volunteer Brian Nelson.

Nelson, a 19-year-old student at Lynchburg College in Virginia, saw the extent of Third World-type poverty firsthand while on a mission trip with his family to Jamaica in 2004.

"It was way beyond anything you could ever imagine," he said.

"With a lot of food drives, you don't see where the food is actually going," said Nelson.

It's different when "you've actually seen the people who need this food," he added.

No small task

It takes a lot of people to make it happen, according to Lucie Tonon, who assisted Creasser in coordinating the food drive.

"The most exciting part is seeing how the committee has grown," said Tonon, who has seen it expand from about 12 volunteers in 2006 to more than 30 this year.

"All of our parishioners have responded so enthusiastically to this effort," she said.

The food drive has also had the support of Msgr. John McSweeney, pastor.

"Six years ago one of our parishioners, Joe George, brought to my attention this unique and desperate situation in Haiti," said McSweeney.

"I believe it's important that we as a parish community respond to this global effort to assist those who are less fortunate than ourselves," he said.

The next step

Creasser will go down to Haiti in mid-September when the food arrives to make sure it gets to the right location.

The hope is that eventually Haiti will become self-sufficient in food production. The Missionaries of the Poor currently have a working farm and recently received a donation of 500 chickens.

"We need to get these farmers back on the farms," said Creasser.

"Short term we're committed to having food drives," he said, "but long term we need to encourage every way we can to have them grow and support their own food products."

Augustinian Father James Cassidy, pastor of Our Lady of Lourdes Church in Monroe, and fourth-degree members of Knights of Columbus Council 10615 and members of two other Knights councils are pictured at the church July 17 with the relics of six of the 25 Mexican martyrs canonized by Pope John Paul II in 2000. The relics were brought to several churches in the Diocese of Charlotte as part of a 10-day pilgrimage throughout North Carolina, part of a nationwide tour sponsored by the Knights of Columbus. Each of the martyrs had been a priest and a member of the Knights of Columbus. All 25 martyrs were killed during the persecution of the church in Mexico in the 1920s and 1930s.

KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS

For the LAMBs among us

Knights, Columbiettes present check to St. Matthew Church

CHARLOTTE — The Knights of Columbus and Columbiettes at St. Matthew Church recently gave $4,000 to the parish's special religious education program.

Richard White, grand knight of Council 10852, and Sara Warnecke, president of the Columbiettes Auxiliary 10852, presented the check to Msgr. John McSweeney, pastor, during the council's installation banquet for new officers in the parish's New Life Center June 28.

The funds were provided through the LAMB Foundation of N.C., a nonprofit public charity — supported by Knights of Columbus councils throughout the state — that assists the intellectually disabled.

The foundation's name, LAMB, is derived from the Gospel of Matthew 25:40: "Whatsoever you do to the least among my brethren, that you do also to me."

For the past 34 years, Knights of Columbus in North Carolina have raised funds for the foundation through their "Operation LAMB" Tootsie Roll campaigns, soliciting donations at retail locations while handing out Tootsie Rolls.

Recently, corporate and individual donations also have become a major source of funding for the foundation.

The Knights are assisted in LAMB fundraising by the Columbiettes, the women's auxiliary, and the Columbian Squires, a youth group for males under the age of 18, who volunteer hundreds of hours throughout the year.

During the June 28 banquet, Msgr. McSweeney thanked those in attendance for their efforts and described how the parish's special religious education programs have blossomed dramatically over the last few years.

In particular, the parish's S.P.R.E.D. ministry, which serves parishioners with intellectual disabilities, has tripled in size in the past three years and is now assisting other parishes in the area with starting similar programs.

"The Knights of Columbus of St. Matthew recognize the importance of supporting and fostering the growth of the parish's special religious education programs," said White.

"We are happy to help in any way we can to ensure they flourish. Programs such as these help us truly support the least among our brethren while fostering a sense of community and a more meaningful spiritual life," he said.

Funds will provide covered walkway for residents

BELMONT — Holy Angels recently received a $20,000 check from the LAMB Foundation of North Carolina

John Gouldie, state deputy of the Knights of Columbus, and Bill Scott, past state deputy, presented the check to Regina Moody, president and CEO of Holy Angels, July 3.

Holy Angels is a private, nonprofit corporation that provides programs and services for its residents — children and adults with varying degrees of mental retardation, some of whom have physical disabilities and are medically fragile.

The donated funds will provide for the installation of a canopy over the sidewalk connecting the Moody Place group home and the Morrow Center, where the residents attend school. The covered walkway will allow for a drier, more comfortable walk to and from school during inclement weather.

Gouldie and Scott toured the Holy Angels facility and were impressed with the scope of the programs and services offered, especially the high level of medical care provided to the residents.

They enjoyed seeing firsthand the difference that the many donations from the Knights of Columbus councils to Holy Angels have made over the years.

Farmer says working the land deepens his Catholic faith

OMAHA, Neb. (CNS) — For Curt Arens, working the land of his grandparents' farm along Bow Creek in Crofton not only brings him pleasure and a source of income, but also deepens his Catholic faith.

Raised on that land, the 44-year-old Arens writes about learning how to farm and the importance of his Catholic faith in his first book, "Down to Earth: Celebrating a Blessed Life on the Land."

Arens' 110-page book is filled with short stories about his upbringing and the people who impacted his life — his family and friends and those in his parish and community. It traces his development as a farmer and a Catholic.

"The book is a tribute to the sacredness of rural life, particularly those hardworking, generous people in my own community," Arens said. "It is about the faith and farm lessons I've learned from my parents and grandparents, from my wife, children and in-laws, and from my neighbors and friends."

Arens tells about growing up on the family farm, imparting his personal stories about the details of farm life, of being a good steward, experiencing college and eventually marrying and taking over the family farm from his parents, all with faith at the base of each story.

A veteran freelance writer, Arens and his wife, Donna, have three children.

Arens said he wrote "Down to Earth" because he felt there was a need for more materials and books for rural Catholics and Christians that focus on the unique aspects of being in a rural parish and community and on a family farm.

He said the National Catholic Rural Life Conference, based in Des Moines, Iowa, is a "great organization" that works in this arena, and he wanted to write the book to add something to what is already out there.

"I also think farming is maligned by young people as a career choice because it appears too difficult and poverty-stricken," he said. "It is difficult, sometimes grueling."

"However, there are important rewards in raising a family in a rural area, wrapping oneself in the safety and loving embrace of a close-knit rural parish and community, and being closer than most to God's wonderful creation," he added.

Arens spoke of two messages in the book: that food should never be taken for granted and the importance of deep devotion to the Eucharist and the Mass.

"We have gotten so used to cheap and plentiful food, but family farmers know that food is never guaranteed," he said. "A few minutes of hail or a few weeks of drought can destroy a crop before our very eyes. Months of labor and expense can be dashed away in short order. We truly need to value the gift of food from our Creator."

Jesus could have chosen any medium in which to be present at the Mass, but during the Last Supper he chose the bread, a product of wheat from the fields, and wine, a product of the vine — both agricultural products — to be present every time Mass is celebrated, he said.

"The consecration is a sacred time — one of truly solemn awe — and as Catholics and farmers, we have a special appreciation for this great gift of his presence with us in these products of the land," he said.

Arens said his faith is strong, but still forming. "I am a Catholic who goes through the rhythm of faith like anyone else. However, I have a deep devotion — dating back to my preparation for first Communion with Sister Veronica Wolff at St. Rose of Lima School — to the holy Eucharist and I love the Mass," Arens said.

"I also am keenly aware of God's presence not only at Mass, but in the fields and meadows that I have the honor to steward over," he said.

He said he learns something new about his faith every day from God, his pastor, his family and his friends.

"And believe me," he said, "I'm paying attention."

Jesus' teachings will nourish our salvation

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

I'd been hearing about my friend's housemate, Joe, for awhile before I actually met him. My friend Guy was a leader in our parish, but he also had many rich and interesting involvements outside church life. As I picked up bits and pieces about Joe through Guy's offhand comments, he certainly seemed to fit into the "interesting" category.

Joe was a disabled, working-class guy, a good bit older than Guy, who offered to let him move into his house because he was homeless. I don't know where they met, but they had a friendship that was only occasionally strained by the fact that Guy provided for most of Joe's material needs.

Joe was "unchurched" and not from our community. But after a few months he began coming to church with Guy to meet some new people, and he sort of latched onto his friend's friends.

I was surprised to see that the two men had little in common. Guy was artistic, highly educated, with a deep, broad spirituality. Joe was pretty simple, in poor health and indigent.

A gentleman, Joe didn't push himself on anyone. He slowly immersed himself into the community, one friend at a time. Joe was interested in every person he met and was naturally compassionate. He found ways to "do" for many people in need in the parish. Soon he was practically a fixture at the church at Bible studies, serving at social events and ushering at Mass.

Joe's story reminds me of the woman in this weekend's Gospel. A Canaanite, she wasn't one of the "chosen" people Jesus had come to serve — and he told her so. But she knew him and believed in his saving power, so she insisted on hanging around him, feeding on the "scraps" of his offering. Drawn by her unquestioning faith, Jesus assured the woman of her salvation.

For Joe, the scraps from Jesus that he found in the church community were food enough, but his great faith drew him ever more deeply into the Savior's infinite grace.

"We have nothing."

A mother's desperation and despair trickle down her cheeks with each teardrop. She sobs as she describes her family's situation.

Amarante Desir and her family live in Cité Soleil, the worst slum in Haiti. Living in the poorest country in our hemisphere, this family and many others struggle each day simply to survive.

The Desir family lives in a shack made of scraps of metal, wood and cardboard. The roof leaks when it rains, and the dirt floor turns into mud. Outside, trash and human waste litter the landscape. Amarante whispers, "There's a lot of germs here. The kids get sick a lot."

Many Haitians earn less than $2 a day.
Their struggle for survival is constant.

Amarante often has nothing to feed her family. When she and her children are hungry, the pain in her heart is far worse than the pain of hunger. Watching your children suffer is heartbreaking for a loving mother.

When she has no food or money, Amarante prays to God for help and comfort. God is her strength and refuge. She says, "I feel better after I pray, knowing that God will not leave me, but will give me strength. I feel God's presence when I pray."

Food and fuel prices have skyrocketed throughout the world recently. These increases impact us all, but it is the poor who are affected the most. Mothers like Amarante — who helplessly watch their children suffer — experience this painful reality every day.

"The LORD is close to the brokenhearted, saves those whose spirit is crushed." (Psalm 34:19.)

Hungry families throughout the Caribbean and Latin America pray daily that God will touch the heart of someone like you to send a gift for food. Today, you have the power to bring relief to families in desperate need.

By partnering with Food For The Poor, you can help feed hungry children and their families. Your gift of $45 will feed 15 people for an entire month. A gift of $81 will provide lifesaving food for 27 people, and $150 will feed 50 people for a month. Any act of kindness and generosity will be truly appreciated.

Founded in 1982, Food For The Poor works to end the suffering of the poor throughout the Caribbean and Latin America. Not only do we provide food for the starving; we also build small houses for the destitute, dig water wells for parched villagers, provide medicine and medical equipment for the sick and elderly, support orphanages and education for children, and much more.

Despairing mothers like Amarante plead for help. "Things are not good for us," she says. "Whatever you can do will help. We have nothing. We're not eating or sleeping."

Today, you can answer a desperate mother's heartfelt plea with your gift for food. The Food For The Poor brochure enclosed in this publication contains more information about how you can help hungry families with nowhere else to turn. Your compassion and generosity will be shining reflections of God's love and an answer to the prayers of those who are hungry. Please, send a gift today.

"If there's any way you can help us..."

Your help is needed now more than ever

Food shortages and rising prices are devastating for the poorest of the poor in Haiti. The price of rice and beans has more than doubled in the past year; yet many Haitians earn less than $2 a day. The struggle for survival has become increasingly difficult. Lives are at stake.

Today you have the chance to save a life. The need for food in Haiti is urgent and desperate.

Please use the Food For The Poor brochure enclosed in this publication to send your gift today. God bless you.

The siblings raised $120 and their mother, Natalie Cochran, brought them to CSS's administrative office in Charlotte to deliver the money July 14.

Catholic Scout earns Eagle rank

HICKORY — Daniel Patrick Aberle, 16, of Boy Scout Troop 351 recently earned the rank of Eagle Scout, the highest rank in the Boy Scouts of America.

Family and friends gathered for Mass celebrated May 31 at St. Aloysius Church in Hickory by Father Bob Ferris, pastor. A court of honor ceremony followed.

To achieve the rank of Eagle Scout, Daniel earned 25 merit badges and completed a service project at Bakers Mountain Park in Catawba County. The project involved building a memorial to a soldier, Pfc. A.G. Clark of Catawba County, who was killed in action during WWII at age 22.

The memorial, which is made of local stone and includes a bronze plaque and lithographic photo of Clark, is located at the cabin site where he resided.

In Troop 351, Daniel held the offices of patrol leader, assistant patrol leader and librarian. Daniel also earned the Arrow of Light award, the highest award of Cub Scouts, and the only one that can be carried over into the Boy Scouts.

Molly Patella and Grace Nieters are pictured with food they helped collect during a vacation Bible school event at Holy Family Church in Clemmons in June. As part of the program's mission component, children were asked to bring in food for the Catholic Social Services food pantry in Winston-Salem. Each day they collected a different type of food — cereal, macaroni and cheese, canned pasta and peanut butter and jelly. By the end of the week on June 27, they were able to fill the trunk of a car and the bed of a pickup truck with the collected food.

Strength is virtue, and virtue is strength

Strength myth is spiritual problem in need of attention

When you were a child, did you ever invite an elder to "feel my muscle"?

Little boys and girls alike, but mostly boys, will extend an arm, clench a fist, bend an elbow and stare at the slightest hint of a bulging bicep in the upper arm, saying, "See how strong I am!"

Boys at play (perhaps girls as well) like to adopt strong names. "Call me Steve," was a familiar request in my own childhood circle of friends that included no one named Stephen. "Bobby," "Billy" or "George" just wouldn't do it. Neither would "Jimmy," even in those days of tough-guy Jimmy Cagney movies where the hoodlum was the hero and the cops often objects of ridicule.

"Let me carry him" (usually a younger brother). "I can lift it" (often a piece of porch furniture).

We can all recall our participation in claims or demonstrations of physical strength in those tender years before we ever heard of hernias. The strength myth (strong man, strong woman, strong arm, strong will, strong statement, strong medicine) persists to the point of locking our minds and emotions into some kind of strongbox to which we have lost the key.

This key will open us up to tears, admissions of error or defeat, and an open declaration that we stand in need of help. This is a spiritual problem that needs attention.

Bravery is sometimes prideful ignorance, and ignorance can leave one blissfully unaware of where the real dangers lurk. Strength is virtue, and virtue is strength. The virtuous person will become strongest in the broken places.

This season of summer fun and games is a good time to think seriously about teaching our children the real meaning of strength and especially the relationship of strength to virtue. All of us, young or old, need to be reminded that we can, by God's grace, become strong in our broken places.

Job loss, health setbacks, marital stress, geopolitical problems and personal tensions large or small can drain anyone's strength. I can still hear my exasperated mother saying, "God give me strength!" in reaction to the summertime carelessness of her offspring who hit baseballs through garage-door windows and, on one otherwise unchallenging summer day, dug a large hole behind our house in the first stage of a children's tunnel project intended to connect Philadelphia with Peking.

Perhaps we should make "God, give me strength" a national prayer in these days of soaring gasoline prices, plummeting real estate values, rising unemployment rates, urban crime, highway mishaps and a lengthening list of societal problems.

Many of these problems are likely to get worse over the next few decades. Those who will then be in the driver's seat of any vehicle designed to move us toward social progress are the very youngsters that are enjoying their fun and freedom this summer.

They need adult encouragement now to understand that real strength is strength of character and that qualities like creativity, courage and intellectual competence are the muscles most in need of development.

The faithful pioneers

Sisters of Mercy start new chapter of service in North Carolina

This July, unnoticed by most of us, a new chapter was added to one of the longest, continuous stories of the Catholic Church in North Carolina. The North Carolina Regional Community of the Sisters of Mercy joined together with communities from St. Louis, Cincinnati and Baltimore to form a new and expanded South-Central Community of the Sisters of Mercy of the Americas.

The Sisters of Mercy in Belmont were pioneers in both the dioceses of Charlotte and Raleigh. They trace their roots back to the Sisters of Our Lady of Mercy, now the Sisters of Charity of Our Lady of Mercy, a congregation in Charleston, S.C., founded by Bishop John England.

In September 1869, Sisters from that community arrived in Wilmington, N.C., where a month later they opened the Academy of the Incarnation. The Sisters formed their own North Carolina community in 1872 and, in 1913, accepted the rule written by Mother Catherine McAuley and became affiliated with the Sisters of Mercy as an independent religious community of pontifical right.

The Sisters began Catholic education in North Carolina. In addition to the academy in Wilmington, they established Mount St. Joseph Academy in Hickory in 1880, and schools in Charlotte in 1887, Asheville in 1888 and Belmont in 1892.

For more than 70 years, the Sisters of Mercy staffed the Catholic orphanage at Nazareth, near Raleigh. Nazareth had been founded by Father Thomas Price, one of the first North Carolina priests, whose sister, Sister Mary Catherine Price, was a member of the Mercy community.

The Sisters were active as well in numerous schools in the dioceses of Raleigh and Charlotte. Two particularly significant contributions of the Sisters of Mercy for Catholic education are Charlotte Catholic High School and Sacred Heart College.

The Sisters were the teachers at O'Donoghue School at St. Patrick Church in Charlotte when, in 1955, Charlotte Catholic High School was begun as a separate school for boys. The Sisters continued to administrate Our Lady of Mercy High School for girls.

When the Marianist brothers left Charlotte Catholic, the Sisters of Mercy stepped in to continue with a coeducational program that saved Catholic secondary education in Charlotte. It is due to their generous service that Charlotte Catholic has survived and flourished as the institution it is today.

The Sisters came to Belmont in 1892 and established their motherhouse there. They began a girls' academy in 1892 to serve as a finishing school for young ladies. From this beginning, Sacred Heart College emerged as a junior college in 1935 and a senior college in 1966.

In 1987, financial constraints forced the closing of Sacred Heart College, which was one of only two Catholic colleges in the Southeast between northern Virginia and Florida.

The health care ministry of the Sisters began in the midst of a yellow fever epidemic in Wilmington in the 1860s. Through Mercy Hospital Charlotte, established in 1906, at St. Joseph's Hospital in Asheville, begun originally as a tuberculosis sanatorium, the Sisters provided quality health care permeated by faith and respect.

When these hospitals were so in the 1990s, the Sisters established one of the largest private foundations in the Carolinas to continue to address the educational and healthcare need especially of women and children.

The Sisters once again proved to be pioneers in North Carolina when at a time when AIDS was poorly understood and greatly feared, the established House of Mercy in Belmont as a residence for persons in the terminal stages of the disease.

They continued to reach out to those in need with the founding of Catherine House, a residence where homeless women could find shelter and assistance for themselves and their children.

Perhaps best known of all the work sponsored by the Sisters of Mercy Holy Angels. This ministry began when a distraught young mother left her severely-handicapped infant daughter at the Sisters' doorstep.

Mercy Sister Marie Patrice Manly with the support of her community, took in this little girl, Maria, who is now well into her 50s. She was to be the first of countless children with special needs who have received the love and compassion of this special work.

Holy Angels has grown to be a regionally respected development center for children and adults with varying degrees of mental retardation.

The work of the Sisters of Mercy extended far beyond the Southeast. In 1946, a U.S. Marine returning home from Gastonia from the Pacific approached the Sisters about a foundation in Guam.

Mother Maura Buchheit requested three volunteers for the mission. The result is a thriving community of Sisters on Guam, which has maintained affiliation with the Belmont community and become a part of the new South Central Community.

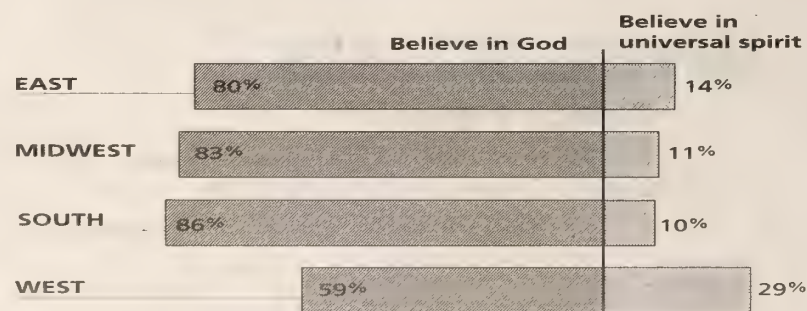

For 139 years, the Sisters of Mercy have built up the church in North Carolina by fidelity to their vow to serve the poor, the sick and the uneducated. The new chapter now beginning in this story holds promise of further blessing.

We N.C. Catholics, beneficiaries of the Sisters' labors, ought to take note of this new chapter as a part of our own story and accompany the Sisters of Mercy with our prayers and good wishes.

Planned giving and stewardship

Giving back ensures the Catholic Church's mission continues

"Planned giving" is a term that can sound imposing and confusing to many people. Simply stated, planned giving is charitable giving that is part of a family's overall financial and estate planning.

For people of faith, estate and financial planning is a key component of stewardship. Stewardship is realizing in our minds and hearts that everything we are and everything we have are God's loving gifts to us; we are merely stewards of those blessings.

There are four basic principles of stewardship:

- praying to God with grateful hearts;
- nurturing our family with time and love;
- sharing our gifts with our community; and
- returning to God the first fruits of our labors.

We understand these principles pretty well during our lives. We pray; we spend time with our families; we volunteer for ministries and activities in our parishes, schools, neighborhoods and communities; and we contribute funds to the Catholic Church and other charities that are important to us.

These same stewardship principles apply to our estate planning — our estate plan can rightly be considered our final act of stewardship.

We should pray for God's guidance on the appropriate distribution of our estate property.

By making a will and executing other estate planning documents, we ensure that our family is taken care of after we are gone.

By making a bequest or other special gift to the church through our parish, school, the Diocese of Charlotte, the diocesan foundation or other Catholic agency, we help ensure that those ministries and activities we supported with our time, talent and treasure during our lives will continue to flourish for many future generations.

And certainly, these bequests and special gifts do in fact return to God the first fruits of our labors.

Estate and charitable gift planning is stewardship of our assets, just like our weekly offerings during our lives is stewardship of our income.

It is common, however, to plan our estate with everything eventually distributed to our family.

However, we should ask ourselves several questions as food for thought in determining our estate and financial goals and objectives:

Legacy Notes

JUDY SMITH
GUEST COLUMNIST

— Is giving relatively large sums of money to my children when they are young a wise thing to do?

— Did I give everything to my children when I was alive, or did I give to the church and other charitable organizations as well?

— Is making a charitable bequest or other special gift in my estate plan my final opportunity to teach my children that everything we are and have is God's gift to us?

These are questions that only you can answer as you develop your estate and financial plan with your family and then review your plans periodically to determine if they continue to meet the goals and objectives of you and your loved ones.

What's behind all these shortage crises?

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE
HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

There is an old saying that multiple accidents need to happen before stoplights are installed at dangerous intersections.

The oil crisis and its repercussions, much like multiple accidents, are finally causing us to erect overdue stoplights, dramatically changing our way of life.

Take, for example, travel plans and patterns that are radically changing in order to conserve jet fuel. Recycling and innovative ways of conserving energy are hitting all-time highs.

Sales of hybrid cars are on the rise, and automobile companies are phasing out SUVs in favor of cars offering even greater gas mileage. Ridership on public transportation has jumped.

Giant windmills now dot the mountainsides of numerous states.

Not long ago all of this was nonexistent. Why the sudden change?

I believe it is because we are in what some refer to as a "Mother Nature" crisis, with Mother Nature adamantly teaching us that we can go to the well only so many times before it dries up. Sooner or later, our burgeoning and unrestrained populations are bound to dry up our natural resources.

We saw this coming but were too sluggish in erecting the stoplights needed to slow us down.

When asked what was behind the oil crisis, a mayor of a large city replied, "We are stuck on stupidity!"

The word "stupidity" means being sluggish in understanding. In our case, too many people who could have made a difference were sluggish in understanding that they were duped by the philosophy of secularism.

The word "secular" means being stuck on the temporal, living for the day and letting tomorrow take care of itself. It translates into not looking beyond our nose, being shortsighted; and it treats nature as if it isn't governed by definite laws.

Secularism is the direct antithesis to our Catholic faith that teaches we are God's stewards charged with caring for his world. A good steward is a guardian who is constantly scanning the horizons for oncoming dangers.

Could it be that the new stoplights, energy and food conservation efforts, are signs of a re-embracing of our God-giving duty of stewardship?

St. Augustine defines prudence as a virtue that helps us to "look, as it were, from afar."

Could it be we are entering a new age of prudence, one in which we are again looking afar rather than just beyond our noses?

Critical of comprehensive reform

I am appalled at the suggestion that we consider rewarding illegal aliens under any circumstances into America ("Considering comprehensive reform," July 25).

According to the U.S. bishops' Justice for Immigrants Web site, "the Catholic bishops are proposing an earned legalization for those in this country in an unauthorized status and who have built up equities and are otherwise admissible." By accepting this premise, we would be rewarding law breakers and criminals.

That policy, or any policy that offers any sanction to illegal immigrants for a nominal punishment, emboldens others to keep trying.

As a first-generation American, I am sickened by the conditions of these poor people's home countries and I strongly relate to their desire to immigrate to our great nation. In many instances, the immigrants pay their life savings to smugglers who abuse them or to be herded under unbearable conditions across the border. If they survive the journey, many end up in gang-controlled barrios (neighborhoods), and their children are indoctrinated into street gangs before their 14th birthdays.

Yes I am saddened that many families are being split by deportation. But by letting people stay, we are encouraging more to come in illegally and suffer under the hands of hardened criminals.

Unfortunately, history has taught us this.

— José M. Rodriguez

Mission trips to help Americans

I usually look forward to Father Peter Daly's Parish Diary column, but I take issue with his writing about mission trips ("Mission trips on the rise: Are they a good thing?" July 25).

Father Daly's response was that they are a good thing. But I disagree with his implication that there are no alternatives to a young person's mission trip except "some drunken 'beach week' in Cancun" and the only alternative for "retired folks" is to "spend money on five-star hotels."

I feel like the money spent on airline tickets by missionaries of any age would be far better spent on building materials and food for people in this country who are in need — from the poor in Appalachia to victims of flooding in the Midwest to those who have lost their homes to fires in the West.

For far less travel money, our missionaries could help rebuild homes and churches and prepare meals for firefighters and those who are trying to start over after losing everything. I know that our young parishioners at St. Francis of Assisi Church have worked hard to finance mission trips to places like Jamaica — this hard-earned money could have gone far in aiding people in our own country.

Father Daly writes that we should "go only where invited." We can't expect pastors in every ravaged area to contact all other parishes asking for help. But I expect if we asked those pastors in devastated areas if they would like us to help, the answer would be "yes!"

They'd probably even offer floor space in churches, schools and gyms to visitors who brought sleeping bags — thus saving motel money for construction materials and food.

'Iron Friar' who is triathlete evangelizes as he swims, bikes, runs

RYE, N.Y. (CNS) — Atonement Father Dan Callahan evangelizes underwater. And on a bike. And while he's running. All on the same day.

And he helps recovering alcoholics and substance abusers at the same time.

Father Callahan, 57, is known as the "Iron Friar" for successfully completing 12 daylong triathlons since 1997. Most recently, he finished the Ford Iron Man USA competition July 20 at Lake Placid in 14 hours and 43 minutes.

Three inches of rain fell while he swam 2.4 miles in Mirror Lake, biked 112 miles through the Adirondack Mountains and ran a 26.4-mile road marathon.

Father Callahan, associate pastor at St. Joan of Arc Church in Toronto, said his goal in competing is "always to finish, enjoy the pizza, be healthy and go to work the next day."

Father Callahan uses the annual race at Lake Placid as an opportunity to evangelize and to raise funds for St. Joseph's Rehabilitation Center in Saranac Lake, where he once served as a pastoral counselor and spiritual director.

St. Joseph's is a facility run by his order, the Franciscan Friars of the Atonement. It provides residential alcoholism and substance abuse services to men and women.

"I talk to the residents two days before the race," said Father Callahan. "I use the race as a foil to talk about recovery. I know what a struggle they have in life, and I know what good people they are."

"I tell them that it's a grueling race for me, but it's nothing compared to the race they're in for their life. I get choked up every year. It's very inspirational," he said.

He also invites his friends and supporters of St. Joseph's to sponsor his race. He has raised more than $100,000 for St. Joseph's through the Iron Man competitions.

Father Callahan said that he is always invited to offer the opening prayer at the dinner on the Friday night before the Sunday race. At the dinner, "there are 2,400 racers there and their families and supporters. I always put in a plug for Mass," he said.

He also is the main celebrant and homilist at the evening Mass at St. Agnes Church the Saturday before the race. It is the most crowded Mass of the year.

"At the end of Mass, the athletes are invited to the sanctuary for a blessing and I take my place with them. The congregation prays over us. Seeing the tears in the eyes of the athletes is a moving experience," he said.

Racers and onlookers invariably approach Father Callahan during the actual competition.

"People thank me for the homily. Some say that a point I made helped them through a tough spot on the course. It's a real evangelizing opportunity. Some (participants) don't have a spirituality beyond running," he said.

Father Callahan said, "For each person, it's a major accomplishment to become an Iron Man. It's a marvelous analogy for life."

Catholics encouraged to pray novena in weeks leading up to election

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The U.S. bishops are encouraging Catholics to pray a novena for life, justice and peace before the November election.

The U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops has made available for download from the Internet a podcast of a "Novena for Faithful Citizenship" at www.faithfulcitizenship.org/resources/podcasts. It will be available until the Nov. 4 election.

The special novena is part of "the bishops' campaign to help Catholics develop well-formed consciences for addressing political and social questions," said Joan Rosenhauer, associate director of the USCCB's Department of Justice, Peace and Human Development.

The bishops adopted the document "Forming Consciences for Faithful Citizenship: A Call to Political Responsibility" in November 2007.

The "Novena for Faithful Citizenship" runs for nine days and can be used consecutively, one day each week, for nine days prior to the election, or "in any way that works best for a community or individual," said Rosenhauer.

"Novena" comes from the Latin word "novem," meaning nine, and the prayer form first appeared in the Middle Ages in France and Spain. A novena is usually held prior to a special feast or for a special intention.

The USCCB Web site suggests ways Catholics can pray the "Novena for Faithful Citizenship."

Helen Osman, USCCB communications secretary, expressed hope the novena could help "Catholics enter into prayerful reflection as they prepare to vote."

Osman said the USCCB wants to support Catholics as they weigh pre-election issues and that "providing a prayer resource on the Web can help us focus on our common values and identity as Catholics."

FROM THE VATICAN

Pope urges church to help overcome racism in modern society

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI warned that racism is alive in modern society, and he urged the church to help overcome all forms of racial intolerance.

He said racism today is often tied to economic and social problems. Although such problems may be real, they can never justify racial discrimination, he said Aug. 17.

While the pontiff did not mention specific countries, his words had an immediate echo in Italy, where a series of government actions against illegal immigrants have prompted strong debate inside and outside the church.

The pope, addressing pilgrims at his summer residence in Castel Gandolfo outside Rome, began his remarks by quoting the prophet Isaiah about the "foreigners" who will be included in the Lord's universal house of prayer.

Likewise, the pope said, the church today is made up of people of every race and culture, and part of its mission is to help forge bonds of communion between races.

That task includes "helping civil society to overcome any possible temptation to racism, intolerance and exclusion," he said. "One of humanity's great achievements is, in fact, overcoming racism."

The pope said various countries had "new, worrisome signs of racism, often tied to social and economic problems," but such problems could "never justify racial contempt and discrimination."

The pope asked for prayers so that mutual acceptance may grow in the world.

In Italy, some Catholics have criticized the government's new crackdown on illegal immigration and other security measures, saying they are racially discriminatory.

Pope approves beatification of St. Therese's parents in Lisieux

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI has approved the beatification of Louis and Marie Zélie Guérin Martin, the parents of St. Therese of Lisieux.

The couple will be beatified Oct. 19, World Mission Sunday, during a Mass in the Basilica of St. Therese in Lisieux, France, the Vatican announced Aug. 19.

St. Therese and St. Francis Xavier are the patron saints of the missions. The Vatican did not say who would preside at the Martins' beatification Mass.

With beatification, the diocese where the candidate lived or the religious order to which the person belonged is authorized to hold public commemorations on the person's feast day. With the declaration of sainthood, public liturgical celebrations are allowed around the world.

The Martins were declared venerable, one of the first steps in the sainthood process, in 1994. But the miracle needed for their beatification was not approved by the Vatican until early July.

Louis lived 1823-1894 and his wife lived 1831-1877. They had nine children, five of whom joined religious orders.

Also Aug. 19, the Vatican announced four other beatification ceremonies:

— Sister Vincenza Maria Poloni, founder of the Institute of the Sisters of Mercy in Italy, will be beatified Sept. 21 in Verona, Italy.

— Father Michael Sopocko, founder of the Sisters of Merciful Jesus and spiritual director of St. Faustina Kowalska, will be beatified Sept. 28 at the Church of Divine Mercy in Białystok, Poland.

— Father Francesco Pianzola, founder of the Missionary Sisters of the Immaculate Queen of Peace, will be beatified Oct. 4 in Vigevano, Italy.

— Father Francesco Giovanni Bonifacio, martyred in 1946 by Yugoslav communists, will be beatified Oct. 4 in Trieste, Italy.

Paul beginning Sept. 2. Topics will include St. Paul's teachings on faith and works, marriage and chastity, the church and sacraments, the Jews and the rapture. For more information, contact Gus Magrinat at gmagrinat@pol.net or John Malmfelt at jmalmsie@aol.com.

GREENSBORO — All practicing Catholic women of Irish birth or descent, or who are the wife of a member of the Ancient Order of Hibernians are invited to participate in the Ladies Ancient Order of Hibernians, a social, cultural and charitable group for an ongoing series of fun and informative activities. A South Ossetian woman distributes food aid Aug. 15 at a Greek Orthodox Church in Ts'khinvali, the capital of the Georgian province of South Ossetia. A Georgian attack on the breakaway province of South Ossetia Aug. 7 followed by a Russian invasion of Georgia left an unknown number of dead, including civilians, and prompted an estimated 60,000 people to flee their homes. Pope Benedict XVI urged the international community to establish humanitarian corridors in Georgia so that the dead could be buried, the wounded receive medical help and refugees return home.

Five Greensboro churches build Habitat for Humanity house

Volunteers took a break from their hammering Aug. 15 when Msgr. Anthony Marcaccio, pastor of St. Pius X Church, came out to bless the site, the workers and the undertaking.

"It is a wonderful opportunity for inner-parish activity that will benefit our community," said Msgr. Marcaccio in an interview.

Fundraising for the project began in January, when Msgr. Marcaccio signed the intent form with Habitat for Humanity confirming the parishes' commitment to actively participate in the building of a house in Greensboro.

"When Msgr. Marcaccio expressed interest in a Habitat for Humanity project, it was met with immediate enthusiasm from all of the parishes," said Joe Bauer, co-chair for the build and parishioner of St. Pius X Church.

In addition to the five churches — St. Pius X Church, St. Paul the Apostle Church, Our Lady of Grace Church, St. Benedict Church and St. Mary Church — also involved with the build are students from Bishop McGuinness High School in Kernersville and Catholic organizations such as the Knights of Columbus.

"It is a great thing to do together," said Msgr. Marcaccio of the joint effort, "People have been very generous."

Each parish was assigned a financial goal.

It cost $60,000 in supplies to build a Habitat for Humanity house, but the overall goal was to raise $65,000.

The extra money was sent to a Habitat for Humanity affiliate in Honduras, where houses can be built for just under $5,000.

This will be the first home built in Greensboro by the Catholic churches since 1997.

"It is a wonderful opportunity to build bridges within the community, particularly with people of different faith traditions," Bauer said.

The recipient of the home is a Muslim family with two young daughters.

"We are very happy to embrace people of other traditions and honor the diversity in our community," said Bauer.

At this point, construction is projected to take 17 weeks. The goal is to have the family in the home before Christmas.

Habitat for Humanity of Greater Greensboro was formed in 1987 and is the 16th largest affiliate nationwide. Habitat for Humanity partners with sponsors and people in need around the globe to build decent, affordable homes and help eliminate poverty housing.

With the construction of the house underway, Msgr. Marcaccio said he hoped the effort has "helped raise awareness for the need of housing and the ministry of Habitat for Humanity."

"This is a way of introducing the ministry to our parishes so that it can be continued," he said.

Bauer said he also hopes this will be the first of many collaborative efforts between Habitat for Humanity and the Catholic parishes of Greensboro.

"The mission is to build bridges and to break down walls of prejudice," he said. "As people of faith, that is what we are called to do."

PRIESTS' RETIREMENT

Father Edward Sheridan, a retired priest of the Diocese of Charlotte, celebrates Mass in a chapel on his property in Hickory June 24. Also pictured are Carl Larson and Rita Borst. Father Ed Sheridan often invites friends and former parishioners to join him for daily Mass.

'Still Sowing the Seeds of Faith'

Upcoming collection helps both retired and active priests in diocese

For retired priest Father Edward Sheridan, the theme of this year's diocesan Priests' Retirement & Benefits Collection — "Still Sowing the Seeds of Faith" — has a special meaning.

It might refer to the way he stewards God's beautiful works of creation that surround him at his retirement home, "The Hermitage," near the Catholic Conference Center in Hickory.

Or it may reflect the many ways he continues to share God's word with the individuals and small groups who still come to him for spiritual direction, prayer and reflection.

Either way, Father Ed is "still sowing the seeds of faith" in his retirement.

Nearly every window of Father Ed's humble home boasts a view of nature that inspires his quiet prayer time. The tiny chapel on the grounds provides another place for quiet prayer and the celebration of the Eucharist.

Father Ed often invites friends and former parishioners to join him for daily Mass. On other occasions, his little Marian grotto is a space for praying the rosary and reflecting.

Father Ed's words of faith, hope and encouragement are yet more ways he continues to sow the seeds of faith.

This past spring, some of the young families from St. Aloysius Church spent the day on his 30-acre hermitage.

Karen Taylor and Andrea Haas, whose children participated in the family day of reflection, were happy to see their children's enthusiasm for the outdoor Mass.

Another time, a few families brought tents and camped out in the meadow on top of a hill overlooking the conference center. Father Ed provided prayer and stories that were cherished by all.

Father Ed is part of a brotherhood of 25 retired diocesan priests who are "still sowing the seeds of faith" in various ways throughout the diocese and beyond.

Some are involved in ministry to the sick; others visit the imprisoned; and still others help in parishes when the pastors are away. All of these men pray daily for the people of this diocese. Our retired priests continue to live as good stewards of their God-given gifts and talents.

Our generosity to the annual collection for the priests' retirement and

Guest Column

benefits plans is one way we can express our gratitude for the many ways these retired priests continue to bless us. Of the collection, $444,000 is allocated to the retired diocesan priests' health plan.

This collection assures also that those priests who are currently in active ministry will have funds available when they retire — $560,500 will be directed to pension contributions for the diocesan priests' retirement plan.

A total contribution of $414,500 also will be made to the retirement plans of the 11 religious orders serving within our diocese.

Each parish is assessed 3.5 percent of its annual offertory collection to raise the funds needed to support these priests' retirement and benefits plans. For most of our parishes, that represents just a little less than two times their regular Sunday offertory. So if every parishioner would make a contribution that is about twice the amount he or she puts in the regular weekend collection, our parishes would be able to pay the assessment.

Some parishioners' budgets might require them to stretch that gift out over a month or more. Each parish has additional envelopes for that purpose. Check with your parish office.

So the next time one of our retired priests comes to assist in your parish, visits you or a loved one in the hospital, invites you to participate in a morning of prayer, or is seen sharing God's Word with someone in a local jail or prison, just remember — our priests never stop sowing the seeds of faith.

Please be generous to this second collection being held in your parish the weekend after Labor Day, Sept. 6-7.

Barbara Gaddy is associate director of the diocesan Development Office.

Bishop Jugis blesses new Catholic section of cemetery

in that it is the only exclusively Catholic section located at an independently-owned cemetery in the Charlotte area.

"This has been a long effort to bring this to fruition," said Msgr. McSweeney.

In 2006, the Diocese of Charlotte implemented a moratorium on constructing and expanding columbaria and conducted a study on the use of columbaria and cemeteries.

"The church prefers the burial of the body of the deceased over the cremation of the body," wrote Bishop Jugis in a Sept. 8, 2006 column in The Catholic News & Herald.

In response to the moratorium, Msgr. McSweeney began a feasibility study last year to look into the possibility of opening a cemetery on St. Matthew Church property.

"We are routinely asked whether or not there is a Catholic cemetery in Charlotte," said Antoinette Usher, director of facilities at St. Matthew Church.

Due to land availability, zoning and environmental issues, the study found that it would not be feasible to build a cemetery on the church property.

At the time, Forest Lawn East Cemetery was looking into the possibility of opening a Catholic section due to increasing demands for Catholic burials.

"It didn't just happen overnight," Msgr. McSweeney explained. "There was a lot of thought and prayer" that went into the planning.

"The Garden of St. Matthew is a pastorally-sensitive approach, offering equal access at one location to all our Catholic parishioners who desire a resting place for either the body or for cremated remains," said Bishop Jugis.

"It fulfills the requirements of our new policy on cemeteries adopted in 2007, which requires that a resting place for the bodies of the deceased and a resting place for cremated remains be available all at one location," said the bishop.

"What is wonderful for us is that it takes the management responsibility off of the parish and puts it into the hands of professionals," said Usher.

Forest Lawn East was designed and developed in 1971. The cemetery consists of 52 acres of developed property with 128 acres available for future expansion.

The Garden of St. Matthew has room for 256 burial spaces, which will be divided into an upright monument section and a flat bronze and granite section.

In the garden will be a 7-foot granite statue of St. Matthew donated by Msgr. McSweeney in honor of his late sister. At a luncheon following the Aug. 12 blessing, representatives from the cemetery and Heritage Funeral and Cremation Services presented the pastors with information to take back to their parishioners.

Bishop Jugis was presented with several certificates for burial spaces for indigent or low income parishioners.

More certificates may be provided on an as-needed basis.

Father Tan Van Le, pastor of St. Joseph Church in Charlotte, said he is excited about the opportunity for his parishioners to be buried with other Catholics from the diocese.

"They want to be buried with Catholics," he said. "We hope to share with the whole diocese."

BURIAL OR CREMATION?

The Order of Christian Funerals — the Vatican-approved rite used for celebrating Catholic funerals — indicates three reasons for the preference of burial of the body of the deceased over the cremation of the body:

- Jesus himself willed to be buried;
- the body at the funeral rite expresses in a natural way the manner people had been accustomed to relate to the person while he or she was living, namely through a human body;
- the body at the funeral rite expresses Jesus' teaching regarding the supernatural dignity and destiny of the human body.

The Order of Christian Funerals presents cremation as an exception to burial and allows Catholics to be cremated "when extraordinary circumstances make the cremation of a body the only feasible choice."

In March 2007, the Diocese of Charlotte issued its new policy on cemeteries and columbaria, which states parishes may offer at one location a resting place for both the bodies and the cremated remains of the deceased.

The policy gives the diocese the option to create Catholic sections in local cemeteries and to receive or purchase land for the establishment of a Catholic cemetery.

Students return to school across Diocese of Charlotte

School in Charlotte, and students are returning to new laptop computers at Immaculata School in Hendersonville and Immaculate Heart of Mary School in High Point.

Immaculate Heart of Mary School teachers received summer training on the laptops, and among the applications learned was how to create podcasts, which offer new instructional and learning opportunities.

The Learning/Language Stimulation program is blossoming at St. Ann School in Charlotte. Now in its second year, the program provides one-on-one instruction for students in grades two through five who have difficulty learning.

Kindergarten-through-fifth-grade students now will be learning Chinese language, culture and writing at St. Leo the Great School in Winston-Salem. And new programs are in place at Immaculata School — a new reading series for students and upgraded social studies for middle school classes. Also, the school's gymnasium has been refurbished with a new roof and floor.

As enrollment rises in Catholic schools across the diocese, offering a curriculum with a faith component is the most important aspect, according to Principal Debbie Mixer at St. Patrick School.

"We are able to help the students grow in their faith," she said.

And watch the students grow — literally.

"Watching the kindergarten students walk in so unsure on the first day and then seeing them graduate in the spring — the transition and transformation is enormous," said Mixer.

"Our schools are Catholic first," said Linda Cherry, superintendent of Catholic schools in the Diocese of Charlotte.

"This year our focus in everything is leading our students to a faith-filled life, exemplified in the celebration of Mass and the holy Eucharist," she said.

Fostering faith at college

Guest Column

MARY WRIGHT
GUEST COLUMNIST

We are so blessed in this diocese to have such dedicated, caring and committed campus ministers.

As we begin another school year, I am mindful that I am starting my 10th year in campus ministry. I am very blessed to be director of diocesan campus ministry and a campus minister at the University of North Carolina-Charlotte.

No matter how long one is in campus ministry, the reality is that we need to continue the faith formation that parents, parishes and friends have begun at least 18 years prior to a student going to college.

What an awesome responsibility we have to continue ministering and journeying with Catholic college students.

As many of you know, the campus ministers do an extraordinary job implementing the U.S. bishop's pastoral letter "Empowered by the Spirit."

Campus ministers focus and provide opportunities for college students to form faith communities, appropriate the faith, form Christian conscience, educate for peace and justice, facilitate personal development and develop leaders and disciples for the future.

As you read the following article, you will note that our campus ministers manifest those aspects in many different ways.

On a diocesan level, we are providing a leadership training weekend in September for all student leaders involved in campus ministry.

All students are invited to a vocation day in November and a service weekend in February.

Another initiative we are beginning this year is an e-mail address — off2college@charlottediocese.org — for students interested in receiving more information about or becoming involved with campus ministry.

The respective campus minister will be notified so an invitation can be extended to the student.

We are very grateful for your support of the Diocesan Support Appeal, which helps fund campus ministry. In addition to that funding, each campus is assigned a development goal they must attain.

Thank you for supporting this vital ministry for the future leaders of our church. Please know this ministry with college students is not possible without your support.

Thank you in advance for your prayerful and financial support of Catholic campus ministry in the Diocese of Charlotte.

Mary Wright is the director for campus and young adult ministry in the Diocese of Charlotte.

Catholicism on campus

Campus ministry helps Catholic college students grow in their faith while hitting the books

BY KATIE MOORE
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — As Catholic students return to school this month, those attending many of the colleges and universities within the Diocese of Charlotte will have an outlet for their faith on campus.

Since the founding of campus ministry in the Diocese of Charlotte in 1972, the program has grown to encompass 15 public and private colleges and universities within western North Carolina.

Through Catholic campus ministry, students in the diocese are encouraged to grow in their faith and share their God given gifts through opportunities of learning, worship and service.

In 1985, the U.S. bishops issued a pastoral letter on campus ministry. It stated that, "Campus ministry is the embodiment of the church on campus."

According to that pastoral letter, the goal of campus ministry is to "form a Catholic Christian community through worship, reflection on the faith, peer ministry, and outreach to the university at large."

"Through the efforts of this ministry, Catholic students are formed in the faith, 'empowered by the Spirit' to realize the kingdom of God on campus and become prepared to contribute to the church following their college years."

Learning

One of the goals of campus ministry is to help Catholic college students expand their knowledge of church teachings and to grow in the faith.

"With God, the more we learn about him, the more we love him," said Matthew Newsome, campus minister at Western Carolina University, in Cullowhee.

Newsome plans to offer catechetical bi-monthly classes in conjunction with Wednesday night dinners at the campus ministry center at Western Carolina University. The sessions will cover topics on faith sharing and evangelization.

"There must be a catechetical element," he said. "They (the students) really want to have this material presented to them."

Several campuses in the diocese offer small group faith sharing through Campus RENEW.

Campus RENEW, the college program from RENEW International, is a two-and-a-half year process that facilitates renewal and transformation on college campuses through small faith-sharing groups. It fosters spirituality, builds community and a commitment to service.

At the University of North Carolina-Greensboro, Guilford College and Greensboro College, students meet weekly for faith sharing and RENEW training workshops.

At North Carolina A&T State University and Bennett College for Women in Greensboro, a Campus RENEW lectionary-based Scripture study is offered bi-weekly.

At Wake Forest University in Winston Salem, students meet weekly for "Why Catholic?" discussion groups. Another program facilitated by RENEW International, "Why Catholic?" offers a practical, pastoral approach to evangelization and adult faith formation.

Worship

Another unique aspect of Catholic campus ministry is the mutually beneficial relationship that often forms between the students and the local parish communities.

During the school year, students from Appalachian State University provide music at weekend Masses at St. Elizabeth of the Hill Country Church in Boone.

"This interaction really helps students feel like members of the St. Elizabeth's community and develop a home away from home," said Erin Leonard, campus minister at Appalachian State University.

"Going to college is a time of great transition. It is really important for students to stay connected to their faith during this time," said Leonard. "In addition to all we do as a group on campus, it is important for us to stay an active part of the larger church."

Students from A&T State University and Bennett College for Women attend Sunday and holy day liturgies at St. Pius X Church in Greensboro.

Msgr. Anthony Marcaccio, pastor of St. Pius X Church, celebrates Mass at Thea House, the campus ministry center, once a month.

Students from UNC-Charlotte help coordinate games and activities at the parish picnic for St. Thomas Aquinas Church each fall. Members of the "Young at Heart" group at the parish prepare a meal for the students once a month.

At Western Carolina University, Father Walter Williams, pastor of St. Mary Church in Sylva, hears confessions and celebrates Mass on campus once a week.

Students from UNC-Greensboro, Guilford College and Greensboro College attend Mass together at Our Lady of Grace Church.

Service

"Through campus ministry, college students answer the call from the U.S. bishops to put Catholic social teaching into action," said Gloria Schweizer, campus minister at the UNC-Ashville, Brevard College and Mars Hill College.

Students give of their time and talent through acts of service on their campuses, in their communities and beyond.

Students from Wake Forest University were recognized recently for their work with the Catholic Hurricane Relief Agency in Louisiana. Catholic students from Wake Forest have been to the Gulf Coast six times since it was devastated by Hurricane Katrina in 2005. They've gutted houses, cleaned schools, removed old insulation, hung sheetrock and played with neighborhood children.

For the past 10 years, Catholic students from Davidson College in Davidson have traveled to Nicaragua with an ecumenical group sponsored by the College Chaplain's Office and Davidson College Presbyterian Church. Karen Soos, the Catholic campus minister at Davidson, is one of the trip's co-leaders.

"What we try to do with the students on the Journey to Nicaragua team is have them learn about a particular situation, listen to people's stories, share their lives and then out of that, after they come back home, choose a life and a lifestyle that integrates service, justice and continual learning," said Soos.

Each February, students from all the campuses in the diocese participate in the "Give Your Heart Away" retreat, a weekend of faith, justice and service projects at various locations.

"I know a lot of people my age are feeling unfulfilled," said Katie Goodman, a UNC-Asheville student who attended the "Give Your Heart Away" retreat in February 2008. "They seem to be searching for something deeper, which makes me wonder if something is missing. I am wondering, after the experience of this weekend, if maybe it is the direction in which we have been giving our hearts away."

A roundup of Scripture, readings, films and more

Entertaining historical look at 'female pope' has scholarly gaps

(CNS) — Eleanor Herman is not afraid to take on seemingly controversial topics and unusual aspects of history. She has written "Sex With Kings" and "Sex With the Queen." In her latest effort, "Mistress of the Vatican," she chronicles the story of Olimpia Maidalchini, whose brother-in-law was Pope Innocent X.

Historians agree that Maidalchini had considerable influence with the pope and his papacy, which lasted 1644-1655.

Herman has an engaging style and creates an interesting read about Maidalchini, Rome and the state of the church at that time.

However, there are many implications in the book that make a reader wonder.

For example, the introduction notes, "The church, too, looked on females as defective creatures. ... The church fathers, who in the second through fifth centuries grappled with Scripture to hammer out Catholic theology, were notorious misogynists."

Yet, she writes in Chapter 11 about the historical relationship of the Catholic Church and women. She states that for three centuries "women played a major role — teaching, disciplining and managing material resources. According to tombstones found in France, Turkey, Greece, Italy and Yugoslavia, some of these women were priests."

She also writes about the tradition of women priests through the fifth century.

Herman's book relies heavily on the writings of Gualdus Leti when it comes to facts about Maidalchini. And church historians do not argue about the fact that she had considerable influence on the pope and his decision-making. The Catholic Encyclopedia even notes that.

The book is vivid but often filled with "might haves," "could haves" and "imagines." The book concludes with Maidalchini's death and notes "we can imagine her soul rising through the gold-embroidered velvet hangings of her four-poster bed."

Herman also refers to St. Thomas Aquinas as arguing his theology in the 12th century. He lived from 1225 to 1274, which of course makes him a 13th-century theologian. It is a small error but does make one wonder about other details.

The author also writes that the "Latin word for woman — 'femina' — was said to have come from 'fe' for faith and 'minus' for less since women were thought too weak to hold and preserve the faith." A quick check of Merriam Webster shows a different etymology.

She also writes about the decline of the town of Viterbo, north of Rome and site of the papal residence in the late 13th century, and notes "the papal court moved to the peace and quiet of Avignon, in southern France."

It seems simplistic to describe it as a move to a quieter place.

Herman's book is revealing, entertaining and interesting. However, it is not a great scholarly work and it seems to have an agenda.

Herman concludes her book: "But Olimpia's story, completely true, has been completely forgotten. New church scandals fill the newspapers. New saints inspire the faithful."

"And in an age when other Christian churches have permitted female priests, the Catholic Church adamantly refuses to consider doing so, citing tradition. The church does not concede that a woman has already run the Vatican itself, and her name was Olimpia Maidalchini."

Taking up the cross often involves struggle, sacrifice

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Having begun a doctoral program relatively late in life, I've discovered a "love-hate relationship" with higher education. That's a term often used to describe strong but ambivalent feelings about a person or situation, and it's quite appropriate to express the simultaneous pleasure and pain of reading hundreds of pages of assigned texts, researching papers and taking exams.

Why would anyone with a family and a full-time job voluntarily put themselves through the rigors (and sleep deprivation!) of a degree program? It defies logic and flies in the face of common sense.

But when I consider the alternative, I always conclude that I can't not do it. While the situation is paradoxical, it's precisely in the paradox that I find my personal mission and the drive to push forward when the day-to-day exertions of graduate school don't always make sense.

Jeremiah's situation in today's first reading is a classic paradox: He's in a "love-hate relationship" with his call to give prophetic utterance to God's message. Although he is subjected to constant ridicule and contemplates not speaking God's name any longer, he finds that he cannot hold inside the "fire burning in my heart" and "imprisoned in my bones." While conventional human wisdom would advise him to stifle the prophetic impulse, God's calling is too powerful to renounce.

The exchange between Jesus and Peter in today's Gospel reveals the ultimate paradox, however. What can be more nonsensical than the Son of Man surrendering himself to torture and certain death?

But Jesus is very clear that the same paradox that compels him to embrace the cross is at the heart of discipleship: "Whoever wishes to come after me must deny himself, take up his cross, and follow me. For whoever wishes to save his life will lose it, but whoever loses his life for my sake will find it."

Conventional wisdom would advise one to do whatever is necessary for self-preservation. Jesus' call doesn't make sense—even to his closest followers—and it's absolutely ridiculous to nonbelievers. But therein lies its saving power.

Question:

Where is God calling you to surrender your own personal ideas, plans or lifestyle in a way that doesn't make sense?

Man starts social networking site for Catholic parishes

BY GEOFFREY A. BROOKE JR.
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Facebook and MySpace, the two most popular social networking sites on the Web, have practically become household names, but a Catholic Delaware man who has started a networking site for Catholic parishes hopes he can get some recognition of his own.

Shaun Gallagher said he took the "concept of social networking and centered it on a parish" to create www.parishnetwork.org.

Users go to the site to look for their parish and sign up through the parish, then they can communicate with other members of the parish through messages, forums and groups. Users also can connect with other Catholics in their diocese in the same way.

"It's a matter of aggregating information to add parishes" to the site, said Gallagher.

He works on the site by himself, with no paid or volunteer staff to help, gathering information for all the parishes in all the dioceses in the United States.

In a matter of weeks the site went from having 15 or 16 U.S. dioceses listed to 74 dioceses — and 9,635 parishes — listed as of June 23.

Even with such rapid growth, Gallagher said he expected it would take a few more months before all of the nation's 195 dioceses and their parishes are uploaded to the site.

Gallagher said he has been trying to "get the snowball rolling" by contacting various dioceses around the country and spreading information about the site via word of mouth through his friends.

Gallagher first got the idea when he moved to Delaware from New York in August 2007. He found that he was only able to introduce himself to a few people and that it was hard to make connections with other parishioners.

His site is "a foundational tool that helps people along their religious journeys," said Gallagher.

He believes it will have an impact on users' spirituality in a communal and personal sense.

"It gives someone an opening to introduce themselves," Gallagher added.

The site enables users to have a profile in which they can display their interests and hobbies.

"That alone can form Christian fellowship," he added.

He also thinks the site can influence people's prayer life; for example, he said he thinks those who feel they don't pray as often as they should might pray more if they see a prayer request someone has posted on the site.

Gallagher also thinks the site might have more of an impact on younger Catholics, making them feel more a part of a parish community.

"I know several people who have left the faith because they thought nobody would care, nobody would notice" if they left, he said. "If young people go to Mass and no one knows their name, it can be discouraging," he noted, adding that the site can help people know each other's name and give "people support to grow."

Gallagher works as a full time Web editor for The News Journal daily newspaper in Delaware.

His vision for the site it is to have something different from other social networking sites. He values simplicity and said he believes that philosophy came out of the time he spent as a DeSales Service Works volunteer in 2004.

Other Catholic social networking sites exist, but they cater to individuals, not dioceses and parishes as Gallagher's site does.

Officials planning World Youth Day 2008 in Sydney, Australia, recently launched a networking site called www.xt3.com for those who made the journey to attend the six-day event in July.

Other sites include www.4marks.com, which focuses its target on young, single Catholics; www.cathcommunity.org, which focuses on individuals and on creating networks among various Catholic organizations; and www.mycatholicvillage.com, which aims to bring together individual Catholics from all across the globe.

Clothed for the journey

Secular Discalced Carmelites clothe member in brown scapular

ARDEN — Ruth Ballard was clothed in a ceremonial brown scapular by the Flower of Carmel Community of the Order of Discalced Carmelites during a votive Mass at St. Barnabas Church in Arden July 12.

The clothing, the habit of the order, was given to Ballard, a convert to Catholicism and former Lutheran pastor, at the culmination of 18 months of study and discernment.

Discalced Carmelite Father Anthony Haglof celebrated the Mass and officiated the clothing ceremony. Elizabeth Pantas, the Flower of Carmel Community formation director, assisted in the clothing ceremony on behalf of the community.

Ballard took "Therese-Elizabeth of St. Luke, the Iconographer" as her name in the community. She now begins a five-year period of study, prayer and discernment that may lead her to lifelong promises of poverty, chastity and obedience to the community and the Superiors of the Teresian Carmel.

Ballard said her "love affair" with Carmelite spirituality began a decade ago when, as a Lutheran pastor, she read the spiritual autobiography of St. Therese, a Discalced Carmelite.

That "was the catalyst that began my journey into full communion with the Catholic Church," she said. "A deep longing developed within my heart to be a part of this rich (Discalced Carmelite) tradition and to share within community a common calling to a life of holiness and contemplative prayer, following the example of our blessed mother."

"This longing became a reality when the Holy Spirit led me to the Flower of Carmel Community," she said.

Although retired, Ballard works as an iconographer, creating liturgical art that depicts biblical characters, events and saints. She also studies other types of artistic expression and explores ways to integrate Catholic doctrine and tradition with more contemporary art forms.

The Secular Order of Discalced Carmelites is an order of lay people and diocesan priests who embrace a calling to strive for Christian perfection in the world according to the spirit and ideals of the Order of Discalced Carmelites.

Following in the way of St. Teresa of Avila and St. John of the Cross, Secular Carmelites endeavor to make their lives as grace-filled and as fruitful as possible for the church and the world. They are called upon to carry into the world the witness, message and example of the Carmelite Order.

Birthdays in a bag

COURTESY PHOTO

Shannon Martini, 11, a parishioner of St. James the Greater Church in Concord, sits amid the 25 "birthday bags" she made for children at the Carolina's Children's Center, an orphanage in Concord. Each bag contains a "birthday party," complete with cake mix, candles, balloons, streamers, gifts and cards for either a boy or girl of different age groups. Shannon collected donations from friends and family and delivered the bags June 10.

"I really didn't do anything. It was all the great people who contributed that really made the difference," said Shannon in an e-mail. "All I did was come up with the idea and be the person to put it together."

She hopes other churches and organizations will follow suit and make and deliver birthday bags to the orphanage throughout the year.

"It goes to show that everyone can make a difference in a big way because all the little things and caring that one person does can keep adding up to be something real big," she said.

CHARLOTTE — Pro-life supporters from Charlotte, Augusta, Ga. and Chattanooga and Knoxville, Tenn. gathered Aug. 9 outside A Preferred Woman's Health Center in Charlotte to prayerfully protest the proposed opening of an abortion clinic in Chattanooga.

The clinic would be an offshoot of the Charlotte-based center, which has locations in Raleigh and Augusta.

"We are aware of the intent to start a clinic in Chattanooga," said Paul Simoneau, director of the Office of Justice and Peace for the Diocese of Knoxville.

"Our message is 'never again,'"

Simoneau said.

Chattanooga has been "abortion clinic free" since 1993 when ProMaCC, the Pro-life Majority Coalition of Chattanooga, purchased the property that housed the city's only abortion clinic and evicted the physician who performed abortions. The property now houses the National Memorial for the Unborn.

"The function (of ProMaCC) is simply to be a spokesperson for all of the pro-life community," said Cynthia Kedrowski, president of Chattanoogaans for Life.

ProMaCC is a Christian organization made up of people from various denominations and backgrounds.

"We love the Lord and we agree on the gift of life," said Kedrowski.

ProMaCC organized the trip to Charlotte under the motto, "Pro-Life for the Long Haul."

Simoneau contacted respect life organizers in Charlotte and Kedrowski got in touch with her friends and former Chattanooga residents, Janice and George Neyer, parishoners of St. Thomas Aquinas Church in Charlotte.

George Neyer arranged for his fellow members from Knights of Columbus Council 10505 to come out for the vigil.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis, of Charlotte, also came out to show his support.

"I am happy to be here to support the people from Tennessee and Georgia. They have driven hours and hours, and have made great sacrifices to be here for this prayer vigil," said Bishop Jugis.

"I am glad that people from our own diocese also have come to this vigil, especially the group from St. Mark's Life Teen program who were here very, very early," he said.

"My prayer is that the Lord will help all of us be messengers of mercy and peace in the face of the violence of abortion, and that the Lord will help us bring his light into this darkness," the bishop said.

"I think it's wonderful to have this act of solidarity," said Simoneau of the joint effort among the pro-life groups.

"We don't want abortion in any of our cities," he said.

Prayer for the success of the Eucharistic Congress

O Jesus, who art really, truly and substantially present in the Blessed Sacrament to be the food of our souls, deign to bless and bring to a successful issue all Eucharistic Congresses and gatherings, and especially the coming Congress of the Diocese of Charlotte.

Be thou the inspiration of our labors, resolutions and vows; accept graciously the solemn homage we will render to thee; send your Holy Spirit to kindle the hearts of priests, religious, and all the faithful, especially the children, so that devout participation in the holy Mass and frequent and daily holy Communion may be held in honor in all the countries of the world; and grant that the kingship of your Sacred Heart over human society may everywhere be acknowledged to the glory of God, the Father.

Sacred Heart of Jesus, bless the congress.

St. Paschal Baylon, pray for us.

Holy Mary, Mother of God, patroness of our diocese, pray for us.

St. Patrick, pray for us.

Oración para el éxito espiritual del Congreso Eucarístico diocesano

¡Oh Jesús!, que estás real, substancial y verdaderamente presente en el Santísimo Sacramento del Altar para ser alimento de nuestras almas.

Dígnate bendecir y brindar el éxito a todos los Congresos Eucarísticos y asambleas eucarísticas, y muy especialmente a nuestro próximo Congreso Eucarístico de la Diócesis de Charlotte.

Sé Tú, Señor, la inspiración de todos nuestros trabajos, decisiones y votos. Acepta amablemente el solemne homenaje que te dirigimos; envíanos tu Santo Espíritu para que encienda en el corazón de tus sacerdotes, religiosos, y de todos tus fieles, especialmente el de los niños, una devota participación en la Santa Misa y una frecuente y diaria recepción de la comunión, que sea tomada con honor y respeto en todos las naciones del mundo; y concede que el reinado del Sagrado Corazón de Jesús sea más conocido en toda sociedad humana para mayor gloria de Dios Padre. Amén.

Sagrado Corazon de Jesús, bendice nuestro congreso.

Carless comment on shortage crisis

Father Eugene Hemrick states the cause of the current shortage crisis of natural resources is "our burgeoning and unrestrained populations" ("What's behind all these shortage crises?", Aug. 8).

Detriments of mission trips

Donna Coennen's letter to the editor ("Mission trips to help Americans," Aug. 8) nailed it.

We may have it all wrong about the benefits of mission trips to foreign lands or resort islands when we have suffering people here in the United States.

It is confounding to me why people on islands or on a coastal areas surrounded by fish cannot be taught to fish. I wonder if we are enablers and not problem solvers.

We have immigrants coming from southeastern Asia who are thriving in coastal areas of the United States, fishing for a living and feeding their families.

Maybe we are trying to keep up with our Protestant brothers and sisters, many of them go on foreign mission trips to build churches and teach about the saving grace of knowing Jesus.

They get it right about teaching about Jesus Christ. Is that our mission or is it to just make us feel good about our selves?

Are we looking at this from the perspective of "seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness (Jesus Christ), then all things will be added"?

A Carmelite devotion that resonates with today's youth

Scapulars pique curiosity about spirituality

The feast of Our Lady of Mount Carmel not only caused me to study its origins again; it also taught me how attractive its tradition is to youth.

The story has it that Mary, the mother of Jesus, appeared to Simon Stock, the general of the Carmelites, and gave him a scapular. "This shall be the privilege for you and for all the Carmelites, that anyone dying in this habit shall be saved," she told him.

The word "scapular" means shoulder. In religious orders it is considered the most important part of a monastic habit. It is a piece of cloth about the width of the breast, extending from one shoulder to the other.

It reaches down to the top of one's feet on both sides. Other, shorter forms also exist. When children made their first holy Communion, they were given a shorter version.

As I was reflecting on Our Lady of Mount Carmel, a provincial of the Carmelites happened to drop by my office. In our discussion of the scapular, he told me, "When students enroll in Carmelite schools, they look forward to receiving a scapular."

He then went on to say that one day while walking along a lake he spotted a lifeguard wearing the scapular. He also knew of basketball players who wear it on their ankles.

Normally it would be worn around the neck, but because it could choke a player, some people prefer to put it around their ankles.

The provincial also knew of people who wore the scapular until it literally

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE
HEMRICK

turned to dust.

As I listened to him, I wondered why young people are attracted to the scapular. No doubt the thought of it guaranteeing salvation is attractive, but what might be other reasons for this?

Studies on youth reveal that while they may not be religious, they are spiritual. They may not attend Mass, but they will recite the rosary.

The nature of youth is to be inquisitive and curious. Nothing piques curiosity more than the world of spirituality.

Some of the most enjoyable conversations I have had on spirituality were with young people. Inquisitiveness is at its highest level during this stage of their life. They will raise thought-provoking questions that the greatest of theologians never imagined.

Picturing Mary appearing to a person, the presentation of the scapular and the promise of salvation are fascinating to us but never so fascinating as to the mind of a youth.

This leads me to believe that our so-called old-fashioned devotions might just be in fashion with our youth and also may be a way of getting them to church.

— Tim Mainhart
Greensboro

Americans," Aug. 8) regarding Father Peter Daly's July 25 column, I would like to share some thoughts.

It is understood that money spent on airline and hotel fees might be "better" spent on the poor — for housing or food — rather than taking someone from their comfort zone to areas most affected by poverty. I believe, as Father Daly states, we can receive many benefits by being part of these missions to other countries.

A trip to Mexico or South or Central America will change your perspective. Each of us is called by Jesus to proclaim to the ends of the earth his message. For some of us, it may be a trip as far as China; for others, the trip may take you across the street.

Taking a mission trip outside country changes you, and not every country has the resources or will to help the poorest of the poor. I have been on trips both in the United States and in Nicaragua, and as great as the need is here it is greater in other countries.

Summer's end: Contemplating autumn and God's time

Changing seasons signal greater times to come

The last days of summer are upon us. As a child, I didn't much like this August time of year. The summer I looked forward to the previous school year was fast disappearing, and soon a new school year would intrude upon what seemed to me then the truest form of human freedom: a child's unmanaged hours of summer leisure.

As a young boy my small hands would cling fast to summer vacation, unprepared to concede that my early summer perspective of unlimited free time was unrealistic. Though older now, I still sometimes find myself resisting the calendar turn from summer to fall.

The flip of the month triggers a bittersweet mixture of memories of much anticipated summer family get-togethers as well as summer projects not yet accomplished.

Now, of course, I still see the boy in the mirror, but God who sees us both calms our jointly-managed, anxious heart and permits us to know him as the God of all seasons.

Even thinking back to Easter in late summer brings to mind the joy of our redemption through Christ, of spring and the beauty of new beginnings.

In between Easter and now, the church has honored the feast of the Body and Blood of Christ and helped us welcome the gifts of the Holy Spirit on Pentecost still at work in the here and now.

The precious summer weeks that remain are allowed to ripen the seed of faith. The church calendar of late summer also brings its own special beauty in the feast of the Assumption.

In mid-August, the image of Mary, the mother of Jesus, being taken into God's presence without the pain or anxiety of death underscores how the peace of summer need never end. Mary's miraculous journey awaits us if we follow her example of submission to the divine will.

During the 20 years I was privileged to teach at the University of Notre Dame, it always seemed to me that the statue of Mary atop the Golden Dome, the university's famed administration building in the center of the campus, stood in ever more tranquil splendor on this feast day.

Each Aug. 15, Jesus' mother seemed to gently tilt her head and smile upon the nearby Indiana and Michigan countrysides as they were being prepared almost imperceptibly by God's hand for the fall harvest.

The students had not yet returned, enabling August to remain a casual walk in undisturbed admiration for the morning dew on lush green lawns edged by goldenrod and purple sage.

Oh yes, September arrives, but bathed in the true light of faith and God's seasons, the mind is reassured. The sprinkled dew of Our Lady's August yields to September's moist condensation on front-porch swings.

The harvest season is open. And I am ready.

Soon enough will come the feast day of St. Michael near September's end. Michael, it will be recalled, is the good Lord's "great harvester" who, when all our final seasons are at end, will lead the worthy to paradise.

Tony Snow and Tim Russert, friends who began the summer with us, are gone. In one case God gave notice; in the other, he did not.

Like the child within my memory who mistakenly thought summer's end could be resisted, neither man knew his moment and both likely planned — as we all pretend to do — beyond it.

In the passing of each season, we come to appreciate how our lives progress in God's time, not our own. If we are accepting of that, we lose none of our summer days. Instead, we gain the restful reassurance of even greater times to come.

God calls all people to holiness, to be saints, says pope

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

CASTEL GANDOLFO, Italy (CNS) — All people are called to holiness, and having extraordinary gifts does not make someone a greater saint than someone else, Pope Benedict XVI said.

"Precisely the 'normal' saints are the kind of saints God wants," the pope said Aug. 20 at his weekly general audience.

"Holiness is not a luxury. It is not the privilege of a few, something impossible for a normal person," the pope told an estimated 4,000 people gathered at the papal villa in Castel Gandolfo, south of Rome.

Holiness, he said, "is the common destiny of all people called to be children of God; it is the universal vocation of all the baptized."

Pope Benedict said the summer holidays are a perfect time to pick up a biography or the writings of a saint, but that the church's calendar also gives Catholics a daily opportunity to contemplate a saint.

"Naturally, not all saints are equal," he said. They are different from one another like rays of "divine light" that have passed through a prism, he said.

"And a great saint is not necessarily one who possesses extraordinary charisms. In fact, there are many whose names are known to God alone because on earth they led an apparently normal life," he said.

The example of the so-called normal saints proves that when one has a close relationship with God he or she is filled with joy and peace and becomes a source of serenity and optimism for others, the pope said. By canonizing some of the holy men and women who have lived throughout the centuries and by remembering them at feast-day Masses, the church proposes them as examples for all Catholics, the pope said.

"Cultivating a knowledge of and devotion to the saints, alongside daily meditation on the word of God and a filial love toward the Blessed Mother" is "important and profitable," he said.

Pope Benedict highlighted some of the saints whose feasts fall Aug. 19-23: John Eudes, Bernard of Clairvaux, Pius X and Rose of Lima.

The pope mentioned the four saints, but focused specifically on St. Pius, "who, in a difficult period, led the church and renewed the liturgy, in that way renewing the church from the inside."

In addition to encouraging the frequent reception of the sacraments of penance and the Eucharist, St. Pius was particularly strong in insisting on proper decorum during the celebration of the Mass.

He highlighted the beauty of Gregorian chant and encouraged efforts to ensure the faithful could participate actively in the Mass by singing.

Forty years after 'Humanae Vitae'

Secular culture got many things wrong, God did not

Forty years ago there was an eruption in the Catholic Church over the release of Pope Paul VI's encyclical letter "Humanae Vitae" ("Of Human Life").

At the time, secular culture pronounced it a "dead letter." Cultural critics said the church was out of touch with the modern age on the role of human sexuality.

"Humanae Vitae" was blamed for the erosion of respect for the church's moral teaching and the departure of many people from the Catholic Church.

But, at the time, secular culture made some pretty extravagant claims for the virtues of artificial contraception. Forty years on, it is worth asking, What about the claims of secular culture? Were they right?

The first birth control pill came on the market in the early 1960s. It was featured on the cover of news magazines. It was talked about on television. People said it would usher in a new and happier age of sexual relations.

Did it?

Forty years ago it was said that artificial contraception would make marriages happier and more stable. Freed from the stress of many children, married couples would be better able to concentrate on each other and their marriage.

So what happened?

The divorce rate has skyrocketed. Marriages are less stable. There were many cultural factors involved, of course, but whatever can be said about birth control, it has not made marriages happier or more stable in U.S. culture.

Forty years ago it was said that the pill would mean more fulfilled sex lives. People could be more spontaneous. Sex would be more joyful. People would be less repressed.

Did it happen?

Separating the sexual act from conception has degraded the meaning of sex, caused it to lose its significance. Instead of being special, a sign of love and commitment reserved for husbands and wives, it is now commonplace.

When something becomes commonplace it loses its allure. Ice cream and cake, for example, are special if reserved for birthdays. If eaten all the time, they are boring, even damaging.

The pill has meant that sex is meaningless, the stuff of sit-coms and lurid talk shows.

In our modern world sex has nothing to do with making babies. It also has very little to do with making love. The surreal "Sex in the City" world has turned everyone into a sex object, because sex is seen as an act without meaning or consequence.

It has more to do with giving pleasure to the self than showing love for the other.

Parish Diary

FATHER PETER
DALY
CNS COLUMNIST

Forty years ago the advocates for contraception said that it would mean fewer unwanted children. There would be less child abuse and neglect because children would be more wanted since they were more "planned."

Ironically, today children seem less wanted. They are seen not as gifts from God but as financial burdens. Television reporters do stories on the "total cost" of raising a child as if children could be compared to buying a boat or second home.

With the ability to prevent pregnancy came the presumption that you should prevent pregnancy. Babies are now regarded as a burden. Large families are regarded with derision even in Catholic circles.

Birth control has led to an anti-child mentality. When a woman today begins to show with a third or fourth pregnancy, people ask her, "Did you make a mistake, dear?"

Forty years ago there was an explosion in the church over "Humanae Vitae." Now that the dust has begun to settle a bit, it seems that secular culture was wrong about many of its claims for birth control.

It helps to take the long view. Maybe that is God's view?

CHURCHES RESPONDING TO CRIME CRISIS

Police officer Angel Cintron carries a box of weapons from the rectory at St. Agatha Church in Chicago July 26. More than 6,800 weapons were turned in at 25 church locations in the city during the fourth annual Don't Kill A Dream, Save A Life event. Those turning in guns and other deadly weapons received a $100 gift card in the effort designed to get firearms off the streets.

As Chicago experiences violent summer, Catholic communities respond

CHICAGO (CNS) — It started in April, when headlines screamed “36 shootings, nine homicides” over the course of one weekend in Chicago. Since then, the violence has continued, with news of shootings nearly every day.

The violence has touched the Catholic community, with Catholic school students and adult Catholics among the victims, and violence occurring near and sometimes even on church property.

On June 30, a 15-year-old student at St. Francis de Sales High School was shot and wounded while walking home with friends. An 11-year-old girl who was part of the group also was shot.

Police said they don't think either young person was the intended target of the shooting.

On July 1, another 15-year-old was shot, apparently the victim of an armed robbery, in the rectory basement at St. Margaret of Scotland Church. Two other teens, with whom he was playing dice, have been charged in the crime.

On July 2, Chicago police officer Richard Francis was shot and killed during a disturbance across the street from police headquarters. A 45-year-old woman was charged with killing him.

Francis, 60, was laid to rest at St. Monica Church July 7.

In response to the violence, parishes have sponsored anti-violence marches; offered opportunities for young people to get off the streets and into activities, such as playing basketball at a church's gym; and helped people find employment by holding job training and mentoring programs.

The church is called to respond to violence by praying, but it has to do more than that, said Nicholas Lund-Molfese, director of the Chicago archdiocesan Office for Peace and Justice, just as it must do something to feed people who are hungry, in addition to praying for them.

To that end, the office recently hired Meghan Mayo, a graduate student in social justice at Loyola University Chicago, to help parishes find effective ways to respond to and prevent violence.

Chicago Police Superintendent Jody Weis used a July 12 march at St. Agatha Church to release Chicago crime statistics for June 2008.

Overall, murders were up almost 13 percent from 2007. About 40 percent of the murders were classified as gang-related, and in most of the rest the victims knew their attackers, he said.

Nearly 90 percent of the people charged in homicide cases had prior criminal records; so did more than 70 percent of the victims.

St. Agatha Church also was one of five Catholic parishes that participated in a July 26 gun-turn-in program organized by the Chicago police. The effort brought in more than 6,800 weapons overall.

At St. Monica Church, the two-hour funeral Mass for Francis, a 27-year veteran of the police force, was celebrated by Father Thomas Nangle, chaplain to the Chicago Police Department, who also delivered the homily.

Indian priest describes mob ordeal 'like being tortured for Christ'

BANGALORE, India (CNS) — Father Thomas Chellen, undergoing treatment at a Catholic hospital in Bhubaneswar, India, said he was grateful to be alive after a Hindu mob nearly set him on fire.

“They had poured kerosene on my head, and one held a matchbox in his hands to light the fire. But thanks to divine providence, in the end, they did not do that,” the 55-year-old priest, director of the pastoral center at Konjamendi in the Indian state of Orissa, said in an interview from his hospital bed Aug. 28.

Following the Aug. 23 murder of a Hindu leader, Swami Laxmananda Saraswati, by Maoist extremists, Father Chellen said Hindu mobs started attacking Christian centers in Kandhamal, the district where the slain leader was based.

When a Hindu mob of 500 people broke into the pastoral center Aug. 24, Father Chellen fled with another priest and a nun as the center was vandalized and burned to the ground.

They fled and Father Chellen and the nun took shelter in the house of a Hindu friend. However, Hindu mobs tracked them down and dragged them outside.

“They began our crucifixion parade,” said Father Chellen. The gang of about 50 armed Hindus “beat us up and led us like culprits along the road.”

They were stripped and beaten repeatedly, and the nun was raped, all while police watched, according to Father Chellen.

“The four-hour ordeal ended when a senior police officer arrived in the evening,” said Father Chellen.

Father Chellen was admitted to the hospital Aug. 27, while the traumatized nun was taken to a convent.

Asked about the how the nun coped with the trauma, Father Chellen said: “We had no option and were simply following their commands. We resisted as much as we could. This is like being tortured for Christ.”

Economic gap requires response by Christians, says Vatican official

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Poverty, particularly the growing gap between the world's rich and poor, is one of the most dramatic situations the world is facing and requires a response by Christians as well as by governments, said Cardinal Renato Martino.

The cardinal, president of the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace, announced that his office is preparing a document on "poverty in the age of globalization."

He made his announcement during an August visit to Tanzania, where he hosted a continentwide presentation on the Compendium of the Social Doctrine of the Church.

"The commitment to organizing and structuring society in such a way as to ensure one's neighbor does not find himself in poverty is an indispensable act of charity," said the cardinal.

The obligation to work for the eradication of poverty is especially binding, he said, "when a boundless number of people and even whole populations" are sinking further into poverty while the world's wealthiest people get richer.

He said the situation has assumed "the proportions of a truly global social question. Poverty — especially the growing inequality between regions, between continents and between countries and within countries — constitutes the most dramatic problem facing the world."

Cardinal Martino said the Gospel calls Christians to imitate Jesus and "give preference to the poor, addressing our energy and resources to the poor, and to contemplating the renewal of society beginning with the needs of the poor."

He said the document would "indicate a Gospel approach to combating poverty" and raise Catholics' consciousness about poverty, especially the fact that women and children form the biggest portion of the extremely poor people in the world.

Solar panels on Vatican hall first of several projects, says engineer

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican will begin installing some 2,400 solar panels in late September, the first of several projects aimed at exploiting renewable energy resources in the tiny city-state.

The solar modules, which are being donated by a German company, will be fitted atop the roof of the Paul VI audience hall and will produce some 300,000 kilowatt-hours of power each year, said Mauro Villarini, the Vatican engineer coordinating the project.

Construction of the solar-energy system will continue through October, while Pope Benedict XVI and some 250 bishops meet inside the audience hall for a synod on the Bible.

Villarini said another solar-panel system would be installed this fall above the Vatican's employee cafeteria, providing 60 percent to 70 percent of the power needed to heat and cool the building.

Both solar-energy systems are expected to be operating by the end of the year, Villarini said.

In addition, he said, Vatican experts were studying other "green" projects that may be particularly suited to Vatican City and its properties outside Rome, including the papal villa at Castel Gandolfo.

They include the possibility of small windmills, as well as treatment plants that would break down biodegradable material to produce methane and biogas, he said.

Villarini said the solar panels atop the audience hall would furnish enough power to meet the annual energy needs of about 100 families.

Even so, he said, the system will not come close to meeting the energy demands of the huge building, which uses some 2 million kilowatt-hours of power every year. The important thing, he said, is that it is a first, major step toward energy self-sufficiency.

Villarini said the Vatican's ecological initiatives were born out of a series of talks given by Pope Benedict, who said at the beginning of 2007 that humanity cannot continue its present patterns of exploiting natural resources.

Betancourt: Meeting pope was 'dream come true'

ROME (CNS) — Former Colombian hostage Ingrid Betancourt said it was "a dream come true" to meet the pope.

After meeting Pope Benedict XVI Sept. 1, Betancourt said she was fairly certain she broke Vatican protocol "because as soon as I went in, I hugged the pope and maybe I wasn't supposed to do that."

Betancourt, a former presidential candidate in Colombia, was freed by Colombian rebels in early July after more than six years as a hostage.

Immediately after her release she had said she wanted to meet Pope Benedict to thank him for his prayers and public appeals for her release.

Along with her mother, sister, her sister's children and a cousin, Betancourt spent 25 minutes with the pope at his summer villa in Castel Gandolfo. She spoke afterward at a press conference in Rome.

Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, Vatican spokesman, said the climate of the meeting was "very emotional."

"Her period as a prisoner was a time of great spiritual experience, of prayer, and so she really wanted to tell the Holy Father about the importance faith played in sustaining her during that very difficult period," Father Lombardi said.

Bishop Jugis blesses cornerstone of new convent in High Point

BY DEACON GERALD POTKAY
CORRESPONDENT

HIGH POINT — The Sisters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul will soon have a new home from which to serve.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis blessed the cornerstone of the new convent to be built in High Point Aug. 16.

The cornerstone is symbolic in that it represents the cornerstone of the universal Catholic Church — Jesus.

Ken Hughes, a parishioner of Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in High Point, donated to the Sisters of Charity the 16.5 acres on which to build the convent. Other parishioners are helping acquire the funds and resources needed for construction.

"Parishioners old and new, as well as the local community, are contributing to get the Sisters their own convent," said parishioner David Long.

"We want to make it, we want to build it," said parishioner Luis Sanchez.

"There are many hard challenges here. There is a long way before we finish, but we can do it," he said.

The enthusiasm for the Sisters is out of gratitude for their tireless service to the church and the community.

"We had no ambition to do anything but what God wanted us to do," said Sister Archana, superior of the Sisters of Charity in High Point. "We never thought of building our own convent, but God showed us the way."

The Sisters of Charity's mission in High Point began in 2000, when 10 members of the congregation came to Christ the King Church at the request of Father Philip Kollithanath, pastor.

Father Kollithanath, who arrived from India in 1994, was overseeing a growing multicultural parish and invited the Sisters of Charity to conduct the religious education program and other ministerial work, including operation of the parish day care center.

The Sisters, who currently reside in a small house a few miles from the church, also have worked at Maryfield nursing home and a High Point hospital.

"When the Sisters arrived, they, together with Father Philip, really started turning the parish around. And the parish grew in numbers and activities," said Long. "They have done amazing things with the large Hispanic and the English-language faith formation programs."

The Sisters manage the parish Hispanic center, which was founded in 1999 to serve area Hispanics through various programs and services. The De Paul Academy offers bilingual preschool and afterschool programs for Hispanics and other minority children, and teaches parents how to help their children in school.

"The coming of the Sisters has been a tremendous help," said parishioner Austine Nwokolo. "With the love and encouragement of Father Philip and the Sisters, the parishioners are doing whatever it takes to get the parish moving forward."

"The priest, the Sisters and the people are all willing to contribute time and energy to the growth of the church," said Mary Wardell, who is among the parishioners to have assisted the Sisters in their work.

Like Sister Archana, Father Kollithanath credits God for all the good that has transpired.

"God's blessings are everywhere," said Father Kollithanath. "And it is God alone who brings forth the support and efforts of the good people of the community."

"It is a sign of God's will that we are doing this (building the convent)," said Sister Archana.

"As far as finances are concerned, we leave it in God's hands. He has already had 16.5 acres donated for the convent. And we have already planted an apple and fig orchard."

"The Sisters of Charity are doing great work in High Point," said Bishop Jugis. "They bring the love of Christ to the poor, the sick and the immigrants through their various ministries, and they do it with such a joyful spirit," he said.

"I look forward to the day when we will celebrate the blessing of their new convent," said the bishop.

Sisters of Mercy South Central Community elect inaugural leaders

BELMONT — The Sisters of Mercy of the Americas South Central Community have elected their inaugural leadership team.

Mercy Sister Kathy Green of Cincinnati was elected to be the community's first president by more than 430 Sisters of Mercy from 18 states, Guam and Jamaica who attended the 2008 Assembly of Elections at Xavier University in Cincinnati July 10-12.

Others elected to serve on the first South Central Community Leadership Team included Mercy Sister Paulette Williams of Belmont, N.C.

The leadership team, which will be based in Belmont, assumed office Sept. 2.

The election culminated a process that began in 2002, when the Sisters of Mercy of the regional communities of Baltimore, Cincinnati, North Carolina and St. Louis — along with the affiliated regions of Guam and Jamaica — began exploring a collaborative organizational model.

During the past six years, leadership teams, task forces and committees from the regional communities laid the groundwork for creating a new community to support their life and mission.

"Our desire to reshape and reform the community grew from our call as Sisters of Mercy to reach out with courage and love to the needy of our time," said Sister Green. "As apostolic women religious in the Institute of the Sisters of Mercy of the Americas, we have a new community that is not simply a merger, but a new creation."

The Sisters of Mercy of the Americas South Central Community includes about 748 sisters, 619 associates and one companion in Mercy.

The Institute of the Sisters of Mercy of the Americas is an international community of women religious vowed to serve people who suffer from poverty, sickness and lack of education, with a special concern for women and children.

In addition to the South Central Community, the institute is comprised of five other communities with more than 4,200 Sisters who serve in North, South and Central America, the Caribbean, Guam and the Philippines.

More than 3,000 Mercy associates, several companions in Mercy, more than 600 Mercy Volunteer Corps alumni and hundreds of co-workers in Sisters of Mercy-sponsored programs and institutions also share in its mission.

Houma-Thibodaux feared Louisiana diocese hit worst by hurricane

Archbishop Hughes, who rode out Hurricane Gustav at the St. Louis Cathedral rectory after helping hundreds of residents evacuate the city on buses, said he spoke briefly late Sept. 1 with Houma-Thibodaux Bishop Sam G. Jacobs at the St. Joseph Co-Cathedral in Thibodaux.

Though Bishop Jacobs did not have any confirmed reports of damage to areas in the low-lying Terrebonne and Lafourche civil parishes, Archbishop Hughes said Bishop Jacobs feared the damage would be significant.

Bishop Jacobs spent the evening at the co-cathedral rectory in Thibodaux. The Archdiocese of New Orleans assigned Aaron Portier of Catholic Charities of New Orleans to serve as a liaison to the Houma-Thibodaux area.

Catholic Charities USA's disaster response team has been on the ground in the Gulf Coast since before the storm hit, helping the local Catholic Charities agencies implement their disaster response plans, said spokeswoman Shelley Borysiewicz. Catholic Charities' initial recovery work will focus on directing critical resources and supplies to hurricane victims, Borysiewicz said.

Local Catholic Charities agencies plan to open community resource sites throughout the impacted region where families can access food, water, toiletries, cleanup supplies and other resources provided by partner agencies.

In addition, response teams will make damage assessments and identify communities' unmet needs, she said.

Baton Rouge Bishop Robert W. Muench told Archbishop Hughes that the gymnasium at St. Anthony of Padua Church in North Baton Rouge, which sheltered a number of Vietnamese refugees, sustained major roof damage. There were no immediate reports of injuries.

Archbishop Hughes said the worst damage in the Archdiocese of New Orleans was expected to be in the Lafitte area, which is always subject to flooding, and in lower Plaquemines Parish on the banks of the Mississippi River.

St. Louis Cathedral in New Orleans appeared to suffer only minor damage. The winds dislodged several slates from the cathedral roof, Archbishop Hughes said, but there was no flooding. The rectory lost power for about 11 hours.

After the worst winds subsided, New Orleans police officers gave Archbishop Hughes a tour of the city. Compared to Hurricane Katrina three years ago, there was little flooding or visible damage to archdiocesan facilities, he said.

New Orleans Auxiliary Bishop Roger P. Morin and Father Jose Lavastida, Notre Dame Seminary rector, rode out the storm at the seminary with power supplied by a generator.

Schools in the Archdiocese of New Orleans were expected to be closed for the remainder of the week. The archdiocese will follow the reopening timetable set by the local public school systems.

Lake Charles Bishop Glen J. Provost was scheduled to take a damage-assessment tour of his southwest Louisiana diocese Sept. 2. Lake Charles was badly damaged by Hurricane Rita in 2005. Alexandria Bishop Ronald P. Herzog did not expect much damage in his diocese, located in the geographic center of Louisiana.

Archbishop Hughes praised local officials for learning the hard lessons from Katrina on how to properly evacuate thousands of residents in advance of a major hurricane.

"The evacuation was extraordinarily orderly and smooth," he said.

Ancient order invests six new members in Diocese of Charlotte

BY KATIE MOORE
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — Six new members were invested into the Equestrian Order of the Holy Sepulchre of Jerusalem during the order's annual Scroll Mass at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte Aug. 3.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis, a member of the order, celebrated the Mass and presented the scrolls to the new members.

The scrolls are significant in welcoming and honoring members in the long-standing order.

John Piuino, lieutenant of the order's Middle Atlantic Lieutenancy, assisted Bishop Jugis in presenting the scrolls from Rome, which confirm admission to John Thomas Bateson, Angela Mary Labermaier Eggeston, Deborah Elizabeth Burns Kane, William Robert Kane and Thomas Edmund McGahey.

New member Lawrence Gilliam Sr. was in absentia.

Promoted to the rank of Lady

Commander with Star was Rose Marie Bell. Promoted to Knight Commander with Star was James Bell.

The order, which dates back to the 11th century, is dedicated to preserving Christ's tomb in Jerusalem as well as supporting Catholic schools, hospitals, orphanages and churches in the Holy Land.

Members, who are invited to join, are invested during a centuries-old ceremony and each receives a scroll imprinted with the seals of the Vatican secretary of state and the cardinal grand master.

On the local level, members lend their presence in support of their bishop by participating in ceremonies of the diocese.

The goal of each knight and lady is to make a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, for which they are awarded the prized Pilgrim's Shell by the Patriarch of Jerusalem.

HIGH POINT — Bishop Peter J. Jugis blessed the buildings and grounds of the new Pennybyrn at Maryfield campus in High Point Aug. 15.

Also assisting with the blessing of buildings and grounds were Deacons Ron Steinkamp, David King and Fred Scarletto.

The blessings were part of the continuing care retirement community's grand opening festivities Aug. 14-15.

Pennybyrn at Maryfield is sponsored by the Sisters of the Poor Servants of the Mother of God. The campus also offers spiritual retreats, reflection days, daily celebration of the Eucharist and an onsite perpetual adoration chapel.

words to his disciples are, "Go therefore, and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, teaching them to observe all that I have commanded you. And behold, I am with you always, until the end of the age."

"It's important to hear that, because evangelization begins with Jesus," Villaronga said, adding later that, "Christ's whole mission was to evangelize. We flow out of that reality. Evangelization is the transformation of humanity."

It's not primarily about knocking on doors. "People have thought of evangelization as what you do to get them into RCIA, to get them into the Catholic Church, and then the church takes over," Villaronga said.

First, we must ourselves be evangelized. This, Villaronga said, is not "just preaching the Gospel; it's about allowing the power of the Gospel to transform humanity ... encountering the reality (of the Gospel) in such a way that you want to and do transform your life."

"It's about us opening ourselves to the power of the Gospel," he said.

Then, transformed by that power, we evangelize others by really living our faith, he said.

Villaronga cited the U.S. bishops' "Go and Make Disciples: A National Plan and Strategy for Catholic Evangelization in the United States," first published in 1992 and reissued in 2002.

The document states that evangelization goals are to bring about in all Catholics an enthusiasm for their faith; to invite others to hear Jesus' message of salvation and join the Catholic Church; to foster Gospel values in society and to promote human dignity, family and the common good.

Villaronga asked people to gather in groups to discuss issues in their local communities.

"When we talk about going into the world to make disciples, we need to know what the world looks like," he said.

In the "world" of western North Carolina, according to those in the workshop, issues include healthcare; youth concerns, such as lack of youth activities; lack of family values; drought and climate change; economic issues; immigration reform; cost of living; spouse and child abuse; family turmoil resulting from a lack of vision and hope; individualism; aging population; lack of involvement in church and community; and fear of talking to others about faith.

"The Gospel message has to resonate with all this, within this reality in a way that people hear it so that transformation takes place," Villaronga said.

"Go and Make Disciples" offers various strategies. Villaronga asked each group to choose one of the document's goals and suggest ways to implement that goal.

Every group chose goal No. 1, about creating enthusiasm for the faith.

"What I like about this plan is that it allows you to flesh out what you're going to do," Villaronga said. "Look at this plan and see what you're doing; you're probably doing a lot. Now look at what you're not doing, so you can fill in the gaps."

as pastoral associate.

Father Carmen Malacari, pastor, opted out of driving in the race but attended to cheer on Sister Pepitone.

"I don't have the guts for this," he said with a laugh.

But Sister Pepitone was up for the challenge.

"I wanted the Catholic Church to be represented," she said. "These other churches need to know we exist."

Sister Pepitone sold the most advance tickets — 208 in all — earning her the starting place from the pole position in both the main race and the inaugural "powder puff" (all-female) race, which she won.

"For a first-time racer, she did awesome," said Gary Peterson, parishioner of Holy Spirit Church and member of Knights of Columbus Council 10389. "She wasn't afraid of the turns."

But that's not to say that fear wasn't a factor.

"It was scary," said Sister Pepitone.

"Here you are driving and the mud is flicking at you, and it feels like when "You're sliding and slipping, and you know that if you're not careful and you lose control, you can crash and get hurt."

— Mercy Sister Patricia Ann Pepitone

you make the turns on the bend that you're sliding on ice. You're sliding and slipping, and you know that if you're not careful and you lose control, you can crash and get hurt," she said.

"My instinct was I wanted to win, but I didn't want an accident," she added.

Parishioners of Holy Spirit Church came out in droves to show their support.

"She's the main attraction," said Peterson.

"She's part of our church family," said Bob Ladousier, parishioner and fellow Knight.

Sister Pepitone was very appreciative of that support, especially for East Lincoln Christian Ministry. The event raised $7,810 for the organization.

"Holy Spirit Church is very supportive when it comes to needs of the people in the town," she said. "They are very supportive in helping the poor and the homeless."

But that's not to say she won't have to put up with her fair share of grief back at the church.

"The parish is teasing me," she said. "They're calling me 'the flying nun.'"

When asked if she'll still be allowed to drive the church van, Father Malacari replied, "Absolutely."

And, when asked if she'll participate again next year, Sister Pepitone said, "I have to. I have to defend my title."

Following Christ leads to grace-filled life, says revivalist

Father Fischer was the featured revivalist for the annual Revival of the Spirit, sponsored by the diocesan African American Affairs Ministry.

"The purpose and intent of the Revival of the Spirit is to bring together people from all over the diocese for a 'revival experience' strongly rooted in the heritage and culture of the black church," said Sandy Murdock, African American Affairs Ministry director.

"It is a spirit-filled time to renew one's faith and awaken one's mind and soul to the awesome glory of the love of Jesus Christ," she said. "It is filled with preaching, singing, rejoicing, ecumenism, unity in spirit and witnessing many of our blessings."

This year's event was a "roaming revival" held at three different locations Aug. 21-24 — two nights at St. Mary Church in Greensboro, one night at St. Helen Mission in Spencer Mountain and two Sunday Masses at Our Lady of Consolation Church in Charlotte.

As the revival has been traditionally held in Charlotte, this year's roaming revival was to allow more people to attend from around the Diocese of Charlotte.

"We reached folk who were not Catholic, but had an interest in being a part of a Catholic revival," said Angella Brown, African American Affairs Ministry board member and parishioner of St. Benedict the Moor Church in Winston-Salem.

"This year we were able to reach more people in our diocese than ever before. There was more participation from those with physical disabilities, limited transportation and those outside of the Catholic Church," said Catherine Gomez, board member and parishioner of Our Lady of Consolation Church.

Following in faith

Father Fischer, sacramental minister at St. Peter Claver Church in Lexington and chaplain of Lexington Catholic High School, uses storytelling, humor, song, rap and art in his preaching and evangelization workshops throughout the country.

Topics of his talks during the Revival of the Spirit included the healing power of the Eucharist, the beatitudes, sowing seeds for God and discipleship.

To be disciples of God, Catholics must be obedient — from the Latin "to listen," he said — and show determination.

Nature is an example of the kind of determination needed by Catholics, he said.

"All of nature reminds us to be determined, because nature always does what it needs to do," said Father Fischer during his talk at St. Helen Mission Aug. 23. "Nature and creation speaks volumes about how we are called to be who we are."

And so does God, he said.

"To be fully alive is to recognize we are born in his image and likeness," he said. "We are a gift, a child of God, whose destinies unfold every day. God is at work and speaking to us every day."

For those who might wonder if God loves them with all their faults, Father Fischer said not to worry.

"Does God accept us? No matter what we experience or do, God looks at us through the eyes of his Son ... he looks at us from the viewpoint of Christ on the cross," he said.

"Jesus didn't die for angels or saints. He died for us," said Father Fischer. "That's how loved you are."

But Catholics have choices to make in their daily lives, he said.

"A lot of times, we forget how powerful we are," said Father Fischer. "We can bring peace or violence, reach out a hand or shove someone down, bless someone or curse someone."

"God wants to live in us, but often we don't realize it," he said. "We're stuck in the past ... we're stuck in the funk of dysfunction. We have to let go of the funk. We can choose to live right here, right now, or live in the past."

That is the power of choice, he said.

"Every day we can choose to listen and speak to God. He wants us to know we can choose to live in the blessedness of who and what we are," said Father Fischer.

Catholics need to use their faith imaginations and spend time with Jesus, he said.

"With Jesus, there is more grace, hope and opportunity," said Father

Fischer. "We can be poor as a church mouse, but rich in the Spirit, if we take up our cross and follow Jesus."

If we follow our Lord, he will show us the right way, said Father Fischer.

"We all get lost, but God wants to guide us if we listen to him," he said. "Do we let God guide and direct us? It's an amazing ride when God is the guide."

A roundup of Scripture, readings, films and more

Priest's stories treat horrors with heartbreaking normalcy

(CNS) — Father Uwem Akpan, a Nigerian Jesuit, writes of religious intolerance and ethnic conflict, and of unspeakable deprivation, with a preternatural calm — as if one who has really seen it doesn't need to wave his arms wildly or shout about it.

Father Akpan's communities are roiling with hideous enmities, with Muslim, Christian, pagan, Tutsi and Hutu neighbors and even families pitted against one another. Yet there is no judgment in his voice.

Considering the atrocities and casualties that drive the narratives of his collected short stories in "Say You're One of Them," this is an admirable, even remarkable feat.

Bigotry, violence, hunger, betrayal and abandonment settle into his stories with a heartbreaking normalcy. Children navigate through unimaginable horrors without stopping to question why such things are happening.

They are too busy dealing with reality to quarrel with their fate.

Moments of powerful and startling beauty do emerge — but they are few. In "My Parents' Bedroom," a young girl says of her mother that "the sequins on her dress glitter in the candlelight as if her heart were on fire."

In "What Language Is That?" there is even a sly and sweet rewriting of the rules when two young friends, separated by religious intolerance, find a way to communicate. Much of the dialogue in Father Akpan's stories presents a challenge. In "Fattening for Gabon" and "Luxurious Hearses," particularly, the unfamiliar language may hold a reader at bay. Unfamiliar words pour from his characters.

In exchange for dialectic authenticity, readers may have to work harder than usual to keep up. There is almost an Old Testament feel to the violence of the stories. While reading, I was reminded of a quote from the writings of the Rev. William Sloane Coffin:

"Almost every square inch of the earth's surface is soaked with the tears and blood of the innocent, and it's not God's doing. It's our doing. ... When they see the innocent suffering, every time they lift their eyes to heaven and say, 'God, how could you let this happen?'"

"It's well to remember that exactly at that moment God is asking exactly the same question of us: 'How could you let this happen?'"

Father Akpan doesn't overtly pose this question. He doesn't have to. It is there, lurking in each page of every one of his painful stories.

Admitting sins, faults leads to God's grace

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Thirty-five years ago, Sister Beth responded to her religious community's call to go "live on the margins," as she described it, with the Appalachian poor in southwestern Virginia.

Since then, she has thrived in ministry there, gaining a reputation among the struggling people of the region as a tough social justice advocate and gentle, compassionate counselor.

Although her ministry has addressed a wide range of concerns, her greatest contributions have been in treating victims of substance abuse and establishing an addiction education center.

Sister Beth has a great gift for working with victims of addiction. But that gift came not through her education or training. Nor did it come through her religious vows.

It came when she humbled herself,

"becoming obedient to God to the point of death," a real experience parallel to the example in Paul's letter to the Philippians.

Here's how it happened: When she moved to Appalachia, Sister Beth had already been a nun for more than a decade, serving as a teacher and administrator in a Connecticut Catholic high school. When she arrived she was excited, inspired and committed.

She also was an alcoholic.

She hid the fact for the first few years, but it came out when she was arrested for DUI and tossed in jail. "That was when I got on my knees and admitted total powerlessness," she said.

Just as in the passage from Numbers where the Israelites had to face their sinfulness, this was a moment of self-recognition for Sister Beth, a necessary one that would raise her to new life through reliance on God.

"What a place I had come to. I thought I was nothing," she remembered. "But after these many years and what I have experienced here, I've learned that what I thought was the worst thing that ever happened to me turned out to be my greatest gift."

Today's Gospel explains, "God did not send his Son into the world to condemn the world, but that the world might be saved through him."

Sister Beth's experience shows how God deals with us and our poor choices if we humble ourselves, admit powerlessness and open our lives to his mercy and strength.

Italian priest scraps plan for online beauty pageant for nuns

Contest called off due to criticism from church leaders, confusion about intentions

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ROME — An Italian priest has scrapped his plan to stage an online beauty pageant for nuns after the idea drew criticism from church leaders.

Passionist Father Antonio Rungi canceled the Miss Sister Italy contest and closed his blog Aug. 26 after superiors of his order intervened, informed sources said.

Father Rungi said he was calling off the pageant because it had caused widespread confusion.

He said some media had deliberately misrepresented his initiative.

A few days earlier, the priest had announced on his blog that he would host an online contest to determine "the most beautiful sister in Italy."

He made it clear that this pageant would be highlighting nuns who were "beautiful in spirit," by publicizing their lives and work.

But he said it would also serve to let people know that many of today's sisters were physically beautiful.

In contrast to stereotypes, he said, modern nuns are not unattractive and sad women who have been "disappointed by life and unfulfilled in marriage." He invited applicants between the ages of 18 and 40 to send photos that could demonstrate their beauty "on an aesthetic and spiritual level."

The winner of the contest, he said, would be chosen by visitors to his Web site.

As publicity about the contest grew, Father Rungi was forced to explain, among other things, that the sisters would not be parading in bathing suits and that the pageant was not a parallel to the Miss Italy contest, which was being staged at the same time.

Among those criticizing the idea was Alberto Giannino, president of an Italian association of Catholic teachers, who said the pageant belittled the real mission of sisters and held the church up to ridicule.

Father Rungi said he was shutting down the contest and his blog in order to protect himself and the sisters from further misunderstanding. He said it was a shame that he had to cancel the pageant, because he had already received a great number of applicants.

ARCHIVAL ANECDOTA

For the month of September, here are some historical facts about Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury.

ARCHIVE PHOTO

Pictured is the original Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury, which was dedicated in November 1882.

Significant Dates

- 1838: Richard and Eliza Roueche arrived at Mansion House Hotel in Salisbury, where they resided for two years. Richard Roueche was the only Catholic in Salisbury at the time, although his wife would later convert. The same year, Father T.J. Cronin celebrated Mass at the hotel while visiting the Roueches. This was the first time Mass was celebrated in Salisbury.
- July 5, 1846: Frances Christine Fisher was born in Salisbury. She converted to Catholicism, became a well-known author and was a benefactor of the church in Salisbury. She was the principal donor for the construction of the first Sacred Heart Church, and donated the lot on which it stood.
- Nov. 19, 1882: Bishop Henry Northrop, vicar apostolic of North Carolina, dedicated Sacred Heart Church.
- 1892: Sacred Heart Church received its first resident pastor, Benedictine Father Joseph Mueller.
- 1910: Sacred Heart Convent is built for the Sisters of Mercy and they take over operation of Sacred Heart School. (A Catholic school for children in Salisbury periodically existed from the 1880s.)
- June 11, 1933: In Sacred Heart Church, Bishop William Hafey ordained John Roueche, Richard and Eliza Roueche's grandson. This was the first ordination in Salisbury, and Father (later-MSgr.) Roueche was the first Salisbury native to be ordained.
- Nov. 3, 1940: Bishop Eugene McGuinness dedicated the current Sacred Heart Church.
- 1965: A new Sacred Heart School was constructed and opened.
- Sept. 1, 2007: Bishop Peter J. Jugis blessed the parish cemetery.
- June 29, 2008: Bishop Jugis blessed the groundbreaking for the future Sacred Heart Church.

Historic Facts

- Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury is the eighth oldest church in the diocese.
- In 1941, Father Cletus Helfrich became the first diocesan priest of Raleigh to serve Sacred Heart Church. He remained pastor of the parish for 29 years.
- Our Lady of Victories Mission was established in Salisbury to serve African-American Catholics in 1942. It merged with Sacred Heart Church in December 1969.
- When the second Sacred Heart Church was under construction in 1940, a donation of $5,000 was accepted under the condition that the name of the church be changed. However, influenced by urgent pleas from the parishioners, the bishop kept the church under the patronage of the Sacred Heart and used the money elsewhere. Had the name change occurred, Catholics in Salisbury would now attend St. Madeline Sophie Church.

Father John Putnam, pastor of Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury, chats with young men during the Diocese of Charlotte's annual vocations day of discernment, held at St. Michael Church in Gastonia Aug. 6.

Nearly 40 college, high school and middle school students gathered with Bishop Peter J. Jugis, Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin and 10 priests and 14 seminarians of the diocese for the event, which provided a chance for the students to discern what God is asking of their lives and to explore their possible callings to the priesthood.

The day included Mass, prayer, eucharistic adoration, sports and a panel discussion with priests and seminarians about life in the priesthood and seminary.

Not so pro-choice when it deals with freedom of conscience

Being forced to do something against conscience is anti-choice

A review of one recent week's news found these headlines:

"Catholic Bishops Support Choice."

"Planned Parenthood and NARAL Pro-Choice Oppose Choice."

Wait a minute! Are we still in the United States? Have we slept through a long Rip Van Winkle out-of-touch experience?

Neither.

The U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops spoke in favor of proposed federal regulations that would protect the choice of health care workers not to participate in abortion and sterilization procedures.

Planned Parenthood and NARAL denounced those same proposals, saying there should be no choice to opt out of such procedures.

The 42-page rule would enforce conscience protections in three separate federal laws, the earliest of which dates to the 1970s.

"These regulations are implementing long-standing laws on the books," said Deirdre McQuade, an assistant director of the U.S. bishops' Office of Pro-Life Activities. "They're not expanding those laws, they're not changing them, they're not introducing new material except to raise awareness about their existence."

The proposed rules, which apply to institutions receiving government money, would require as many as 584,000 employers ranging from major hospitals to doctors' offices and nursing homes to certify that they are complying with several existing federal laws that protect the conscience rights of health care workers.

Department of Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt said that health care professionals should not face retaliation from employers or from medical organizations because they object to abortion.

"Freedom of conscience is not to be surrendered upon issuance of a medical degree," said Leavitt. "This nation was built on a foundation of free speech. The first principle of free speech is protected conscience."

Groups that support keeping abortion legal were quick to raise the specter of conscience protection decreasing the quality of health care.

"The Bush administration's proposed regulation poses a serious threat to women's health care by limiting the rights of patients to receive complete and accurate health information and services," said Cecile Richards of the Planned Parenthood Federation of America.

"Women's ability to manage their own health care is at risk of being compromised by politics and ideology," she said.

Let's accept as fact that the rights of patients would be limited. The result would be no more than inconvenience as the patient sought another physician whose views are in concert with hers.

But inconvenience resulting from limiting a right is a lesser evil than denial of a right of conscience.

It seems fairly clear that being forced to do something against conscience is a serious breach of freedom.

"Freedom of expression and action should not be surrendered upon the issuance of a health care degree," Leavitt continued. "Nothing in the new regulation in any way changes the patient's right to any legal procedure."

Nancy Keenan, president of NARAL Pro-Choice America, called it "an attack on women's reproductive freedom."

Upper Hudson Planned Parenthood President and CEO Patricia McGeown said, "This administration believes that a woman's access to health services should be limited by anyone's and everyone's religious or moral beliefs. It's appalling how little regard the administration has for a woman's conscience and moral conviction."

What's more appalling are health care professionals being forced to act against their consciences.

"Resisting these very basic common-sense-affirming regulations just shows how extreme the pro-abortion lobby has become," said McQuade. "You'd think if they are pro-choice they are also pro-choice in the choice of a doctor or nurse to be involved."

Finding your vocation

If God gives you a specialty, he means for you to use it

Michael Phelps was born to swim. With long arms, powerful legs and giant feet, God made him to swim.

It is a joy to watch him. It is his vocation. If he did not swim, he would not be happy. He would not be using his gifts.

But even Michael Phelps had to respond to God's call. It did not just happen. It was work.

On the surface, Phelps has every excuse for failure. He has Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder, a learning disability. He was a fidgety kid who could not concentrate.

His mother was a single parent, trying to raise three children with little money or help.

People would have understood if Michael had just drifted, but he didn't. With the help of his mother, his coaches, his teachers, Phelps discovered his calling. He found out that his fidgety energy and gangly limbs and big feet were made for the pool.

So he swam. God made him to be the greatest swimmer ever, and his swimming gives glory to God.

I just love to see people find their callings. Be it humble or famous, it is their path to happiness because it is their call.

People often come to me because they are searching for their call. Mostly they are young. Sometimes they are not. Sometimes they are completely lost.

Most often they are just drifting. They are not doing badly, but not really doing anything.

But God has a call for them. I tell them to listen for the voice of the Holy Spirit in the ordinary circumstances of life. I suggest that they ask themselves some simple questions.

First, what gifts and endowments did God give me? Did he give me big feet or a musical ear or the gift of words? Do I have a talent for relating to people?

If God gives you something, he means for you to use it. If, like Michael Phelps, you have long arms and size 14 feet, maybe God wants you to praise him by swimming.

If, like Stephen Hawking, God gives you a brilliant mind trapped in a paralyzed body, maybe God wants you to praise him by becoming a physics professor.

Second, what responsibilities do I have?

If you are a parent or spouse, you have responsibilities to your family. If you are single, you have responsibilities to society. None of us is entirely free. We decide within a context.

Third, where have I been planted? I think we are meant to bloom where we are.

There is an old saying that sums it up well:

"Do all you can,
"With what you have,
"In the time you have,
"In the place you are."

No one is useless. No life is unwanted.

Look at Lopez Lomong, the Olympic track star who carried the USA flag into the stadium in Beijing. He was one of the "lost boys of the Sudan."

He was a war refugee without home or family. But he was not "lost" to God.

With the help of the church, Lomong came to America. He discovered that God made him to run. So he ran as a member of the U.S. Olympic team and became its flag bearer.

He gave hope to all the "lost boys" in the world.

Everyone, at every age, has a use to God. Young or old, sick or healthy, we each have a vocation. Our call may change as we grow older.

Even Michael Phelps will have to move from swimming one day.

But if we devote our lives to God's call at each stage, we will find our happiness. St. Augustine said, "In his will is our peace."

If God made you to swim, swim like Michael Phelps.

Proud to be Catholic

Despite media criticism, good work of church is quite astonishing

The word “secular” means “not bound by religious restrictions.” In the world of the secular media, there is a constant effort to put down the Catholic Church for carrying forward the values that Christ preached, namely, the sacred character of the human person at every level of life and the sacred character of marriage and the family.

The secular world insists that there are no unbreakable principles, no moral absolutes. Every violation of God’s will can be rationalized, explained away, justified.

This attitude has been described time and again by Pope Benedict XVI as “relativism,” which is a fancy word for “everything goes.”

Jesus said, “I have come to do the will of the Father,” and to that end he surrendered in a spirit of truth and humility: “Not my will but thine be done.”

Life is a test. The reward is heaven. The stakes are high.

Why do so many newspapers belittle and exploit the church for its human weaknesses?

They believe that we hold others to the highest standard, but fail to be perfect ourselves. They enjoy putting down the church whenever the opportunity presents itself because they see us as hypocrites.

But the truth is that the church defined itself as the sinful people of God. The good that we do in spite of the wounded souls among us, however, is quite astonishing.

Did you know that the Catholic Church educates 2.6 million students every day at a savings of $18 billion for American taxpayers? Our graduates go on to college and graduate studies at the rate of 92 percent.

The church has 230 colleges and universities in the United States with an enrollment of 700,000 students. It also has a nonprofit hospital system of 637 hospitals, which account for hospital treatment of 1 out of every 5 people, not just Catholics, in the United States today.

And yet the press continually focuses on the negative, denigrating the Catholic Church whenever it can. United with other religious bodies, the church is a moral force that stands against the immorality that is so widespread in the world today.

Premarital sex is an epidemic, unwanted pregnancies and abortions abound, the divorce rate is over 50 percent, and broken homes and broken dreams flood society.

The church stands against this tide of failure, upholding marriage and the family at every turn. A small number of wayward priests who have been weeded out systematically have poisoned the image of the church and given cause for great scandal.

Bleeding from these self-inflicted wounds, the church is in agony but not without hope or determination to right the wrongs of the past.

More people attend Catholic Mass every Sunday to receive solace, comfort from their faith than all those who attend baseball, football, basketball, tennis and racing events for an entire year.

Catholics are nourished by the Eucharist and love their church in spite of the outside climate of hostility.

Jesus predicted that the secular world would hate the church, just as it hated him.

So remember: The servant is not greater than the master. Walk tall with your head high. Be a proud member of the most important nongovernmental organization in America. Speak up for your faith with pride and reverence.

Be proud that you are a Catholic.

Like St. Paul, Christians must encounter Christ, pope says

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS)—While St. Paul had a dramatic personal experience of the risen Christ and received a mission directly from him, he still had to be baptized and become part of the church community, Pope Benedict XVI said.

“There is only one proclamation of the risen Lord because Christ is only one,” the pope said Sept. 3 at his weekly general audience.

Returning from his summer residence at Castel Gandolfo just for the duration of the audience, the pope continued his series of audience talks about St. Paul as part of the year dedicated to the 2,000th anniversary of the apostle’s birth.

“The Acts of the Apostles and the letters of St. Paul both say the risen Lord spoke to him, called him to the apostolate, made him a true apostle — a witness of the resurrection — with a specific mission to proclaim the Gospel to the pagans,” Pope Benedict said.

But St. Paul still “had to enter into the communion of the church, he had to be baptized, he had to live in communion with the other apostles,” he said.

Today’s catechesis focuses on St. Paul’s conversion.

In the Acts of the Apostles, St. Luke recounts for us the dramatic episode on the road to Damascus, which transformed Paul from a fierce persecutor of the church into a zealous evangelizer.

In his own letters, Paul describes his experience not so much in terms of a conversion, but as a call to apostleship and a commission to preach the Gospel. In the first instance, this was an encounter not with concepts or ideas but with the person of Jesus himself.

In fact, Paul met not only the historical Jesus of the past, but the living Christ who revealed himself as the one Savior and Lord.

Similarly, the ultimate source of our own conversion lies neither in esoteric philosophical theories nor abstract moral codes, but in Christ and his Gospel. He alone defines our identity as Christians, since in him we discover the ultimate meaning of our lives.

Paul, because Christ had made him his own (cf. Phil 3:12), could not help but preach the Good News he had received (cf. 1 Cor 9:16). So it is with us.

Transfixed by the greatness of our Savior, we — like St. Paul — cannot help but speak of him to others. May we always do so with joyful conviction.

The price of life

Physician-assisted suicide devalues lives of suffering people

Imagine if your state of residence put a price tag on your life.

Though it sounds like something out of “The Twilight Zone,” that’s exactly what happened to Randy Stroup and Barbara Wagner, both cancer patients residing in Oregon, home of the nation’s only taxpayer-funded, doctor-assisted suicide option for the terminally ill.

Uninsured and battling prostate cancer, Stroup applied to his state-sponsored health insurance plan to fund his chemotherapy. He was shocked to receive a letter saying they would not cover his chemotherapy drug, but would cover the cost of physician-assisted suicide.

“It dropped my chin to the floor,” said Stroup. “[How could they] not pay for medication that would help my life, and yet offer to pay to end my life?”

The same offer to cover assisted suicide instead of treatment was made to Wagner, who is battling lung cancer. Their stories compel us to consider the effects of legislation like this, where it may lead us and how we should react.

Physician-assisted suicide laws contribute to the overall devaluing of human life. Rather than recognizing the inestimable worth of every individual, they promote the erroneous idea that life is a commodity up for cost analysis by the state.

These laws perpetuate the idea that instead of protecting our citizens’ right to life, government should encourage and facilitate the eradication of those people deemed a financial burden to society.

These stories reveal a zero sum mentality of rationing resources, instead of an attitude of abundance and generosity for our suffering brothers and sisters.

With the exception of Oregon, all other attempts to legalize assisted suicide in states have failed, but efforts continue and may eventually succeed. Washington state voters will likely face such a ballot initiative this fall.

If other states follow Oregon’s example, the “slippery slope” may expand our notion of who is falsely considered a burden to society.

The Swiss group Exit International recently agreed on a resolution to vote in 2009 on expanding its criteria for assisted suicides from “terminally ill” to include those “being tired of old-age.” As bioethicist Wesley J. Smith has observed: “Once one accepts the premise that suicide is an acceptable answer to the problems of human suffering and ennui, there are no boundaries that will hold for long.”

In 2001, for example, soon after the Netherlands legalized euthanasia, the Dutch Minister of Health suggested suicide pills for elderly persons who are tired of living.

We must resist the spread of legalizing assisted suicide. Stroup fought back and won coverage for his chemotherapy, and a pharmaceutical company will donate Wagner’s needed drugs, so we can see that there is hope in the fight.

Learn what the Catholic Church teaches on end of life issues. Pray for increased respect for all human life. Stay alert for legislative efforts in your own state that threaten those who are elderly, sick or dying.

We all are obligated to continue to spread the gospel of life and to teach that every life, regardless of age or condition of dependency, is a priceless gift.

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — When Pope Benedict XVI chose the Bible as the topic for this fall's Synod of Bishops, he turned the church's attention to an area he has long considered crucial and in need of revitalization.

The pope's concern touches several levels. For one thing, despite an upsurge in biblical interest after the Second Vatican Council, only a minority of Catholics read the Bible regularly.

FIGHTING TO THE LAST BREATH

Patricia and John Peyton surf the Internet at their home in Seattle July 19. John, 64, has become paralyzed by an unusually aggressive form of amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, or ALS, commonly known as Lou Gehrig's disease. He has spent time in his final months lobbying against Washington state's assisted suicide initiative. Peyton said society needs to extend true compassion to the dying.

Man nearing death opposes state's assisted suicide initiative

SEATTLE (CNS) — John Peyton does not have long to live. Earlier this summer, his doctor gave him three to six months.

The 64-year-old retiree has an aggressive form of amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, commonly known as Lou Gehrig's disease. Since last November, he has gone from healthy and active to completely paralyzed, struggling to breathe with a ventilator. The disease has made him totally dependent on his wife of 40 years, Patricia.

Peyton's once-strong voice is fading fast; soon it will go altogether. But while he still has it, Peyton, a Catholic, is using it to proclaim the intrinsic value and sanctity of every human life at every stage, in every condition.

He has spent his final months opposing Initiative 1000, the Death With Dignity Act, which will be on the Nov. 4 ballot in Washington state. If passed, it would legalize physician-assisted suicide.

"This Initiative 1000 is just the first step in putting into law the lie that there is such a thing as a life not worth living," he said, explaining how he fears where the provision will lead his home state if voters approve it.

Peyton is a veteran of the pro-life cause, tracing his involvement to the early 1970s when Washington state legalized abortion before Roe v. Wade made it to the U.S. Supreme Court. The issue spurred the Peytons to get involved with Birthright International, an organization that aids women in crisis pregnancies.

Peyton joined the speakers bureau of Human Life of Washington and began giving talks on pro-life issues at schools, churches and club meetings. He also served as the Knights of Columbus' state pro-life chairman.

Being what some would consider a perfect candidate for physician-assisted suicide hasn't changed Peyton's stand on the issue. In fact, it has strengthened it.

Peyton acknowledged that he is "exceedingly fortunate" to have the loving support of his family, and his friends and neighbors and his home parish, St. Paul Church in Seattle. For those suffering with terminal illnesses who are not so fortunate, rather than tempting them to commit suicide, Peyton would rather see society extend true compassion.

"So much can be done to help people who are helpless," he said. "We could, as a society, be far more compassionate. We've become so selfish. ... You can't legislate compassionate care, but that's what's going to be needed."

The Peytons have been able to deal with John's impending death largely because of their Catholic faith, which he called "the fundamental and essential part of our lives."

But it does not mean they have not had their share of tears in recent months.

"Well, I'm disappointed, there's no denying that," said Peyton. "But I don't feel any anger or bitterness. I don't feel cheated of anything."

After more than 30 years of speaking about life issues, "I've just about said the last pro-life thing that I'm going to be able to say," he gasped at the end of a long interview. A single tear ran down his cheek, but his eyes burned with urgency and intensity. "It's up to you guys now. Take it up. May God go with you."

Archdiocese reiterates that Emmitsburg visions 'not supernatural'

BALTIMORE (CNS)—Responding to an apocalyptic posting to a Web site by Gianna Talone-Sullivan claiming that the Blessed Virgin Mary told her of an impending worldwide disaster, the Archdiocese of Baltimore has reaffirmed its position that Talone-Sullivan's alleged visions "are not supernatural in origin."

Talone-Sullivan, a pharmacologist, claimed to have received messages from Mary during Thursday evening prayer services at St. Joseph Church in Emmitsburg from 1993 until 2000, when the archdiocese banned them.

Talone-Sullivan claimed that Mary remained "publicly silent" for two years following the end of the prayer services, but continued to appear and speak with her privately.

Talone-Sullivan began disseminating monthly "public messages to the world," allegedly from Mary, via the Internet on Aug. 5, 2002.

The archdiocese investigated the Emmitsburg visions and in 2003 an "extensive study by a commission comprised of experts in the field of theology and canon law" examined approximately 600 pages of testimony and interviewed Talone-Sullivan and others, according to the most recent archdiocesan statement, dated Aug. 29.

Following the commission study, Cardinal William H. Keeler, then-archbishop of Baltimore, issued a decree stating that the alleged visions were not supernatural. That decree was approved by then-Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, prefect of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith in Rome, who is now Pope Benedict XVI.

The archdiocesan statement called it "regrettable that any confusion remains for Catholics in the archdiocese, who need only read the decree to understand the church's position on this matter."

Vatican official: Counseling, support key to helping terror victims

UNITED NATIONS (CNS) — The Vatican's permanent observer to the United Nations said greater efforts must be made to address the long-term spiritual and psychological effects of terrorism.

Archbishop Celestino Migliore told the secretary-general's symposium, "Supporting Victims of Terrorism," Sept. 9 that grief counseling and spiritual support were key to helping victims cope with their losses "but also lay the groundwork for preventing reprisals and continued violence."

He said programs that "provide restorative justice to the victims of terrorism help to alleviate the continuous cycles of violence, hatred and mistrust."

Archbishop Migliore praised the U.N. General Assembly's recent adoption of the Global Counter-Terrorism Strategy but said "efforts must be made to ensure that those who are the victims of terrorist activity are provided not only a voice but a helping hand."

"In the end, terrorist activity does nothing to promote authentic political or social aims, but only ensures the creation of more victims," the archbishop said.

"While we rightly condemn all acts of terrorism, care must be taken in order to give a voice to those whose voices have been wrongfully taken," he said.

Former Colombian hostage Ingrid Betancourt attended the conference and called for international status for victims of terrorism, with centralized data about victims provided on a U.N. Web site.

Betancourt, a former presidential candidate in Colombia, was freed by Colombian rebels in early July after more than six years.

The one-day seminar included testimony by victims of terrorism from nearly every continent.

Italian Feast Saturday 5-8 p.m. Admission is free. For more information, call (336) 274-6520, or visit www.olgchurch.org.

GREENSBORO — A Men's Evening of Reflection will be held at Our Lady of Grace Church, 2205 W. # Pope hopes trip to France encourages awareness of Mary VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI said he hoped his first trip to France as pope would encourage greater awareness of Mary as a beacon of hope for all people, especially the young.

The pope said he was traveling to France as a "messenger of peace and fraternity" and that he would offer a special prayer during his visit for the sick, the weak and the cause of peace in the world.

The pope made the remarks at the end of his weekly general audience Sept. 10, two days before leaving for a Sept. 12-15 visit to Paris and the Marian sanctuaries at Lourdes.

The pope noted that he was no stranger to France, having visited there many times as a cardinal. He praised the "solidity of its Christian faith and its high human and spiritual culture" and said he was sure he would be welcomed in the country's traditional spirit of tolerance.

In celebrating the 150th anniversary of the Marian apparitions to St. Bernadette Soubirous in Lourdes, the pope said he hoped to underline Mary's importance in the lives of all Christians today.

"May Mary be for all of you, especially for the young, the mother who is always available to meet the needs of her children, a light of hope that brightens and guides your paths," he said.

During his visit, the pope was to hold meetings in Paris with French political leaders, including President Nicolas Sarkozy, and celebrate an outdoor Mass in one of the city's squares.

Vatican officials said one of the most important events on the papal schedule in Paris was his Sept. 12 address at the College des Bernardins, which was to be attended by academics and cultural leaders, Muslim representatives, and officials of the European Union and UNESCO.

Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, Vatican spokesman, said the pope had spent considerable effort in personally preparing this speech, which was expected to focus on a major theme of his pontificate, the relationship between faith and modern culture.

At Lourdes, the pope was to join in several events of the jubilee pilgrimage, and Sept. 14 he was to celebrate Mass to mark the 150th anniversary of the apparitions.

On Sept. 15, the final day of the visit, he was to celebrate a Mass with the sick at Lourdes and administer the sacrament of the anointing of the sick to 15 people.

Church joins interfaith effort to change law

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The Catholic Church has joined an interfaith effort to change U.S. immigration law.

To prepare for that effort in the next Congress, it is also joining the Tour of the Faithful, an educational effort during September and October to convince people of faith to support changes in U.S. immigration policy.

"We're in a dark period," said Bishop John C. Wester of Salt Lake City, chair of the U.S. bishops' Committee on Migration, during a Sept. 9 conference call to announce the 17-city Tour of the Faithful.

"Our current national immigration policy ... consists of work-site enforcement raids" that result in, among other things, "the dislocation of U.S. citizen children from their parents," he said. "As a nation — a nation of immigrants, I might add — we cannot accept the labor of immigrants while undermining their basic human dignity. At the same time, the issue of immigration reform is receiving little attention in the presidential race, and negative attention in the media."

The tour started Sept. 10 with an interfaith prayer vigil in Columbus, Ohio.

Solemn high Mass in extraordinary form celebrated for first time in diocese

CLEMMONS — A solemn high Mass in the extraordinary form was celebrated recently for the first time in the Diocese of Charlotte.

Father Eric Kowalski, pastor of Holy Angels Church in Mount Airy, celebrated the Mass at noon at Holy Family Church in Clemmons on the feast of the Assumption, Aug. 15.

Assisting as deacon was Father Robert Ferguson, a member of the Priestly Fraternity of St. Peter, and assisting as subdeacon was Father Christopher Davis, pastor of St. Joseph Church in Asheboro. Seminarians Noah Carter and Jason Christian were among the servers at the Mass, attended by approximately 250 people.

The Mass from the Roman Missal in use since 1970 remains the ordinary form of the Mass, while celebration of the Mass according to the 1962 Roman Missal is the extraordinary form.

After Pope Benedict XVI eased restrictions on the use of the 1962 Roman Missal in July 2007, 14 priests of the Diocese of Charlotte attended training sessions to familiarize themselves with the background to celebrate the Mass in the extraordinary form.

In 2008, the priests began celebrating the low form of the Latin-language liturgy that predates the Second Vatican Council.

In the low Mass, the celebrating priest is accompanied by two servers, with two lit candles placed on the altar. In the high Mass, the celebrating priest is accompanied by a deacon and subdeacon, both with specific functions and roles.

Other differentiating factors include six lit candles, incensing and chanting rather than spoken liturgy.

"This is our liturgical heritage," said Father Kowalski, who celebrates Mass in the extraordinary form at two Triad-area parishes — Holy Angels Church in Mount Airy and St. Benedict the Moor Church in Winston-Salem.

"We are very blessed to have Bishop (Peter J.) Jugis' support and encouragement," said Father Kowalski. "We have over 2,000 years of history and our church is inclusive enough for the extraordinary form as well as the post-Vatican II 'Novus Ordo' (new form of the Mass)."

Annual pilgrimage brings priests, seminarians, laity to Fatima

WINSTON-SALEM — Priests, seminarians and laypersons from across the United States recently journeyed to Portugal as part of the Fatima peace pilgrimage.

Sponsored annually since 1984 by the Te Deum Foundation, the pilgrimage is designed to foster a devotion to Our Lady of Fatima's message for priests, seminarians and other religious.

"The message of Our Lady of Fatima is one of peace and conversion of heart, both of which are desperately needed in our world today," said Father John Putnam, pastor of Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury.

"As followers of Christ, we must pray for peace and strive daily to put the great commandment into practice of loving God and neighbor," said Father Putnam, who served as spiritual director of this year's pilgrimage.

Among the 27 pilgrims were John

Kaup and Paul Buchanan, seminarians for the Diocese of Charlotte.

"As a new seminarian, the pilgrimage to Fatima was an incredible way to begin my studies for the priesthood, and to dedicate those studies to Our Lady," said Buchanan. "After visiting the holy places and praying in the footsteps of saints, I know I am bound more closely to the Blessed Mother, and most especially to her Son."

In addition to Fatima, other sites visited included St. Jerome's Monastery and St. Anthony of Padua's Church in Lisbon, the home of Blessed Alexandrina in Balasar, and Our Lady of Nazare Church and the Church of the Eucharistic miracle in Santarem.

The Te Deum Foundation is a nonprofit organization that helps provide for the material and spiritual needs of seminarians in formation for the priesthood.

work with, we decided to stay on until we were 70," said Jewell.

"They have been a tremendous example for the parish and have contributed substantially to the growth of St. Philip Church," said Father Kurt Fohn, pastor.

"We are now 70 and it's time to leave it to younger, healthier, stronger-backed people," Jewell said.

The Jewells retired in August after 10 years, but are proud of their accomplishments with the ministry.

When they started, the Food Closet was serving approximately 20 families.

"At that time we were delivering to each family," said Jewell. "It has since grown considerably."

Now they serve between 120 and 130 families a month.

In 1998 they began getting food from Second Harvest Food Bank in Winston-Salem. At that time, the Jewells drove approximately 100 miles round-trip to Winston-Salem twice a month to pick up the food.

In 2003 Second Harvest Food Bank established a rural delivery program, by which the food is delivered directly to the church. It is stored in an on-site building and distributed on the second and fourth Saturdays of the month.

Because the bulk of the food comes from a federal program, certain guidelines must be met in order to qualify as a distributor. Rules for providers include requirements for storage, application and non-discrimination.

Clients also must qualify in order to receive the federally provided food.

"Every July we get a new guideline of income that they have to meet," said Jewell.

The guideline is based on monthly income and the number of people living in the household.

Clients may receive federal food only once a month and must agree to receive food from only one agency.

Each family receives at least $100 worth of food from the Food Closet. A majority of that comes from the federal program. The rest is purchased and acquired through donations from the church.

When the Jewells retired at the end of August, Jim and Mitzi Kermes took over the effort, along with help from Tom and Kay Dziubczynski.

"They (the Jewells) made it a pleasant experience helping at the Food Closet," said Jim Kermes. "We didn't want to see it fall apart or anything so we thought we'd help take over."

Kermes seems to think that the Jewells' days of helping at the parish Food Closet are not completely over.

"They've given us advice from day one," said Kermes, "and trust me, I call them whenever I have a question."

"We said we'd be available to help them whenever they need us," said Jewell.

"We'll probably miss it a little bit," she added. "But it's going to be nice to have a little bit of free time."

Pro-life campaign spreads widely by word of mouth

Three new locations to participate in '40 Days for Life' added in Diocese of Charlotte

BY KATIE MOORE
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — On Sept. 24, pro-lifers from around the country will join in solidarity to kick off the third national campaign of "40 Days for Life."

Here in the Diocese of Charlotte, pro-life leaders in four different locations are gearing up for the local campaign.

A nationwide ecumenical effort, "40 Days for Life" aims to end abortion through prayer, fasting, outreach and vigils.

This year there will be 173 campaigns at abortion clinics in 45 states, two Canadian provinces and Puerto Rico. In the Diocese of Charlotte, campaigns will be held in Alexander County, Charlotte, Greensboro and Winston-Salem.

The first campaign took place in 2004 in College Station, Texas. In 2007 the effort went nationwide, with campaigns in 89 cities in 33 states.

Charlotte was one of the first cities to join the effort by participating in the campaign last fall and then again in the spring. This is the first time for the other three locations.

The original goal of the "40 Days for Life" campaign was to have members of the community pray 24 hours a day, seven days a week outside a local abortion clinic for a total of 40 days.

This year, due to safety and logistics, organizers in the Diocese of Charlotte have scaled back on the hours.

Vigils will be held in Charlotte at A Preferred Women's Health Center, in Greensboro at Planned Parenthood and in Winston-Salem at Forsyth Women's Center/Planned Parenthood.

Organizers in Alexander County are taking a different approach due to the smaller size of the community and the absence of an abortion facility.

There won't be an actual vigil location, but "for 40 days we are challenging the churches and individuals in the area to pray," said organizer Denise Games.

At each of the sites, participants rotate in shifts, and no one is ever alone.

The "40 Days for Life" campaign began entirely as a grassroots effort and has spread widely by word of mouth and internet communication.

"I saw what they were doing and thought that would be great to do something like that here," said Chip Cush, parishioner of Holy Cross Church in Kernersville, who first heard about the campaign in an e-mail from Priests for Life.

"The beauty of this campaign is that there is a way for everyone to get involved," said Toni Buckler, parishioner of Holy Family Church and one of the coordinators of the Winston-Salem effort.

"This is a universal issue. It involves all of us," she said. "We are all responsible to end abortion in one way or another."

In Greensboro and Winston-Salem, coordinators have organized pro-life talks by Dr. Martha Shuping, a pro-life advocate, to be given in conjunction with the kick-off of the "40 Days for Life" campaign.

She will speak on the "Burden of Choice, Healing after Abortion" at Holy Cross Church Sept. 18 at 7:30 p.m., and at Holy Family Church in Clemmons Sept. 20 at 10:30 a.m.

"We're hoping that after Dr. Shuping's talks we'll be able to get some more interest," said Buckler.

"We all have to do our part by our prayer and our witness; and we let God do the rest," said Jason Beckert, parishioner of St. Matthew Church and one of the Charlotte coordinators.

"He'll make it happen but we have to be faithful and trust in him," he said.

For Beckert, last year's campaign was his first experience praying outside of an abortion clinic.

"I did my pro-life thing, but I didn't actually put myself out there," he said.

Beckert admitted that he was a little surprised by the peaceful nature of the campaign and the positive impact it had on his prayer life. "It was like being in adoration," he said of praying outside the abortion clinic. "I just really felt connected to the Lord."

National organizers provide participants with a daily devotional which includes a Scripture reading, reflection and prayer. While there is organized spoken prayer, 90 percent of the prayer outside the clinics is silent, according to Shawn Carney, board treasurer of the national campaign.

"The 'saves' are exciting and they're neat, but that's not the only thing," said Beckert. "If no one is saved that day, it doesn't mean that it was a failure."

Diocese investigating alleged misconduct No prior allegations made against teacher

KERNERSVILLE — A former student of Bishop McGuinness High School in Kernersville has come forward about an alleged incident of sexual misconduct involving a teacher.

The former student, now 25, informed Principal George Repass Sept. 4 of the incident that allegedly occurred in 2001 in the teacher's home.

The teacher was questioned by the principal and denied the allegation. In accordance with the Diocese of Charlotte's policy on sexual abuse, the teacher was suspended Sept. 5.

As required by state law, the Diocese of Charlotte reported the incident to Forsyth County Department of Social Services Sept. 5.

The diocese will comply and cooperate fully with any investigation by the authorities, while conducting its own investigation of the allegation.

Also on Sept. 5, the chancery notified the diocesan Review Board, which investigates and reviews cases of sexual misconduct reported in the diocese, and a letter from Repass and Linda Cherry, superintendent of Catholic schools, was sent to parents of Bishop McGuinness students, informing them of the allegation.

School board members, faculty and area pastors also were notified of the allegation.

The teacher was hired in 1991. A criminal background check, which is conducted on all diocesan employees, indicated the teacher had no prior criminal record of sexual misconduct.

No other allegations regarding the teacher have been reported in the Diocese of Charlotte.

The teacher had undergone training on sexual misconduct by church personnel, as is required by diocesan policy of all diocesan employees and volunteers.

As a result of the Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People — issued by the U.S. bishops in 2002 — the Diocese of Charlotte implemented its Protecting God's Children program.

The program educates and trains adults (mandatory for all clergy, religious, teachers, staff and volunteers) about the dangers of abuse, and ways to prevent and report it.

To date, there have been 690 Protecting God's Children workshops held throughout the diocese — 18,200 people have participated in the program.

Also, 17,400 background checks have been processed in the diocese, more than 2,400 in the last year alone.

In July 2003, the Diocese of Charlotte issued its revised Policy of the Diocese of Charlotte Concerning Ministry-Related Sexual Misconduct by Church Personnel.

In addition to establishing the Review Board, the diocese also appointed a coordinator to assist survivors of sexual abuse, whether the incident took place in the diocese or elsewhere.

At the conclusion of the latest independent compliance audit, which covered the period of August 2005 through June 2007, the diocese was found to be compliant with all articles of the charter.

Augustinian Brother Bill Harkin, prior of the Augustinian community in Maggie Valley, is pictured with Joan and Charles Surber from St. John the Evangelist Church in Waynesville and John and Therese Van Dyck of St. Margaret of Scotland Church in Maggie Valley after their affiliation into the Order of St. Augustine at St. Thomas of Villanova Church in Philadelphia, Pa., Aug. 27.

honor is for many people," Therese Van Dyck said.

The Province of St. Thomas of Villanova is made up of priests and brothers whose ministry extends along the East Coast. Affiliation is a way to recognize someone's "distinguished cooperation for the good of the order," as the order's constitutions note. "By reason of this affiliation, they belong to the Augustinian Family and share in all the spiritual benefits of the order."

Augustinian Father Donald Reilly, prior provincial of the Augustinian Province of St. Thomas of Villanova, presented the Van Dycks, Surbers and 17 other new affiliates during the affiliation ceremony and Mass in St. Thomas of Villanova Church on Villanova University campus in Philadelphia, Pa.

Augustinian Father Michael DiGregorio, assistant to the order's prior general, presided at the Mass Aug. 27.

The provincial and council of the province nominate the affiliates; the order's prior general and council in Rome approve the nominations.

At the Aug. 27 ceremony, each couple or individual received a book about St. Augustine and a hand-lettered affiliation certificate.

"We rejoice to celebrate the affiliation to our order of a number of couples and individuals whom we wish to invite into a closer spiritual union with us because of their distinguished cooperation for the good of the order," Father DiGregorio said.

In 1998, the Province of St. Thomas of Villanova was looking for new areas in which to minister. Then-Bishop William G. Curlin invited them to North Carolina.

"I want you to come to the Diocese of Charlotte and live your Augustinian way of life and help me in any way you can," Bishop Curlin had said.

Bishop Curlin, who was affiliated to the order last year, was to have attended the recent affiliation ceremony but was unable to because of another commitment.

Augustinians now staff St. John Neumann Church in Charlotte and St. Margaret of Scotland Church and Living Waters Catholic Reflection Center in Maggie Valley.

Moving to North Carolina, the friars were coming to a new environment. Their headquarters in Philadelphia had 12 friaries in close proximity. Some parishes in the area had Augustinian staffs for a long time.

"Nearly every place we've been, we've been there 100 years or more," said Augustinian Brother William Harkin, director of Living Waters and prior of the Augustinian community in Maggie Valley.

"We were going to a place where (Augustinians) had never been before," he said.

However, they were quickly at home in their new environment.

"It didn't take long," John Van Dyck said. "They reached out into the community."

"The challenge was, how do we come to Maggie Valley and live our Augustinian way of life? And that's where these four came in," Brother Harkin said.

The Surbers and the Van Dycks eased the friars' transition to rural Haywood County. They had welcomed the friars into their own families, helping them to feel at home, treating them as brothers to whom they were always available.

"We did it for two reasons," Therese Van Dyck said. "We didn't want recognition. We loved the Lord first, and we really love the Augustinians."

John Van Dyck brought his woodworking skills to the beautification of St. Margaret of Scotland Church's sanctuary, while Therese Van Dyck utilized her artistic skills to decorate the sanctuary and the friary.

"They have graciously welcomed all of the friars who have ever visited Maggie Valley and incorporated them into their home and family," said the program notes.

The Surbers are involved in many activities at St. John the Evangelist Church and assisted Augustinian Father Dennis McGowan when he was pastor for more than eight years.

They volunteer at the retreat center by helping to prepare meals for large retreat groups, including the diocese's priest retreat, and helping guests feel welcome.

"They embraced our Augustinian ideals and made them a central part of their lives from the time we began to staff that parish and the parish and retreat house in Maggie Valley," the program noted. "They have become members of our Augustinian family as if it were a natural consequence of coming to know us and to know the ideals of community life written about by St. Augustine."

It was easy. The friars, Joan Surber said, "are very approachable. You didn't mind helping and, besides, it's fun."

Biblical scholars provide pope with research, advice

In fact, more than a year before the Vatican told bishops' conferences around the world that "Yahweh," a name for the God of Israel that Jews do not say aloud, must not "be used or pronounced" in songs or prayers during Catholic Masses, Pope Benedict XVI asked the Pontifical Biblical Commission to research the issue.

Passionist Father Donald Senior, president of the Catholic Theological Union in Chicago and a member of the biblical commission, said Pope Benedict asked for the commission's input after a Jewish leader requested that the church consider respecting their long tradition.

The biblical commission has 20 members — currently 19 clerics and a German layman — usually appointed to two five-year terms.

U.S. Cardinal William J. Levada, prefect of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith and president of the biblical commission, said its primary task is to serve as a consultative body to his congregation and therefore to the pope and the church at large.

The commission, he told Catholic News Service, "ensures that there will be a dialogue on biblical themes at the very heart of the church."

And, he said, the fact that the members come from different parts of the world "allows for a dynamic exchange of various cultural perspectives."

Father Senior said the scholars have different approaches to the Bible, but all are recognized specialists in the field.

Because their names are suggested to the Vatican by national bishops' conferences and because they serve as Vatican consultants, "obviously you are not going to have people who are at loggerheads with the church," he said.

Before the Second Vatican Council, the biblical commission was made up almost entirely of bishops and was charged with monitoring the orthodoxy of Catholic biblical scholars and overseeing the curriculum of biblical studies for seminaries and pontifical universities.

Father Senior said that, with Vatican II, its promotion of Bible reading and its openness to new trends in biblical scholarship, the commission went from being a watchdog agency to being a scholarly commission with a pastoral approach, focusing on the Bible and modern church concerns.

The changed approach, he said, is particularly evident in the last three commission documents:

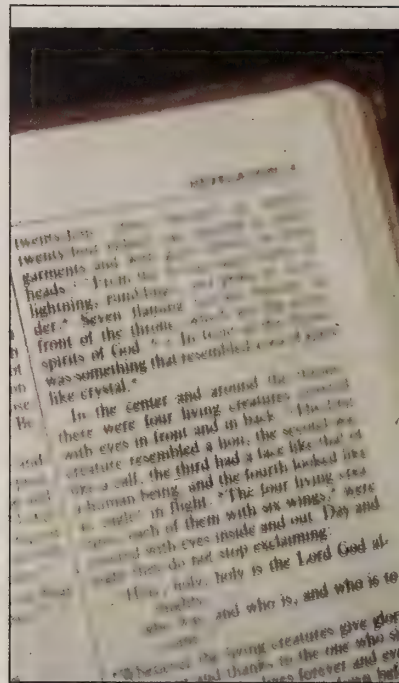

— The 1993 document, "The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church," examined different scholarly approaches to the interpretation of Scriptures.

With the exception of its treatment of fundamentalism, the examinations were basically positive, with small sections warning of possible dangers if one method is used exclusively or radically.

— The 2001 document, "The Jewish People and Their Sacred Scriptures in the Christian Bible," highlighted the importance of the Old Testament for Christianity, encouraged studying Jewish interpretations of the Hebrew Scriptures and condemned attempts to use New Testament criticism of some Jews as an excuse to denigrate Jews and Judaism.

— The latest document, "The Bible and Morality," was to be released in English in September.

Father Senior said its central concern is "How do you take a text that is ancient world synod of bishops

— revered and sacred, but ancient — from another time and culture and have it be relevant to contemporary moral issues?"

The document makes some reference to a few specific moral issues, especially the sacredness of life and the importance of the family, but also safeguarding the environment, he said.

Its main goal is to outline principles or guidelines for applying biblical values in the contemporary world, he said.

The text shows that in the Bible "certain issues rise to the top among the whole spectrum of moral concern," he said.

"From the stories of the Old Testament to Jesus, there are certain things — the cry of the poor, justice, community — that are more than examples," he said. "They are streams of concern that are very close to the bone when talking about the church and the teachings of Jesus."

The doctrinal congregation authorized the publication of the document.

Because the biblical commission is a consultative body, a document it produces is "like a (government) white paper: If they decide to publish it, it's fine; if they decide to shelve it, we really cannot complain," Father Senior said.

Critical analysis of Scripture took centuries to develop

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The quest to understand what God is saying in Scripture has been pursued for centuries. In the church's early days, Scripture was accepted largely on faith and any critical look was seen as distorting God's message. However, a more critical look at Scripture began emerging among Catholic scholars by the 17th century. Father Richard Simon in France published the first "critical history" of the Old Testament in 1678.

By the 19th century the rise of natural science led to questions about the accuracy of the Bible. Darwin's theory of evolution was published in 1859; scientific research showed the earth was much older than the 6,000 years Genesis suggested; and the discovery of biblical manuscripts and records of ancient civilizations called into question long-held beliefs of biblical inspiration and revelation.

On Nov. 18, 1893, in an attempt to counter the challenges, Pope Leo XIII issued an encyclical in which he acknowledged that some errors in Bible passages could have been introduced by scribes. At the same time he prohibited any interpretation that led to conclusions that only part of Scripture was true while other segments were problematic. He also said there may be a need for Catholic biblical scholars to turn to authors outside the church, "especially in matters of criticism."

It would be 50 years before the church again addressed the issue of critical biblical analysis, but when it occurred, the field of biblical scholarship was altered tremendously.

In 1943, Pope Pius XII opened a new era of Catholic biblical studies when he issued the encyclical "Divino Afflante Spiritu" ("Inspired by the Divine Spirit"). While Pope Pius did not promote the historical-critical method that had come into wide use in the first decades of the 20th century, he welcomed sound historical research in studying the Bible.

It would not be until the Second Vatican Council that lay Catholics were formally encouraged to study the Bible in the context of their own lives. One of the principal documents, the Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, stated that Scripture was produced by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit and, as such, deserves to be studied widely using different forms of critical analysis.

More recently, Pope Benedict XVI has cautioned that the historical-critical method has its limits even though it is a vital tool in biblical studies. He maintains the Bible should be viewed in whole as the word of God in which all parts relate to each other, and said the Bible offers a spiritual journey and is not a "textbook" on divine matters.

Leading people to read Bible is challenge for pope

The pope views the lack of scriptural formation as part of a wider crisis of catechetics in the church.

At a more academic level, the pope sees a danger in modern biblical interpretation that he believes diminishes the meaning of Scripture and erodes the bond between Bible and church.

In particular, he has warned that various modern-day methods of interpreting the Bible are too limiting; for instance, some scholars read Scripture as if they are seeking to break a code and pluck out answers one by one.

Instead, Pope Benedict believes the Bible must be seen as a whole and as the word of God, in which everything relates to everything else and offers the possibility of a spiritual journey, rather than being seen as a textbook on divine matters.

So in convoking some 250 bishops for the Oct. 5-26 synod, the pope did not intend to host a forum for scriptural analysis. His primary interest is pastoral, and a main challenge is to lead more Catholics to the Bible.

As he told synod planners earlier this year, reading, interpreting and living the words of Scripture are fundamental to the faith life of Christians. Without that, the church's great works in the modern age — including evangelization and ecumenism — are bound to stall, he said.

Nor does the pope believe that scriptural expertise comes before the simple experience of reading the Bible. As a cardinal, he once said that he shares the view of liberation theology that the Bible belongs to the people, not the scholars.

And while specialists are needed, he said, "the real and essential meaning of the Bible is something the simple believer can grasp just as well."

That's something the pope has been promoting as universal pastor since his election in 2005. The very first words of his pontificate were a quote from Scripture — a greeting from the First Letter of Peter — and his talks and sermons over the last three and a half years have included some 3,000 references to scriptural passages.

The pope once said the Bible would be one of two books he would take with him if marooned on an island (the other was St. Augustine's "Confessions.") His own familiarity with Scripture is evident in the way he cites passages even in off-the-cuff remarks.

His written works seem to breathe Scripture. His first encyclical, "Deus Caritas Est" ("God Is Love"), was typical. It began with a citation from the First Letter of John and on practically every page drew from the Old and New Testaments, often making connections between the two.

In his discussion of unjustified suffering, for example, he begins with a lesson from the Book of Job, then weaves in several Gospel passages.

One of Pope Benedict's primary convictions is that the New Testament offers the key to understanding the Old Testament and that, as a whole, the Bible necessarily leads to Christ.

But he believes this traditional Christological approach has been threatened by some modern schools of interpretation that would limit the meaning of any biblical book to the author's historical context.

In a 2001 essay, he described in dramatic terms how such interpretation jeopardized the "internal harmony" of the Bible as understood by Christians through the centuries.

By presuming that Old Testament writers could not have intended to refer in advance to Christ and the New Testament faith, he warned, this new line of biblical study would "sound the death knell" for the Christian understanding of Old Testament-New Testament unity.

As early as the Second Vatican Council, the pope — then Father Joseph Ratzinger — was involved deeply in a debate over the relationship among Scripture, tradition and the church's magisterium, or teaching authority.

Here, too, the future pope identified a dangerous trend in biblical interpretation that saw Scripture as the entire deposit of the faith. As a council expert, he wrote that this approach was not balanced and that "revelation ... is greater even than the words of Scripture."

Much later, he expanded on this point in the book, "God and the World," saying that when it came to the authorship of the Bible it was clear that "God did not just dictate these words." Instead, the words of Scripture bear the impression of a history guided by God, a history that directly involves the church, he said.

Pope Benedict always has emphasized that this history continues, and that the Bible, far from a piece of literature or a historical record, is a living book that touches the present.

In a foreword to his 2007 book, "Jesus of Nazareth," the pope said the books of Scripture involve three interacting subjects: the individual author, the church and God.

"The people of God — the church — is the living subject of Scripture; it is in the church that the words of the Bible are always in the present," he wrote.

What he attempted to do in his book on Jesus, he explained, was to use historical insights to help reveal the figure of Jesus, but to go beyond purely historical interpretation.

Instead, he said, his method takes the conviction of faith — faith that Jesus truly was God — as a starting point for reading Scripture. This approach allows for a proper theological interpretation of the Bible, yet does not sacrifice the church's "serious engagement with history," he said.

The pope has noted the Bible's ability to inspire individuals and impact their day-to-day decisions. But he has also cautioned against reading the Bible for easy answers, which would "turn Scripture into an oracle."

What's important, he once said, is to "read the Bible regularly, to let it keep us company and guide us."

Author-screenwriter struck by faith of Mexican players

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — If you were to buy a copy of the new book "The Perfect Game," you'd see a photograph of the 1957 Little League team from Monterrey, Mexico — the first non-American Little League World Series champions — standing in a church in Mexico City, in uniform, praying to Our Lady of Guadalupe.

The faith of these 14 11- and 12-year-olds was that strong, said William O. Winokur, author of "The Perfect Game," a novelized treatment of the Monterrey team's odyssey in the Little League tournament through a country none had ever visited before.

Winokur also wrote the screenplay for a movie of the same name scheduled for release in April 2009 — when the new baseball season starts.

"One of the things I tried to do was pay homage and respect to that faith," Winokur said in an Aug. 18 interview with Catholic News Service. "Not to overdo it, but their faith was so important to those kids and that community."

The team insisted on a blessing before each Little League tournament game they played as they worked their way deeper into the United States. It was a tougher go in Kentucky, not a heavily Catholic state.

"I think they assumed there was a priest in every small town. That was their experience," Winokur told CNS.

Before one Kentucky game, the boys were willing to accept a forfeit rather than play without a blessing. Their rationale, according to Winokur: "We are only here because of God's blessing. We are not going to play without him."

"They managed to drum up a (Protestant) minister who gave a blessing," Winokur said.

The undersized team crossed the Mexican-U.S. border by foot in uniform, carrying not only their bats and equipment but also "a change of underwear in a paper bag," according to Winokur.

They walked 12 miles in their baseball cleats to their first tourney stop in McAllen, Texas.

There and elsewhere, they beat bigger and faster teams. In the World Series final against a much-heralded team from California, Monterrey pitcher Angel Macias, an ambidextrous "switch-pitching" hurler, tossed a perfect game — the first ever thrown at Little League headquarters in Williamsport, Pa.

Winokur met with each of the surviving Little Leaguers from Monterrey and their coach, Cesar Faz; he also interviewed the widows of those players who had died in the intervening 51 years.

From his interviews, he said, it was obvious to him that they "walked the walk of faith, not just talked about faith. They actually deeply lived by that, and if they didn't have that, they would have had nothing."

One of the more touching episodes he related in the book dealt with Monterrey player Baltasar Charles, who almost did not make the trip with his teammates.

"Even though he was only 12 years of age, he was the primary caregiver of his younger sister (Patricia), who was born an invalid (due to a paralytic condition). He would take her everywhere.

"The night before they were supposed to leave, he told his team he just couldn't be away from Patricia. She came to him and said, 'Balta, if you don't go I will never forgive myself. I will feel as if I were the one who prevented you from being with your teammates.'"

Years after the Monterrey team's triumph, Baltasar said "he would have traded everything he had done in his life just to give his sister peace."

Patricia died a few years after the Little Leaguers' championship.

"I get a lump in my throat when I think about her," Winokur told CNS.

While the book and movie are based on actual events, Winokur said he chose to call the book a work of fiction because of the varying recollections of 10 or more people who lived through events of 50 years ago. "I didn't set out to write a journalistic account. I set out to weave a story," he added.

God's generosity is plentiful, often unexpected

BY JEFF HNESLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

God's generosity toward all his creation seems to be a thread running through this week's readings. Having just read through them when a friend from St. Louis came to visit, I think they were still on my mind when he and I went to lunch.

We were joined by the two women who direct our diocese's diaconate formation program. It wasn't planned, it just happened that at a restaurant seven miles from our diocesan offices we ran into each other.

A joyous time of sharing over food followed our chance meeting. It seemed a gift from a generous God.

And it must have triggered the conversation my friend and I had over coffee later, filled with stories of God's seeming intervention in our lives: a time I was nearly attacked by pit bulls, but a pickup truck happened by at just the right time to block the dogs; a time when a long overdue rain and very slick streets caused my friend to slide through an intersection while the opposing traffic seemed to stand still; and the stories continued to flow.

When Jesus speaks of the workers in the vineyard, jealous of the full day's wages the latecomers were paid, it is likely he is speaking of the jealousy of the religious people of his day when those who had only recently repented of their sinful ways were welcomed by him.

But he also is speaking of a generous God who is free to give as he sees fit, not limited by our conceptions.

The Isaiah passage speaks of that same generosity of God. The psalm says, "The Lord is gracious and merciful, slow to anger and of great kindness. The Lord is good to all and compassionate toward all his works."

We are among his works. Should we not acknowledge his great kindness toward us, the mercy he shows us?

Our lives are in his hands, Paul points out in the reading from Philippians. Then he tells his readers how we should respond to that generosity: "Only conduct yourselves in a way worthy of the gospel of Christ."

Director's film about love, loss helps him deal with own loss

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Film director Mark Pellington chose a tale about love and loss as his latest movie project to deal with his own love and loss.

The title character in "Henry Poole Is Here" is ready to drink himself to death in the dilapidated house he has just bought upon receiving the diagnosis of a terminal illness.

Pellington's wife, Jennifer, a film costumer, died four years ago and he took to alcohol to numb his spirit until, by his own calculation, he got sober two years later.

In the film, which opened Aug. 15, Poole's turnaround begins, although he doesn't know it, when one neighbor sees the image of Christ — due in part to badly done stucco work — on an exterior wall of the house.

The change in him accelerates when a blood stain of inexplicable origin appears on the wall, and it goes into high gear when another neighbor's young daughter starts talking again following a year of silence after her father abandoned the family.

Pellington's release from the grip of sorrow came in his work. While hedging his bets with different film, television and video projects in varying stages of development, he told Catholic News Service in an Aug. 12 telephone interview from Los Angeles, "I was kind of hoping this would be the one."

"It contained a lot of the elements I had been searching for. Loss, I could relate to that — not Henry and his possible demise, but Esperanza (the first neighbor) and the loss of her love (a man who had died in the house Henry bought), and the little girl who was shut down — and do a story where I could put together the range of feelings and express the small emotional details," he said.

"The process of actually making it and processing it and mixing it was quite cathartic," Pellington added. "Watching it the other night, I was in another place (in life). I leaned over to a friend and said, 'Wow, this is really sad.' It contained all the sadness I had a year ago."

As director of a "charming fable,"

"It contained a lot of the elements I had been searching for."

— Mark Pellington

Pellington "sustains a suspenseful, sometimes poetic, generally unsentimental mood, not without humor," said a review by Harry Forbes, director of the U.S. bishops' Office for Film & Broadcasting.

"This little gem of a film with its truthful emotions, likable characters, and themes of faith and community concern — even when Henry commits a desperate act — should resonate warmly with Catholic viewers."

The film, which stars Luke Wilson, Radha Mitchell, George Lopez and Cheryl Hines, received a classification of A-II — adults and adolescents — from the film and broadcasting office for "two instances of profanity and a few crass words."

Pellington, 46, the son of a Baltimore Colts linebacker, was raised an Episcopalian. He wanted to follow in his father's football footsteps until a high school injury dashed that dream.

He admitted his churchgoing dropped off in his 20s, but he picked it up again once he got married. Today, it's "sporadic," and while "I believe in God and Jesus Christ completely," he told CNS, "I rely on more than the church for my inspiration to question both the good and bad handed to me in life."

Backers of "Henry Poole Is Here" have mounted a campaign to win Catholic endorsement of the film. Outreach has been made to such groups as the Knights of Columbus, the National Federation for Catholic Youth Ministry and Lifeteen, according to Corby Pons of Different Drummer, a Washington-based promotion firm.

Renew International's Theology on Tap has published a six-page study guide to the movie.

Bringing the Mass home

Ministry provides Mass DVDs to homebound

BY KATIE MOORE
STAFF WRITER

KANNAPOLIS — A new ministry is bringing the Mass into the homes of those who are unable to attend church on Sunday.

DVDs for the Homebound, an outreach ministry of Knights of Columbus Council 12167 at St. Joseph Church in Kannapolis, provides weekly recordings of the Mass on DVD to elderly or infirm parishioners who are unable to attend Mass.

Each Sunday, English- and Spanish-language Masses are recorded by seven high-resolution video cameras and burned to DVDs.

Extraordinary ministers of holy Communion deliver the DVDs when they take Communion to homebound parishioners. If they don't have DVD players, the Knights loan them the equipment.

"It keeps them connected and lets them know what's going on in the parish," said Pete Devlin, parishioner of St. Joseph Church and member of Council 12167.

Devlin, an electrician, was instrumental in setting up the cameras and launching the program.

"You don't have to spend a ton of money," he said.

It costs only $.18 for a blank DVD.

Baptisms, first Communion and confirmations are also recorded and offered to parishioners in exchange for a $5 donation.

That money is used to purchase the blank DVDs; thus the program is self-supporting.

Each year, Knights of Columbus councils from around the state submit their best projects to be judged on the state level.

This year, DVDs for the Homebound was awarded first prize.

The program was then judged by the Supreme Council, the governing body of the Knights of Columbus, where it took second place out of 13,000 councils internationally.

"We were very proud of getting the award," said Devlin, who was especially excited about the publicity the program has received as a result.

A recording of a baptism is seen on a television screen in the control room at St. Joseph Church in Kannapolis in this undated photo. Baptisms, first Communion and confirmations are recorded and offered to parishioners in exchange for a $5 donation to help support the DVDs for the Homebound ministry.

"We're having more and more councils and churches inquire about the program," he said.

"This is one of the programs we'd love everybody to steal," he added.

One facet of the program that Devlin has been particularly pleased with is the showing of the Mass DVDs at Concord House nursing home in Concord.

"The people who are in nursing homes and who are homebound begin to feel isolated from their faith communities," said Amy Detter, head of extraordinary ministers of holy Communion at St. Joseph Church.

"Being able to take the Mass to them and have them see it, and feel like they were present, helps them to stay connected to their faith community," she said.

At Concord House, a recording of the Mass is shown every Sunday night at 6:30 p.m.

There are only two Catholic residents in the nursing home, but eight to 14 residents typically attend the weekly viewings of the Mass.

"We're exposing the Catholic Mass to non-Catholics," said Devlin, who hopes to start bringing the DVDs of the Mass to two other nursing homes in the area as well.

"For those who are not members of our faith community who happen to be in a nursing home that we service, they at least feel like they are getting to participate in a Mass, even if it is just viewing it," said Detter.

"It really has a positive impact on their outlook and helps them keep their faith strong, even though they are in difficult circumstances," she said.

Teens far and wide take part in workcamp

GREENSBORO — For some teenagers, summer wasn't only about vacationing.

As teens and chaperones from St. Paul the Apostle Church in Greensboro traveled to Pennsylvania, hundreds of others came from around the country to Greensboro.

The youths and adults were taking part in Catholic Heart Workcamp, a national organization that provides teens with opportunities for faith-powered mission work throughout the country. The exchange took place July 20-26.

The group of about 30 teens from St. Paul the Apostle Church spent their time performing service projects around Greensburg, Pa. One group of six worked at Union Mission, a men's shelter, where they rose at 6:15 a.m. every morning to strip wallpaper and paint; build sheds; install toilets, kitchen cabinets, sinks and lights.

Teens came to Greensboro from Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Maryland, Minnesota, Missouri, New Jersey, North Carolina, Pennsylvania and Virginia. At night they slept on the floor of St. Paul the Apostle Church's parish life center. During the day, they worked on homes of area senior citizens, cleared brush at two therapeutic riding centers and assisted hospice clients.

Catholic Heart Workcamp was founded in Orlando, Fla., in 1993. The first workcamp in Orlando drew 100 participants. Today, there are hundreds of parishes and thousands of teens involved in cities across the United States, and in Jamaica and Mexico.

End-of-summer spirituality

Ana, who is fluent in both English and Spanish, organized and planned the entire program, which mixed learning with interactive games and sports. In the classes, Ana taught the children about science, plants, animals, insects and the solar system.

Ana wanted to utilize her Spanish and teaching skills as a summer project, and plans to hold the program again next summer.

Parish committee reorganizes to encourage more stewardship in youths

GREENSBORO — The Youth Stewardship Committee at St. Pius X Church in Greensboro has been re-established and renamed the Youth Stewards in Action Committee.

"This committee will help nurture our parish-wide goal of 'stewardship as a way of life' by focusing directly on our youngest members," said Pat Spivey, pastoral associate.

"Both our church and school youths have always been involved in service," said Karen Lizotte, parish school board president and committee co-chair.

"But by forming this committee, the hope is to provide education, share ideas and offer support to those who serve all the children in our parish," she said.

The committee has planned monthly stewardship themes with related opportunities and activities that will be the focus of the entire parish. Themes include "Stewardship of Prayer," "Stewardship of Community," "Stewardship of Family" and "Stewardship of Creation."

The committee kicked off the new school year by sponsoring two mini retreats for both the parish faith formation catechists and the school teachers Aug. 19 and Sept. 15.

"Most people associate stewardship with the giving of money," said Lorraine Malphurs, second-grade teacher and committee member.

"We need to encourage a new way of thinking to help our children learn that all their gifts have been given by God and that they are called by their baptism to develop and share those gifts," said Malphurs.

The parish's first organized stewardship efforts began in 1986 and since then the parish has maintained an active stewardship committee. In the last few years, under the guidance of Msgr. Anthony Marcaccio, pastor, stewardship has become a hallmark of the parish.

Committee members hope to help children recognize their gifts and make stewardship a way of life.

We need a sign

Lord uses Marian apparitions to answer our deepest needs

How often have you heard someone say, "Where was God when I needed him?"

As frustrating as it may be to comprehend, God is never absent. He speaks to us in countless ways. Most of the time we are too spiritually deaf to hear his divine whisperings.

I am writing this article early in the morning on Aug. 11, 2008, because later tonight, God willing, I will be on a plane to one of the holiest places on earth, Lourdes, France. I am really excited to be leading a group of 80 pilgrims on their way to experience one of the great mystical realities of the church.

This year marks the 150th anniversary of the apparition of Mary, the mother of Jesus, to St. Bernadette, where she said, "I am the Immaculate Conception."

Pope Benedict XVI said this on Feb. 11, 2007, the feast of Our Lady of Lourdes: "The Virgin's appeal for prayer and penance resounds forcefully as an almost permanent echo of the invitation with which Jesus began his pilgrimage in Galilee."

Not everyone is inclined to believe in the factual reality of the Lourdes apparition, but they don't have to. This is not a matter of faith, like believing in the divinity of Christ or the Real Presence. It is more a matter of opening one's eyes, admitting that God may not be as silent as we might have thought.

An apparition is a sign to prepare and purify us for a great event, the day when we return fully to the Lord. It is also given to ignite a fire for the Lord here and now, to help us unite with him and his mystical body, the church.

Mary's original message in the Gospel is the same today: "Do whatever he tells you."

At Lourdes she asks us to pray and do penance. The need to unite with Jesus in offering our sufferings for the redemption of the world is as important now as it was at the time of his crucifixion.

On Aug. 6 each year we celebrate the feast of the Transfiguration, which was a sign from God of mystical intensity.

On Mount Tabor, God appeared to Peter, James and John to announce, "This is my beloved Son, with whom I am well pleased." It was a sign given to the church to ready us for the scandals and hard times we would have to face down through the ages, and to help us reaffirm our faith in Jesus.

Lourdes is a mystical sign of God's loving care. He uses Mary to answer our deepest needs, and his divine whisperings are not subtle for those who have ears to hear.

The walls covered with crutches testify to the many miraculous healings at Lourdes, which have occurred over those 150 years. People by the millions have been transported from fear to peace and from hopelessness to joyful expectation.

Bernadette's body was buried more than 122 years ago, but it was discovered only 30 years ago that her remains were still fresh. Instead of decayed bones, her body was intact, and a mystical fragrance of flowers greeted those who opened the tomb.

Even today some pilgrims smell this uniquely sweet aroma when they pass her glass coffin in Lourdes where she is perfectly preserved.

I will offer a special Mass at Lourdes for all who read this column.

So much for freedom

So the National Abortion Rights Action League Pro-Choice America wants to have their cake and eat it too ("Not so pro-choice when it deals with freedom of conscience," Stephen Kent, Sept. 5).

That is, pregnant women who don't want to be pregnant should be able to go to a health care facility and demand an abortion, but a doctor dare not refuse from performing the procedure.

They think freedom is a good thing, so long as it's freedom to kill an unborn baby or freedom to surgically terminate one's reproductive capacity.

But don't expect Planned Parenthood or NARAL Pro-Choice America to be in favor of the freedom of health care workers to refuse to participate in such egregious offenses against God.

What's wrong with this picture?

'Holy days of opportunity'

We should never miss an opportunity for grace

Holy days: all the great religions have them. Jews have them. Muslims, Hindus and Buddhists have them. And we Christians have them.

Among Christians, we Catholics are the champs of holy days. We have more than anybody else.

Some evangelical Protestants don't have any except the Sunday. Following the Reformation, they thought that only the Sabbath should be observed since only the Sabbath was scripturally mandated.

The Puritans even suppressed Christmas. Maybe that's why there are no more Puritans.

But even the evangelicals cannot suppress the impulse to create "holy days." So they have Reformation Day (which we don't observe for obvious reasons) and Bible Sunday, which is nonscriptural but OK because it mentions the Bible.

Even secular society has "holy days," which in English we call holidays, an obvious rip off from "holy days."

Some civic holy days, like Independence Day, are promulgated by the government. Others, like Mother's Day and Administrative Professionals' Day, are promulgated by the greeting card and floral industries. These are "Hallmark holy days."

Some Christian holy days, like Christmas, cross the line from religious to civic. Conversely, some civic holy days, like Thanksgiving, have crossed the line in the other direction and become religious holy days. Thanksgiving is my favorite of this type because everybody in the United States observes it.

Catholics also have official and unofficial holy days, not to be confused with feast days. The official holy days are all the Sundays and what Catholics uniquely call "holy days of obligation."

That phrase is so Catholic. It combines the sense of the grace-filled with legal requirements. That's us: grace-filled legalists.

My ecclesiastical desk calendar lists 15 Catholic holy days and principal moveable feasts. Most are Sundays, like Easter or Pentecost.

Some Catholic holy days are not "of obligation" but everybody comes anyway. For instance, Ash Wednesday. The people have decided that these sorts

Parish Diary

FATHER PETER DALY
CNS COLUMNIST

of days should be holy days, even if the bishops haven't.

Good Friday should be a holy day "of obligation" but isn't. Seems like Good Friday is at least as important as the Assumption.

What do we do if we have a holy day of obligation and nobody comes? Punt.

Honest pastors will tell you that the pews are largely empty on some "second-tier" holy days like Ascension Thursday or the Immaculate Conception.

The U.S. bishops, having recognized this problem, developed a complicated set of rules that nobody can remember.

To wit: When a holy day falls on a Saturday or Monday, it is transferred to the following Sunday, except when it is a major feast.

OK.

It is so complicated that my calendar even has an asterisk which says, "See your local ordo for details." When you have to refer to another book, the calendar is way too complicated.

In my parish, I've tried to shift the emphasis away from the idea of obligation under pain of sin to opportunity for grace.

I call them (unofficially, of course) "holy days of opportunity." My people now recite this like a mantra. "Tomorrow is a holy day of opportunity."

I tell them God's grace awaits us. We are invited to the wedding banquet like the people in Jesus' parable. We should not refuse by saying, "I'm busy. I bought an ox." (Like Jesus is really going to believe that.)

We should never miss an opportunity for grace. Even if the government does not give you the day off. Even if it is transferred to the following Sunday by your local bishop. (See ordo for details.)

Go, because God's grace awaits you. It is an opportunity you don't want to miss.

Celebrating the Eucharist

Jesus, the bread of life, is with us in many ways

"I received from the Lord what I handed on to you, namely, that the Lord Jesus on the night in which he was betrayed, took bread, and after he had given thanks, broke it and said: 'This is my body, which is for you. Do this in remembrance of me.'"

"In the same way, after the supper, he took the saving cup, and said: 'This cup is the new covenant in my blood. Do this, whenever you drink it, in remembrance of me'" (1 Cor. 11:23-25).

We know that on the last night of his life, Jesus met with his disciples for the Last Supper, as we have come to call it. He wanted to do something that would make it possible for them to continue the experience of his living presence after he had gone.

St. John the Evangelist, also known as the Theologian, is the master of intimacy for his relationship with the Lord. His Gospel and letters are filled with expressions of emotional pathos.

He writes of Jesus' words: "The person who feeds on my flesh and drinks my blood remains in me, and I in him" (Jn. 6:55).

When I was student of theology, a long time ago, I was surprised that St. John was the only evangelist who did not report the institution of the Eucharist in his Gospel. Later I understood he took for granted that everybody knew of the great event, so there was no need to report what everybody realized.

I also understood later, with the guidance of a good theology professor, that St. John's method is to take one incident or saying and develop it in such a way as to sharpen our understanding.

For example, his entire sixth chapter develops the theme of Jesus as the "bread of life." It is as if a great composer had taken his theme and developed it into a magnificent symphony.

Our gracious God reveals himself to us in many different ways. He reveals himself through historical events — an exodus from Egypt or a journey to Jerusalem. He comes to us through people, whom we can love and who can love us in return.

He indeed comes to us in countless ways, but St. John puts great emphasis on one very special way: He comes to us in the person of Jesus Christ as the bread of life.

The Catholic Church has always placed the Eucharist as a top priority and it will continue to do so, because without it, we cannot make our journey. It was 762 years ago that the feast of Corpus Christi was instituted by the bishop of Liege, Robert of Turotte, following the vision of Juliana of Liege, Belgium.

Later, Pope Urban IV, originally from Belgium himself, extended the observance of this feast to the entire Roman Catholic Church in 1264.

The real importance of celebrating the Eucharist is more than a remembrance; it is a celebration of life and life's attitudes. We can view our reality in a negative way, or we can view it Jesus' way, and find his presence wherever we are, wherever we look.

St. Paul embodies characteristics of Jesus' apostles, says pope

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Although St. Paul was not one of the initial companions and followers of Jesus, he was a true apostle, Pope Benedict XVI said.

"St. Paul dedicated his entire existence to the Gospel, 24 hours a day," the pope said at his Sept. 10 weekly general audience at the Vatican.

The pope said St. Paul makes clear in his letters that he did not place himself on the same level as the original Twelve Apostles who were called personally by Jesus and were his companions during his earthly ministry.

Yet St. Paul's encounter with the risen Christ on the road to Damascus "led to his mission; he could not continue as before, but was charged by the Lord to proclaim the resurrection, the Gospel, to be an apostle."

Pope Benedict has been talking about St. Paul during the Wednesday audiences as part of the church's celebration of the 2,000th anniversary of St. Paul's birth.

In today's catechesis we turn to St. Paul's view of what it means to be an apostle of Jesus Christ.

Though he did not belong to the group of the Twelve, called by Jesus during his ministry, Paul nevertheless claims the title for himself because he was chosen and transformed by the grace of God, and shared the three principal characteristics of the true apostle.

The first is to have seen the Lord (1 Cor 9:1) and to have been called by him. One becomes an apostle by divine vocation, not by personal choice.

The second characteristic also underlines the divine initiative: an apostle is someone who is sent and therefore acts and speaks as a delegate of Christ, placed totally at his service.

The third characteristic is dedication to the work of proclaiming the Gospel and founding Christian communities.

St. Paul can point to his many trials and sufferings that speak clearly of his courageous dedication to the mission (cf. 2 Cor 11:23-28). In this context he sees an identification between the life of the apostle and the Gospel that he preaches; the apostle himself is despised when the Gospel is rejected. St. Paul was steadfast in his many difficulties and persecutions, sustained above all by the unfailing love of Christ (cf. Rom 8:35-39). May the example of his apostolic zeal inspire and encourage us today.

It's time to pay attention

Consider church teaching before voting

Once, mid-September meant the beginning of the campaign conducted in the few weeks between the end of the political conventions and Election Day.

That was before politics fell victim to the pressures of media and marketing so that the presidential campaigns seem to commence a week after inauguration day.

The extended presidential campaign, relegated by over familiarity to background white noise because of its length, now regains its claim on the national agenda.

It's time to pay attention.

That means taking a closer look at our responsibilities.

Two perennial misunderstandings are bound to occur again: Those who believe Catholics are told by the church hierarchy for whom to vote and those Catholics who implore the church to do exactly that.

It is as erroneous to say that the church dictates candidates as it is presumptuous to say that it should.

The truth is that it is an individual's responsibility to decide whom to vote for, a decision that must be guided by faith and by measuring candidates against the standards based on that faith.

This is the time of year that editors brace themselves for the e-mails and letters accusing them of or complimenting them for favoring one candidate over another. They are based often on articles that explain candidates' positions on issues.

Forming a right conscience requires discernment. Discernment is more and more difficult to accomplish in the age of instant information, when anyone's blog or Web site can post information verifiable or otherwise.

Previously it was the role of the mainstream media — yes, those with conscientious professional journalists — who reported and placed news events into context for their readers.

Today, as any wild charge or statement can gain circulation and credulity with little analysis, the media must help build the capacity of readers to help themselves.

Stories are created by Facebooks, text messages, blogs and virtual reality environments. Social networks change how we interact.

The role of responsible publications is to enhance the capability of the community to assess needs, solve problems and create solutions.

The duty of sorting through the spinning and Swift boating becomes increasingly difficult every election. A major tool in this is the statement published every four years by the U.S. bishops. This year's title is "Forming Consciences for Faithful Citizenship: A Call to Political Responsibility."

Its purpose, in its own words:

"This statement highlights the role

Consider This

STEPHEN KENT
CNS COLUMNIST

of the church in the formation of conscience and the corresponding moral responsibility of each Catholic to hear, receive and act upon the church's teaching in the lifelong task of forming his or her own conscience.

"With this foundation, Catholics are better able to evaluate policy positions, party platforms and candidates' promises and actions in light of the Gospel and the moral and social teaching of the church in order to help build a better world."

In addition to the document itself, the Web site (www.faithfulcitizenship.org) has abundant resources — articles, videos, podcasts — all meant to assist the individual to shoulder his or her responsibility of citizenship.

There are still many weeks remaining before going to polls.

Consider this: How many hours do you spend on preparing income taxes? Think of investing at least that amount of time in studying the issues, the candidates and church teaching.

To do less is a grave failure of our responsibility as faithful citizens.

LOURDES, France — Being pope is not a one-dimensional job, a fact that was clearly evident during Pope Benedict XVI's four-day visit to France.

Arriving in Paris Sept. 12, the pope first engaged in an important political encounter that attempted to build on the new openness shown the church by President Nicolas Sarkozy.

Next, in a brief meeting with Jews, he managed to capsuleize in 20 graceful lines the church's respect for Judaism and its firm rejection of anti-Semitism.

That evening, the pope slipped into his academic role and delivered a lecture on monasticism's influence on

However, the Catholic version of the Bible is actually a library of books specifically chosen to reflect Catholic

RIDE NICE, PRAY HARD

Sisters, motorcycle gang form unlikely bond

MILWAUKEE (CNS) — Don't let their veils and name — Sisters of Charity of St. Joan Antida — deceive you. Members of the Milwaukee order aren't just brides of Christ. They're biker girls.

"We're part of a gang," the sisters laughed over coffee.

They belong to the Sisters of the MMG (Muskegon Motorcycle Gang).

When the Harley-Davidson 100th anniversary celebration rolled around in 2003, the sisters opened up the grounds of their retreat center to Harley riders looking for a place to sleep during the festivities. The Muskegon Motorcycle Gang from Michigan took the sisters up on their offer.

"It was a bit scary," said Sister Ann Josepha Lencioni of the decision. "But the sisters pulled together and felt it would be a good thing for Milwaukee."

For the riders, some of whom had never interacted with a Catholic sister before, the feeling was mutual.

"It wasn't that we were scared; we just wanted to make the nuns as comfortable as possible," said Mike Ankeny of the group, which signed contracts to follow a few house rules such as no smoking indoors. "We're a good mix, even though we're on different parts of the tree."

As Harley upon Harley made its way to the retreat center, the riders and sisters wondered just what they had gotten into.

"I was a little nervous," said rider Patty Matuzeski. "We didn't know what to expect — but it was so much more than we ever could have imagined."

Within minutes, any apprehension had faded. Over the next few days, the riders and sisters were dining with each other, cracking jokes and taking rides on the group's bikes.

"They are such incredible people who are concerned about and love the sisters," said Toni Vitano, the order's communications director. "Professional people — they're not Hell's Angels, just a group of people who love motorcycles."

While some of the riders are Catholic, others are not, but it is no matter when it comes to the impact the sisters have on the MMG, as evidenced in their exit surveys.

"As someone not raised in a religious environment, after staying with all of you and getting to know all of the sisters I feel a few steps closer to God!" wrote one participant.

After bestowing on them the title Sisters of the MMG and bidding the sisters farewell in 2003, the unlikely friends stayed in touch, writing Christmas cards and e-mails. As bikers rolled into Milwaukee Aug. 30-Sept. 1 for the 105th Harley-Davidson anniversary, the MMG found their way back to the sisters for another weekend of fun and fellowship.

In that sharing, the two groups have found some unexpected similarities.

"We're kind of alike," said Patrick Corbin. "They're stereotyped; we're stereotyped."

The MMG, made up of professionals working in various career paths such as nursing and engineering, also devote their time to serving others, recently raising $11,000 for the Make-A-Wish Foundation. The group plans to do future fundraisers to aid the sisters in their service to the poor.

There are no official membership requirements in the MMG, which is held together by friendship. The gang, 15 years old, numbers around 100 riders.

The sisters, who hold their faith as dearly as the Harley riders hold their bikes, only had one piece of advice for their friends: "Ride nice. Pray hard."

Residents urged to be patient, kind as all cope with aftermath of Ike

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The retired archbishop of Galveston-Houston told a small congregation gathered for Mass Sept. 14 at Sacred Heart Co-Cathedral in Houston to stay calm in the aftermath of Hurricane Ike and to be friendly to one another, especially as they coped with the challenge of living without electricity.

Archbishop Joseph A. Fiorenza also told them to be grateful the storm, which made landfall Sept. 13, had not taken as many lives as was feared. The Category 2 storm killed 30 people in its path across eight states.

"This calls us in times of great distress to have patience and kindness with one another, to realize we are going to have a long time of endurance and great inconvenience," he said. "But with good humor and God's grace and our public officials ... hopefully the time of great endurance won't be too long."

When Hurricane Ike swept across the Texas coast with its 100 mph winds, battering waves and torrential rains, it damaged thousands of homes, submerged huge sections of Galveston and left at least 2 million people without power.

Archdiocesan Catholic schools were closed Sept. 15 and were to reopen "according to their readiness and safety," said an announcement. Only essential departments at the chancery were open.

The pastoral center and Catholic schools in the Diocese of Beaumont, Texas, were closed "until further notice" because of a lack of electricity, and Catholics there were not required to fulfill their Sunday Mass obligation during the Sept. 13-14 weekend.

Catholic Charities agencies set up mobile food centers and community resource sites in southern Texas after the storm to provide food, water, ice, hygiene kits, tarps and cleanup supplies. They also provided gas cards and other aid to assist stranded evacuees in their return home as well as crisis counseling and case management.

FROM THE VATICAN

Pope appeals to UN for more guarantees of economic justice

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — In a message to the United Nations, the pope called for stronger efforts to guarantee economic justice around the globe.

Renewing an appeal made during his visit to the United Nations last April, Pope Benedict XVI encouraged the international community to return to "the lofty moral vision and the transcendent principles of justice embodied in the United Nations' founding documents."

His comments came in a message to a prayer service Sept. 15, the eve of the 63rd session of the U.N. General Assembly in New York.

The prayer service took place at the Church of the Holy Family, located close to U.N. headquarters in New York. Attending were diplomats, U.N. officials and religious leaders, including Cardinal Edward M. Egan of New York and Archbishop Celestino Migliore, the Vatican's permanent observer to the United Nations.

The pope said such moments of reflection and prayer were a way to strengthen diplomats in their commitment to "upholding the dignity of each human person and building a world of ever greater solidarity, freedom and peace."

The pope offered his own prayer that U.N. representatives would receive from God the guidance and strength to carry out urgent tasks "aimed at ensuring that the whole human family shared in the benefits of globalization."

Specifically, he called for implementation of the Millennium Development Goals, a plan that aims to cut global poverty in half by 2015, and progress on the New Partnership for Africa's Development (NEPAD).

The Vatican has strongly supported NEPAD, a program that aims to develop a socio-economic framework for Africa while encouraging African governments to take greater responsibility for the development of their own societies.

Cardinal: Some not satisfied even after pope's Tridentine Mass decree

ROME (CNS) — Rather than being grateful, some people have reacted to Pope Benedict XVI's wider permission for the celebration of the Mass in the extraordinary form with further demands, said Cardinal Dario Castrillon Hoyos.

The cardinal, president of the Pontifical Commission "Ecclesia Dei," spoke Sept. 16 at a conference marking the first anniversary of "Summorum Pontificum," the document by which Pope Benedict expanded access to the Mass rite used before the Second Vatican Council.

Cardinal Castrillon, whose commission works with communities using the old rite, said his office continues to receive letters requesting the rite be used not just at one Mass a week but at every Mass, and that such Masses be available not just at one church in a town but at every church.

He said he even got a letter demanding that Rome's Basilica of St. Mary Major be dedicated exclusively to the celebration of the Mass in the extraordinary form.

Such people, he said, are "insatiable, incredible."

"They do not know the harm they are doing," Cardinal Castrillon said, adding that when the Vatican does not accept their demands immediately "they go directly to the Internet" and post their complaints.

The cardinal and officials in his office have been saying for more than a year now that they were preparing detailed instructions responding to questions about how to implement the papal document, which said the Mass in the new Roman Missal, introduced in 1970, remains the ordinary way of Catholic worship.

Cardinal Castrillon's office had completed its work on the instructions and passed the draft on to the pope, who would make the final decision about its publication.

The cardinal said the Mass — in whatever language it is celebrated — must be a service motivated by love and "never a sword" used against other Christians.

By making it easier for priests to celebrate the older liturgy and for the faithful to have access to it, he said, "the vicar of Christ (the pope) was not just exercising his task of governing, but was exercising his task of sanctifying" the people of God.

"When we are before the greatest expression of love for humanity — the Eucharist — how can we fight?" Cardinal Castrillon asked.

Bishops invite McCain, Obama to meet before election

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops has extended invitations to Republican Sen. John McCain and Democratic Sen. Barack Obama to meet before the Nov. 4 election and discuss their views on a variety of election issues.

Bishop William F. Murphy of Rockville Centre, N.Y., chairman of the bishops' Committee on Domestic Justice and Human Development, said that five bishops who lead various policy committees want to discuss the candidates' views on social policies such as abortion, education, immigration, international affairs and communications.

Any meetings, should they occur, will be private and off the record, Bishop Murphy said.

"This isn't born of any concern or worry or problem," Bishop Murphy said. "We think it would be helpful for us to have that time and we think it would be helpful for the candidates to hear from the teachers of the Catholic Church ... as to what our concerns are."

The invitations are the first in recent memory to seek meetings prior to an election. They were sent prior to USCCB responses earlier in September to two Democrats who support legalized abortion.

Teens recognized for pro-life effort

CHARLOTTE — Two young parishioners of St. Matthew Church in Charlotte were recognized recently by the Charlotte Right to Life chapter for their pro-life efforts in the community.

The "Hero for Life" $2,000 academic scholarship was awarded to Erin and Katie Gibson during a presentation at St. Matthew Church Sept. 13. They were recognized for their project "CRIB" (Caring Relief for Impoverished Babies), through which they assembled 60 layettes containing diapers, clothing and other infant care goods for new mothers in need.

Erin Gibson, a senior at Charlotte Latin School, accepted the award on behalf of herself and her sister Katie, a freshman at Mount Holyoke College in Massachusetts, who was unable to attend.

The Gibsons collected a total of $8,000 worth of infant care goods from their parish, neighborhood and area schools.

"It just makes you feel better when you help others," said Erin Gibson, "especially a baby that can't take care of itself."

Father Patrick Toole, parochial vicar at St. Matthew Church, opened the event with prayer.

"We are reminded of the little ways that we can live the message of the 'Gospel of Life,'" said Father Toole.

"It's wonderful that we come together and recognize young people in our community who have the courage to spread that message," he said.

Jeannie Wray, executive director of Room at the Inn in Charlotte, spoke at the event. She praised the Gibsons for their courage and moral faith, and their willingness "to stand up and be counted."

The award was presented by Seth Dobson, chapter president of Charlotte Right to Life, and Jason Beckert, chair of the "Hero for Life" scholarship committee.

Students between the ages of 14 and 18 are encouraged to apply for the scholarship, which has been given out annually since 2005. Projects must be pro-life in nature; may be oriented around service, education or prayer; and should demonstrate a component of leadership.

"It is rare to find teenagers who go beyond themselves to help others and help the unborn," said Beckert.

The scholarship is "designed to bring up the next generation of leaders," he said. "We have high hopes for these winners."

FROM THE COVER

Workshop explores stewardship as a way of life

supper and presentation on stewardship followed in the parish hall.

"For decades in this one church alone people have come to know Jesus," Father Shawn O'Neal, the pastor, said in his homily.

"May this place be a church of witness and hospitality for 67 times 67 years. ... May people rejoice in the Lord being their foundation," he said.

Father O'Neal's words helped set the tone for Barbara Gaddy's presentation on stewardship. Gaddy, associate director of development for the Diocese of Charlotte, spoke of how stewardship means answering God's call and committing one's life to Christ — not some time in the future but right now.

"In John's Gospel, Jesus recognized the disciples and called them by name because of the gifts they had; they were patient, strong, hardworking," Gaddy said. "We have to recognize that we're called, not as some nameless faces in a crowd, but with our own unique gifts."

We are called, she said, with the same urgency that Jesus called his disciples: "He didn't say, 'When you get your affairs in order or have some extra time, go out and proclaim the Word.'"

This is also true for us, according to Gaddy.

"The disciples weren't called in isolation but as part of a community," Gaddy said. "We are not called as hermits up in the hills. We are called into a community."

"At the same time, the parish, the community, has the responsibility to provide opportunities for you to use your gifts. These gifts are not given to us to hoard but to give away," she said.

Whatever someone does for the community is a way to give back to God for all he has given to that person, said Gaddy.

Everyone can use his or her talents in some way: lector, extraordinary minister of holy Communion, altar server, cantor, choir member; he or she can mow the church lawn or the lawn of an elderly or handicapped person, cook for parish events, arrange flowers, serve as a catechist, carpenter, plumber, teach English as a second language or tutor, and so on.

"A real disciple of Jesus Christ doesn't ask, 'What's it going to cost me.' They just do it," Gaddy said.

There is also discipleship through visiting the homebound and those in nursing homes, spending quality time with one's family or volunteering at a soup kitchen or homeless shelter.

However, there is another aspect of giving time to discipleship — spending time with God. Gaddy cited such ways as regularly attending Mass, receiving the sacraments, partaking in daily prayer and Scripture reading, participating in a prayer chain or group, fasting and spiritual reading.

There are, of course, stumbling blocks to discipleship. Gaddy listed such obstacles as "spiritual blindness" (not seeing God as the source of all good), not trusting God, secular culture contradicting religious convictions, secular focus on self and pleasure, consumerism, materialism, amoral values, busy schedules and a culture of skepticism and pessimism.

"We need a new mindset," said Allison Wunder, who is about to begin the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults to be received into the Catholic Church.

"We need to give up that old mindset we've always had," she said.

Parishioner Kathy Tilly told how lives were changed and parishioners at her former parish achieved a new mindset when the pastor formed teams to visit people with AIDS.

As the parishioners became acquainted with those they visited, they overcame their fear of the AIDS victims, she said.

"Taking a leap of faith," Tilly said, "means putting total trust in God."

Obstacles to discipleship can also be countered through giving back to God with financial contributions to one's parish and community. Some people give the traditional 10 percent; some give more.

"That 10 percent isn't ours to begin with," said Naomi Lowman, a parishioner of St. Joseph Church. "Are we going to give back to God what's God's?"

Gaddy reminded everyone of their purpose, as defined in the old Baltimore Catechism: God made us to know, love and serve him in this world and be happy with him in the next.

"All the things of this world have been given to us to help us meet the end for which we've been created," Gaddy said. "If it doesn't help me, I need to push that aside."

"Living as stewards calls us to that discernment," she said. "I have to ask myself every day: Am I using this in a way that helps me reach the end for which I'm created?"

'Stewardship: A Disciple's Response'

The U.S. bishops' pastoral letter on stewardship, published in 1992 and reissued in 2002, is based on three convictions:

— Mature disciples make a conscious, firm decision, carried out in action, to be followers of Jesus Christ no matter the cost to themselves.

— This commitment is expressed not in a single action but in an entire way of life. It means committing one's very self to the Lord.

— Stewardship is an expression of discipleship, with the power to change how we understand and live out our lives. Disciples who practice stewardship recognize God as the origin of life, the giver of freedom, the source of all they have and are and will be.

A year of song

Singers perform during the sacred music concert at the Eucharistic Congress in 2006. This year's concert, scheduled for Oct. 3, will feature selections spanning the various seasons of the liturgical year.

Preparation underway for sacred music concert at Eucharistic Congress

BY KATIE MOORE
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — The audience can expect to "travel through time" during this year's sacred music concert at the fourth annual Eucharistic Congress in Charlotte Friday, Oct. 3.

The Eucharistic Congress will be held at the Charlotte Convention Center Oct. 3-4. Events on Saturday include a eucharistic procession through uptown Charlotte.

This year, in accordance with the congress' theme, "It is Christ Whom We Proclaim," "we decided that we were going to choose music that followed the liturgical year, so that there is an understanding that we proclaim Christ throughout the entire year," said Tiffany Gallozzi, music director at St. Barnabas Church in Arden and conductor of the sacred music concert.

In the past, songs have been a collection of traditional and contemporary classical pieces and have always been chosen in accordance with the congress' theme.

This year, the song selections will span the various seasons of the liturgical year with pieces representing Advent, Christmas, Lent, Easter, Pentecost and Ordinary Time.

The song selection also will represent various time periods in the history of the Catholic Church.

"We really did try to span all variables of music history," said Gallozzi. "So it's not all one style of music. It spans through time."

The concert of sacred music will kick off the Eucharistic Congress, following a greeting from Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin at 7 p.m. on Friday.

There are approximately 110 choir members, representing approximately 14 parishes throughout the diocese.

Some choir members began practicing as early as June. All of the singers will come together for a group rehearsal the day of the concert.

Organist for the concert will be Larry Stratemeyer, music director at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte.

A flautist and trumpeter will also accompany.

"Each year this concert is a huge undertaking," said Gallozzi. "It's really a gift of the individual parish singers and instrumentalists to the congress."

"It's our way of expressing our faith," she said.

To know the faith

Theology expert discusses what divides, unites Christians

BY KATHLEEN
HEALY SCHMIEDER
CORRESPONDENT

HENDERSONVILLE — Catholics must be well-versed in the teachings of their faith in order to evangelize others, said a theology expert.

"We have to know our faith enough. We must show the living, Christian faith in us," said Marcellino D'Ambrosio, co-founder of The Crossroads Initiative, a Catholic renewal and evangelization group.

"The belief that Catholics are superstitious or have no relationship with Jesus can be changed when we live our faith in a vital way," he said. "You don't need to be a theologian to explain the church or express our faith in conversational terms."

D'Ambrosio spoke on the issues that divide Christianity and the visions of the Second Vatican Council at Immaculate Conception Church in Hendersonville Sept. 6.

Approximately 200 parishioners and members of other area Christian churches attended the presentation, organized by the parish evangelization committee.

With a doctorate in historical theology from Catholic University of America, D'Ambrosio is an author, columnist and specialist in Scripture interpretation and tradition. He has appeared on EWTN and Catholic radio discussing topics including historical, dogmatic and sacramental theology; evangelization; and ecumenism.

In his talk on "Christianity Divided," D'Ambrosio used historical facts and timelines to delineate the progression of Christianity from the time of the Acts of the Apostles and Sts. Peter and Paul into the 21st century.

He discussed the schisms that arose between the Eastern Orthodox and the western Roman Catholic churches, as well as the introduction of Protestant denominations.

Evaluated from the views of the eras in which they occurred, but with the understanding afforded by the perspective of time, D'Ambrosio focused on the areas uniting Christians. He also noted the areas where no compromise can be afforded in the faith given by Jesus to his people.

"We must not gloss over the issues," D'Ambrosio told the audience. "We must move beyond the caricatures, listen to those of other faiths and be prepared to explain our own faith."

Offering scholarly teaching designed to create understanding and fellowship D'Ambrosio also gave the audience a clear description of the articles of faith upon which the Catholic Church was built.

D'Ambrosio said Vatican II's vision of evangelization and ecumenism continues and is reinforced by the church's ongoing outreach to other religions.

"It's not just doctrines and ideas; it's relationships that need to be repaired," said D'Ambrosio.

"Ecumenism should be an exchange of gifts. Our fundamental faith is expressed in the Creed. Our central unity (with other Christians) is in Jesus Christ and the Trinity."

"We have apostolic leadership. It is our rudder," said D'Ambrosio. "The leadership of the Catholic Church will not bow to societal pressure. We have decisive leadership."

Vatican II, he said, advised Catholics to "honor truth wherever we find it." D'Ambrosio advised the audience to ask questions to learn what others believe so they can introduce them to the Catholic faith through informed conversation, as well as through other individuals, books and events in the church.

"Share your story," he said. "It starts with a smile and loving people. Think of your own story and let people know that Christ is making a difference in your own life."

organizations, missions, ministries, apostolates and institutions for prayer, networking, strategic planning and talks and panel discussions.

"Through the Catholic Leadership Conference, Catholic leaders have the opportunity to meet and discuss important issues affecting our church," said Gail Buckley, a member of the conference steering committee.

Talks and panel discussion topics included Catholics in politics, the Muslim "threat" to religious liberties around the world and religious liberty in U.S. courts.

The closing Mass was celebrated by Bishop Robert F. Vasa of Baker, Ore., and concelebrated by Bishop Peter J. Jugis and other priests.

During his talk, Donohue said there is a "disconnect" between many Catholics and the church.

"Catholics don't experience individual discrimination. They have jobs, their kids are in school, they are doing well," he said.

When the church is attacked in the media, said Donohue, many "Catholics say, 'Let the bishops take care of that.' Well, the bishops need our support."

It was Donohue who led a recent campaign drawing attention to televised comments by the evangelical minister Rev. John Hagee, who called the Catholic Church "the great whore," an "apostate church," the "Antichrist" and a "false cult system."

The words of the minister, the pastor of the Cornerstone Church in San Antonio, became an issue because of his endorsement of a presidential candidate, Sen. John McCain.

Donohue called on the minister to apologize and on May 12, Rev. Hagee sent a letter to Donohue apologizing for any comments he made "that Catholics have found hurtful."

Donohue said after receiving Rev. Hagee's apology that "the case is closed" and, after meeting with him May 15, that he "found him to be sincere, apologetic and friendly."

During his talk at the conference, Donohue explored the "multidimensionality" of anti-Catholicism in the United States. He said some criticism of the Catholic Church is acceptable, so long as it isn't hateful or disdainful.

"Fair criticism is OK ... so long as it doesn't become disparaging or hit below the belt," he said. "No Catholic bashing is allowed."

An example of unacceptable criticism is Catholic liturgy, said Donohue.

"They have to understand that the church has 'house rules' just like any other religion or institution," he said.

An anti-Catholic attitude against individuals and the church institution was prevalent in the United States for a long time, said Donohue.

"Those were ugly days for America, and they weren't that long ago," he said. But President John F. Kennedy "changed the mold," said Donohue.

"There's no question that when he became president, something dramatic did happen," he said. "Hatred against individual Catholics declined."

Catholics must be vigilant, he said, and continue to defend their church and its teachings, which tend to "clash with that of contemporary society."

Conference issues statement on Catholics, voting

CHARLOTTE — The Catholic Leadership Conference has issued a statement for Catholic voters, saying Catholics must always be guided in their political participation by the moral and social teachings of the Catholic Church.

The statement was issued during the conference's annual gathering in Charlotte Sept. 11-12. The conference previously has issued statements on stem cells, cloning and judicial review.

"Catholics should recognize that not all moral and social issues have equal weight in determining how to cast their vote because there is a hierarchy of values and their application," said the statement on voting.

The taking of innocent life through abortion or euthanasia, or at the embryonic stage for medical research, can never be supported, it said. These actions are "intrinsically evil and violate the natural law, since they always involve the direct and intentional taking of innocent human life. Such acts are always to be avoided and abhorred in positive law and public policy."

Catholic voters are "morally obliged" to base their decisions "on issues which admit of no prudential judgment, such as direct abortion, the obligation to protect marriage between a man and a woman," it said. While "there is no single 'Catholic' position on issues like immigration, taxes, education and delivery of medical care ... there are Catholic principles, such as the dignity of the human person and fundamental rights, which should always be considered." These principles "are set forth in the body of church teaching referred to as the 'social doctrine' of the Catholic Church."

Western civilization to 700 scholars and intellectuals.

He then switched gears and led vespers in Notre Dame Cathedral with priests and religious, emphasizing that while their ranks may be thinning their role in the church has lost none of its value and, indeed, is irreplaceable.

Finally, he stepped outside and energized a waiting crowd of 40,000 young people, drawing roars of approval when he said the church needs them and has confidence in them. It was a whirlwind beginning and demonstrated a remarkable pastoral versatility on the part of the 81-year-old pontiff.

The next day, after celebrating Mass for a larger-than-expected crowd in Paris, he went to Lourdes and showed another side of his role as universal pastor — a Marian side.

It's no secret that, as a theologian and bishop, Pope Benedict was not always comfortable with Marian devotion and claims of apparitions. But over the years he has widened his views, saying in 2002 that, "the older I am, the more important the mother of God is to me."

So at Lourdes pilgrims heard the scholarly pope preach the value of "humble and intense prayer" like the rosary. He told his listeners that devotion to Mary was not a form of "pious infantilism" but an expression of spiritual maturity.

When he took a drink from the Lourdes spring that many pilgrims believe to be the font of miraculous cures, he was demonstrating that the Christian lives by simple signs and symbols as well as by theological ideas.

The pope's trip to Lourdes was bound to be compared to Pope John Paul II's moving visit to the shrine in 2004. Ailing and unsteady, the late pope had to ask for help on the altar; it was his last foreign trip.

Pope Benedict was not a personal witness to suffering like his predecessor, but he left no doubt that ministry to the sick is a benchmark of Catholicism.

At his Mass with thousands of sick people Sept. 15, the final day of his visit, he thanked Catholics at Lourdes and all over the world who volunteer their time and effort to help the infirm.

That highlighted a key theme of Pope Benedict's pontificate, one he has underlined in encyclicals but which is sometimes overlooked: that personal charity — love in action — is the ultimate expression of faith in Jesus Christ.

Another difference between Pope Benedict and Pope John Paul surfaced during the visit.

The late pope, on his first trip to France in 1980, sternly critiqued the French drift from the faith, asking Catholics, "France, the eldest daughter of the church, are you faithful to the promise of your baptism?"

Pope Benedict took a softer approach, alluding to pastoral problems but keeping the focus on the positive — for example, the enthusiastic crowd of 260,000 people at his Paris liturgy.

In his final talk to French Catholics, he praised them for their "firm faith" and said he had been likewise encouraged by the strong turnout of youths at a Paris vigil.

Where he offered more instructional advice was in his talk to French bishops.

He touched on a sore point when he urged the bishops to show flexibility toward traditionalists who want to take advantage of his 2007 rule change on the use of the Mass in the extraordinary form, the Mass rite used before the Second Vatican Council.

As a whole, though, the pope framed his message in optimistic terms. Whether talking to politicians, pastoral workers, scholars, the sick or the young, he emphasized that the church is at home in France, and its voice — including the voice of prayer — must continue to be heard.

A source of hope

Thousands of sick flock to Lourdes to see pope, pray to Mary

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

LOURDES, France — From an altar ringed with wheelchairs and stretchers, Pope Benedict XVI encouraged thousands of sick people at Lourdes to seek solace in Mary's smile and maternal love.

Their devotion to Mary at a time of need is not "pious infantilism" but a sign of the highest spiritual maturity, the pope said Sept. 15.

It was the pontiff's last day in France and he dedicated it to the ill and infirm, who packed Rosary Square at the Marian sanctuaries in the Pyrenees town of Lourdes.

The pope administered the sacrament of the anointing of the sick to 10 people during the liturgy. Addressing each by name, he gently anointed their foreheads and hands with oil and invoked the mercy of the Lord.

The group receiving the sacrament included men and women, young and old, who met for the first time before the liturgy. As the youngest among them, a German girl, sat waiting for the Mass to begin, an elderly French nun in a wheelchair next to her reached out and held her hand.

Behind them stretched hundreds of the distinctive covered blue wheelchairs used to transport many of the sick at Lourdes. Most were there for the pope, but all had come to pray to Mary.

"I get a great feeling of well-being here. I'm in touch with God through Mary, right here in Lourdes," said Frank Nelson, a 72-year-old Irishman, who has been coming to the sanctuary since 1948.

Seated in a wheelchair next to others in his pilgrim group, he added that he also has come for "some healing," after undergoing two hip operations, stomach surgery and treatment for prostate cancer.

In his sermon, the pope said devotion to Mary can help break the isolation of suffering. Far from being an act of "outmoded sentimentality," he said, turning to Mary demonstrates that people "know precisely how to acknowledge their weakness and their poverty before God."

He recalled that St. Bernadette Soubirous, who experienced visions of Mary 150 years ago in Lourdes, first noticed Mary's smile. This smile remains a source of hope for many who endure illness and distress, he said.

"Unfortunately, we know only too well: The endurance of suffering can upset life's most stable equilibrium, it can shake the firmest foundations of confidence," he said.

Sometimes it can even lead people to despair of the value of life, he said.

"There are struggles that we cannot sustain alone, without the help of divine grace. When speech can no longer find the right words, we need a loving presence," he said.

Mary's smile offers strength to fight against sickness, but also the grace to accept "without fear or bitterness" the hour of one's death, he said.

The pope, who visited Lourdes as

"I'm in touch with God through Mary, right here in Lourdes."

— Frank Nelson

a cardinal in 1981, also spoke of the attraction of Lourdes' spring water, which many pilgrims bathe in or drink in search of a miraculous cure.

The church has recognized as miracles 67 cures attributed to Mary's intercession at Lourdes, but pilgrims believe many more undocumented miracles also have occurred.

The pope did not talk about miracles, but said the spring water at Lourdes is a sign of a spiritual reality that has helped many pilgrims.

"By immersing themselves in the baths at Lourdes, how many people have discovered and experienced the gentle maternal love of the Virgin Mary, becoming attached to her in order to bind themselves more closely to the Lord," he said.

The pope made a point of thanking the many people who accompany the sick to Lourdes and help care for them during their stay. These volunteers "are the arms of the servant church," and so are the many Catholics around the world who regularly visit the sick, he said.

Before the Mass, the pope continued his "jubilee pilgrimage" in Lourdes, stopping to pray at a hospital chapel where St. Bernadette made her first Communion.

Books on young adult Catholics offer hopeful look at church's future

REVIEWED BY VICKI LOPZE-KALEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

What's the future of the Catholic Church in the U.S.? Are the treasures of Catholic prayer and worship and theology (including Catholic social teaching) put into practice or even understood by most Catholics?

Will misinformation, uninspiring liturgy, discouraged clergy, scandal and division from within lead youths elsewhere? How can we draw and nurture the faith of young adults to lead the church and transform a world in need of the Gospel in word and action?

These questions are addressed to varying degrees in three books of interest to parish ministers and people in the pew.

In "Seeds of Hope: Young Adults and the Catholic Church in the United States," theologian Tim Muldoon asks what kind of church we are inviting our young people to join.

With honesty and a love for the church, he holds great hope that we can address their concerns and build a church that can transform the world.

U.S. Catholics and parish leaders will find many challenges to our comfortable worship, attitudes and lifestyle if we take Muldoon's theological insights and sociological research to heart.

For example, he challenges theologians and others to put aside divisive differences and promote a theology that can transform people's daily lives; he exhorts liturgists to educate people in the pew to use our religious imagination and embody the kingdom of God every Sunday; he addresses the hunger of young adults for education, for spirituality and a personal and social conscience that make sense in today's culture; he challenges us all to accept the discipline of religion as a means to transform our lives and the world.

Ecumenism, moral authority, sexuality and ethnic inclusiveness get his attention as he challenges the church to believe that what Jesus taught is true: We are his presence in the world.

He includes thought-provoking references to the rise of the Third World church, to Hispanic Catholics and to the cultural and religious changes in Africa and Asia. Most of all, Muldoon's overview of Catholic theology and sociological commentary can help us readjust our priorities to build up the body of Christ within the church and in the world.

Chris Cuddy and Peter Ericksen, editors of "I Choose God: Stories from Young Catholics," give us 21 stories written by young adults about their dramatic journeys of faith filled with confusion about faith and morals.

Readers will be saddened by stories of drugs, alcohol, exploitative relationships, abortion, pornography, grief, divorce and the serious temptations that afflict youths in our affluent culture.

By the grace of the Holy Spirit and the presence of well-formed Catholic youths and mentors, these thoughtful writers each find a spiritual home in the Catholic Church.

This short volume is interesting reading to parents of young adults, pastors and young adult ministers, and leaders of the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults in parish or campus ministry settings.

The writers repeatedly give high praise for their experiences with World Youth Day, youth rallies, pastorally gifted Catholic youth ministers and college theology professors.

In "Catholic and Loving It," Sabitha Narendran and Andrew Salzmann describe a hunger for tradition as an issue for young adults.

Narendran and Salzmann present a useful and readable volume for any Catholic who wants to rediscover some of the rich devotions that have been part of Catholic piety for generations.

In one user-friendly volume, they include seasonal prayers and practices, traditions for the home, practices and prayers related to Mary and the saints, and much more. Their book offers a lot to new Catholics, young families, catechists or older Catholics who want to renew in their lives the rhythm of days and seasons.

The authors do not clearly differentiate, however, which practices are most central to Catholic life (such as Advent and Lent, sacramental celebrations and feasts) and which can become shallow and even superstitious if given too much value in daily life (such as indulgences).

With a careful eye for a balanced theology, readers of this book will find practical suggestions for reclaiming many prayerful Catholic traditions. Hopefully, they seek to learn more about our rich spiritual tradition.

In biblical terms, complexities of injustice not so clear-cut

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

One day when I was about 9 years old, I remember being given the responsibility of looking after my baby sister. She had just learned to walk, and I was leading her from one room to another.

I guess I didn't sufficiently account for her underdeveloped coordination: I pulled her too quickly around a corner, and she stumbled and hit her head on the corner of a television console, thus acquiring a large, discolored goose egg on her forehead.

Although caused accidentally, the swelling happened so rapidly and we were all so frightened that in the heat of the moment I was held responsible.

I already felt terrible about my sister's injury; I also felt that my subsequent punishment was more than a little unfair. In my childish, black-and-white way of thinking, I struggled to make sense of it but found myself unable to find any justice in the situation.

Today's readings are about two concepts that often are confused when used in reference to God's interaction with human beings: fairness and justice.

Natural disasters occur, randomly destroying the lives and property of people who don't deserve such loss. The unfairness of it causes some people to helplessly shake their fists at God and place the blame on divine injustice.

Others, not wishing to fault a sovereign God for such calamity, choose the opposite extreme and judge that all human tragedy is somehow directly caused by human failure of some sort.

Still others, seeking middle ground, embrace the doctrine of original sin as an explanation for the world's evil and all its consequences.

When viewed in biblical terms, the problems of evil, fairness and injustice are not so clear-cut. Their complexities continually invite us to wrestle with them.

Yet the kind of justice proper to God is always biblically linked with a divine attribute that transcends our inadequate, human ideas of fairness: God's boundless mercy, culminating in the self-giving of Jesus.

Like the admission of sinners and prostitutes to the kingdom of heaven, God's mercy doesn't always make sense; even so, we are called to imitate and exercise that same mercy in our dealings with one another.

Questions:

Can you recall a time when you were blamed or punished unfairly? How can you demonstrate God's mercy to someone who doesn't "deserve" it?

U.S. movie about military's bomb dismantlers wins Signis film prize

VENICE, Italy (CNS) — A U.S. movie about a military unit that dismantles bombs in Iraq, "The Hurt Locker," won the grand prize at the Venice Film Festival from Signis, the international Catholic organization for film and video.

It was the organization's 60th annual film jury.

The film stars Sam Reford, Jeremy Renner, Guy Pearce, David Morse and Ralph Fiennes, who starred in the 1995 movie "Strange Days," also by Kathryn Bigelow, director of "The Hurt Locker."

The Signis jury, in announcing the awards Sept. 5, called the new film "an uncompromising approach to the Iraq War and its consequences seen through the experience of the bomb diffusion specialists for whom war is an addiction rather than a cause."

"The director, Kathryn Bigelow, challenges the audience's view of war in general and the current war in particular because it demonstrates the struggle between violence to the body and psychological alienation," said the Signis jury.

Bigelow's last feature film was 2002's "K-19: The Widowmaker," about the malfunctioning of the Soviet Union's first nuclear-powered submarine on its maiden voyage and the crew's efforts to avoid a nuclear disaster.

The Signis jury also gave a commendation to another American film, "Vegas: Based on a True Story," a comedy written and directed by Iranian-born filmmaker Amir Naderi.

The jury called this "small-budget picture of a family on the periphery of Las Vegas, struggling with gambling addiction and their marginalized life ... an allegory of futile obsession and greed."

A second commendation was given to Haile Gerima's Ethiopian film "Teza," a movie about the return of an African intellectual to his native country during the repressive Marxist regime of Mengistu Haile Mariam.

The returnee finds his country in turmoil, with a military junta that uses scientists for its own political ends; he is faced with a choice to make a life from the fragments that lay around him or to give in to the violence.

"Teza" is "a reflection in art-cinema style on Ethiopia's recent past and the hopes and challenges for its future," the jury said. "It highlights the conflict between ideology and personal lives."

The president of the seven-member international jury was U.S. Sister Rose Pacatte, a member of the Daughters of St. Paul.

'Fireproof' will warm the heart

BY HARRY FORBES
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK — You fireproof your home; why not your marriage?

Such is the obvious but unobjectionable theme of "Fireproof" (Goldwyn), a modest but heartwarming drama from Sherwood Pictures, the Albany, Ga., church-based studio that made "Flywheel" and "Facing the Giants," all on remarkably small budgets with a largely volunteer cast and crew.

Their latest concerns a small-town fire captain, Caleb Holt (Kirk Cameron, the film's only name performer), whose marriage to Catherine (Erin Bethea), the PR director at the local hospital, is on the rocks.

They've lost patience with one another. Catherine accuses him of spending all his time looking at "trash" (i.e., pornography) on the Internet. He, in turn, complains she no longer shops or cooks for him.

He's saving up for a boat; she'd like to use that money to make improvements on the house. Each feels disrespected.

Under the guidance of his born-again father, John (Harris Malcom), whose own marriage to Caleb's mother, Cheryl (Phyllis Malcom), had once been in trouble, Caleb reluctantly promises his father he'll follow the instructions in a journal called "The Love Dare," which saved the older couple's marriage, in order to rescue his own seven-year union.

Catherine remains obstinately unyielding, and disparages Caleb's sincere proffering of morning coffee, flowers, a candlelight dinner and sickbed duty, thinking he's merely buttering her up for better divorce terms.

She's further reluctant to reconcile, as she's in thrall to the smarmy attentions of Dr. Gavin Keller (Perry Revell) at work.

The film is nicely if simply shot by directors Alex and Stephen Kendrick, though their script is not unlike a TV soap opera. The message that marriage is grounded in the knowledge that God loves us with all our faults — and so should we love our spouse — is incontrovertible, but it's clear the story is merely a vehicle for conveying that message.

The script would also seem to imply that only committed Christians can have successful marriages, whereas from a Catholic perspective, marriage is a natural union as well as a sacramental one among the baptized.

Caleb gets more reinforcement from Michael (Ken Bevel), his best friend at the firehouse, who stands in contrast to the others there: the unenlightened doubter Terrell (Eric Young), who believes we're all "going into the ground," and braggart engine driver Wayne (Stephen Dervan).

Former "Growing Pains" star Cameron is fine, while the mostly nonprofessional supporting cast and production values are surprisingly capable. There are even a couple of fairly ambitious action sequences — a car stuck on the train tracks with an oncoming train, and of course a climactic fire — both competently executed.

Though strongly evangelical, rather than Catholic, in tone — there are no references to the sacramental nature of marriage, and the approach to conversion is shown to be typically instantaneous — the stress on permanence, fidelity, forgiveness and reconciliation (as well as faith in a loving God) resonates well not only with Catholic belief and teaching but also with the pro-marriage campaign of the U.S. bishops.

Details of the campaign can be found online at www.foryourmarriage.org.

Predictable though the film's outcome is, you'll be forgiven for a lump in the throat by the time of the sentimental fade-out.

The film contains domestic discord, extramarital flirtation and pornography references. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG — parental guidance suggested. Some material may not be suitable for children.

theology at St. John's University in Collegeville, Minn.

"There was never an official decree on the books in the canon until (the Council of) Trent in 1546," he said.

That point is significant because the church teaches that the Holy Spirit worked through the hierarchy and the faithful to sort out which books proved vital to the faith of the communities, Father Launderville said in an interview with Catholic News Service.

The books stood the test of time and came to be regarded as fundamental tools in identifying Catholics as a faith community, he said.

"The Bible contains the records of 4,000 years of Judeo-Christian culture," said Franciscan Father Jack Wintz, a well-known Catholic writer, who has served in various editorial roles at the St. Anthony Messenger and Catholic Update.

"Even before writing materials were invented, the many stories included in our Bible were handed down from generation to generation by word of mouth. We call this 'oral tradition,'" he said.

"As time passed, the ancient Israelites began to commit their community's stories to writing," he added.

Varying versions

The earliest written stories were about the deeds of kings and by the 10th century B.C. they were written as lyrics to songs, Father Wintz said.

After the Reformation established the Protestant movement throughout Europe in the 1500s, Protestants of all denominations instituted their own Bible, or collection of writings.

"Basically, the difference between a 'Catholic' and a 'Protestant' Bible is limited to the contents of the Old Testament," said Father Murray Watson, a biblical scholar at St. Peter's Seminary in London, Ontario.

"Catholic Bibles contain seven books which traditional Protestant Bibles do not," he said.

He said those books are "Tobit, Judith, Wisdom, Sirach — also called Ecclesiasticus — Baruch, 1 Maccabees, 2 Maccabees. Catholics use versions of two Old Testament books, Daniel and Esther, which are considerably longer than the version in a standard Protestant Bible," said Father Watson.

"Most Eastern Orthodox churches use a longer one, similar to the Catholic Old Testament, and some of them actually add several other books as well," he said.

These seven books are called "apocryphal," or hidden, by most Protestants, who don't consider them "as inspired," and do not include them in their Bibles, Father Watson said.

However, Catholics do consider these books inspired, and refer to them as "deuterocanonical," or belonging to a "second list of canonical/approved books," since their status was debated longer than most other books, which were on the "first list," he said.

The difference is rooted in the fact that well before the time of Jesus there were two different versions of the Jewish Bible in circulation and used by Jews in different parts of the Mediterranean, Father Watson said.

"One of them seems to have been in Hebrew/Aramaic, and was used almost exclusively in the Holy Land, whereas another version translated into Greek was used by most of the Jews of the Diaspora, the Jewish community outside of the Holy Land, whose daily language of communication was Greek," he said.

"The Greek translation, which was called the Septuagint, had a number of books in it that were not contained in the Hebrew/Aramaic version. However, since the vast majority of Jews at that time lived outside the Holy Land, the version they were most familiar with was the Greek version," he said.

Books of the Bible

Church beliefs and practices under attack by Protestant reformers included purgatory, judgment, devotion to Mary, the intercession of the saints, most of the sacraments, the mandatory celibacy requirement for its clergy, and the authority of the pope.

So, they needed a Bible with Scriptures that would reflect their traditions, Father Watson said.

Over time, the Catholic hierarchy, too, chose Scriptures that best reflected their interpretation of the true word of God.

Though the Catholic Bible began to take shape centuries earlier, the foundation became more concrete during the Council of Rome in 382, when the church decided what it should accept and what it should reject.

This body determined and Pope Damasus I decreed the order of the Old Testament should begin with the book of Genesis, and include Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Joshua (Son of) Nave, Judges, Ruth, Paralipomenon (1 and 2 Chronicles), Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Canticle of Canticles (Song of Songs), Wisdom, and Ecclesiasticus.

The order of the historical books was proclaimed to start with Job, followed by Tobit, two books of Esdras (Ezra and Nehemiah), Esther, Judith and two books of Maccabees.

During the Council of Hippo in 393, it was decided that besides the canonical Scriptures nothing under the name of divine Scripture should be read in church.

Over the years other books were added to the canon and deleted, and in 408 Pope Innocent I issued an opinion that resulted in the Bible used by Catholics today, which also includes five books of Solomon and 16 books from the prophets.

"For Catholics, the Bible and the church are two interrelated expressions of God's communication to God's people, and they depend on each other," Father Watson said.

"Today, these differences are largely being overcome," he continued, "since more and more editions of the Bible are being published in 'ecumenical editions,' which incorporate all the books sacred to Catholic, Protestant and Orthodox Christians, while placing the deuterocanonicals in a separate section between the Old and New Testaments, thus allowing people to choose whether or not they wish to read them."

In addition, almost every major English translation of the Bible today is produced by an interdenominational team of scholars, which includes Catholic, Protestant, Orthodox and, in most cases, Jewish members as well, he said.

"In terms of 'Catholic' Bibles today, almost any mainstream Bible translation is appropriate for Catholics to read and study, provided, of course, it includes the deuterocanonical books," Father Watson said.

"Among the more popular Bible versions for Catholics would be the New American Bible, the New Jerusalem Bible and the New Revised Standard Bible," he said.

"Many Catholics also read the Good News Bible, which is published by the United Bible Societies, and today has a Catholic version available," he added.

Justice flows like a river

Social justice, charity must be considered by Catholics

Call me "Secondhand Rose" if you must, but nothing pleases me more than finding a used item at a great price. It stretches the budget, it's environmentally healthy and, if you don't get carried away, it's great sport.

I should get one of those "I brake for garage sales" bumper stickers. Lead me into a nice secondhand store when I have time to browse and I'm a happy woman.

So it was the other day when I came home with a linen blouse from a used clothing store. It was an excellent brand, one that carries a respectable price tag when new.

It was in like-new condition, a soft-apricot color and a perfect fit. And it was five bucks! What more could this bargain hunter want?

As I carried my "find" into the house, I stopped to get the mail, and once inside the kitchen, I sifted through it, glancing at the latest issue of Sacred Ground, the newsletter from the Christian Foundation for Children and Aging.

My family has sponsored a boy in Venezuela, Jose Gustavo, through this organization for a few years, ever since a priest spoke at our parish and signed people up.

I noticed the story of a young father in the Philippines who supports his family by operating a tricycle taxi, a little motorized vehicle jerry-rigged with a side car to haul one or two people.

The man, a handsome guy in jeans and a bright T-shirt, stood proudly by his taxi, looking like any guy you'd see cheering on his kids at the soccer field.

The story said a Filipino expression applies to a day laborer like him: "Work one, eat one." It means that the man, who of course doesn't belong to a union or get any paid days off, must work one day to provide just the amount of money needed to sustain his family the next.

And what does this taxi driver earn to make ends meet? After he pays for his fuel, the price of which has been rising in the Philippines just like everywhere else, he makes $5 daily for his family's needs.

Five bucks. I looked down at my linen shirt lying on the cabinet right next to the story. Suddenly it was a luxury item, this man's daily bread, purchased on a whim.

Throughout the past century, the Catholic Church in myriads of official documents has come to cast its vision on justice in a world where some people have so much less than others.

Pope Leo XIII got the ball rolling when he wrote "Rerum Novarum" in 1891. In it he talked about working conditions and laborers' rights. "Rerum Novarum" introduced new conversation into the church's discussion.

Previously, charity had been our response to the poor of the world — giving alms to the poor, aiding those in need.

Certainly charity remains a good and necessary thing. But for more than 100 years, the church, through encyclicals, the writings of the Second Vatican Council and other writings, has educated us to look at institutional reasons for poverty, what Pope John Paul II called "the structures of sin" in "Sollicitudo Rei Socialis."

But how educated are we? Many have called Catholic social justice teaching "our best kept secret." We don't talk about it much. Charity is rarely controversial, but trying to figure out the hard truth of justice can be a minefield.

In this election year, Americans need to look at their country and the world and ask how they can meet the challenge the church has given us to find "a preferential option for the poor."

Catechetical Sunday

World needs intentional Catholics committed to Christ

Ascending the stairs to the friars' rooms in the monastery of St. Mark in Florence, Italy, the visitor is struck by the vision of the world famous fresco of the Annunciation at the top of the stairs. There on the wall is the often-seen, world-famous depiction of Blessed Fra Angelico, the Dominican friar and artist. For more than 500 years that painting has been catechizing everyone who reached the top of those stairs. The subdued paints with the soft hues indicate the delicacy of the moment of the Incarnation, the moment of God taking on our flesh, the moment God "dwelt among us" (pitched his tent), as St. John relates.

Our Lady has her head bowed in humility to God, her arms crossed as if to cradle the infant in her womb. The Archangel Gabriel's head is inclined in respect to both Our Lady and the infant Son. At that moment, the nascent church, the Mystical Body of Christ, is likewise present and deserving of respect.

The visitor is at once catechized with the Word of God. This is the theme for this Catechetical Sunday, Sept. 21: "The Word of God in the life and mission of the church."

Msgr. Frances Kelley defines catechesis as "the transmission of God's Word to invite people to personal faith." Seeing the fresco of the Annunciation, one is given the message of the Incarnation, the intellect is drawn into thinking about the historical event and the will must either chose to believe the truth presented in the fresco, reject that truth or simply ignore the truth.

But catechesis has nonetheless happened; the content of the Catholic faith has been transmitted and one is invited to personal faith. Every catechetical moment does the same thing.

Catechetical Sunday is a day to emphasize the essential evangelizing mission of the Catholic Church: "to hand on what has been handed on" to us, to paraphrase St. Paul.

The church teaches that parents are the first educators of their children under the direction of their pastors. This education entails the entire spectrum of all fields of discipline and activities, including religious education, as they are all related and lead to a proper understanding of the truth of God himself.

On Catechetical Sunday, the church desires to emphasize the importance of the stewardship of God's Word by all who are "catechists" — and every member of the Mystical Body is a catechist.

Today, however, the church especially accents those who are giving their time and talents to teach religion in special programs and classes in all our educational institutions, programs and settings. All of this is done in support of the parents, who are the primary educators of the children, under the direction of their pastors.

Why does the church spend so

much effort in catechesis? Why do we have Catholic schools, faith formation programs, home schools, campus ministries, adult education in its many forms, youth ministry and our other avenues of catechesis?

The reason is this: "... the definitive aim of catechesis is to put people not only in touch but in communion, in intimacy, with Jesus Christ: only He can lead us to the love of the Father in the Spirit and make us share in the life of the Holy Trinity" (Pope John Paul II, CT, 5).

Catechesis is about making saints. It is about helping our students come into an "intimacy" with Jesus; not just knowing about him, but knowing him; not just loving him distantly, but being in love with him. Catechesis has one purpose then: to offer the way to eternal life.

To be effective in our care for catechesis, each of us in the church must pledge to live the spiritual life. Our devout participation in Sunday and holy day Mass, our frequent confessions, daily prayers and spiritual readings are essential to the project of our Catholic schools.

We will only be as effective as is our commitment to our spiritual life.

The outcome of our catechetical programs is evident and therefore measurable. We can ask: Are our students convinced of the truths of the Catholic Church (which is the bearer of the Gospel), and do they practice their faith in their parish and diocese? Are they intentional Catholics?

The world needs intentional, informed, zealous Catholics — men and women committed to Christ and his message of truth about humanity and the world.

Many intentional Catholics are coming forth from our catechetical programs. They have a Catholic worldview and know the principles of making good decisions, which will make good memories and help them achieve citizenship in heaven. These are decisions based on the truth about God and the dignity of man from conception to natural death.

Our thanks go to all those catechists who assist us to remember and believe the person of the Annunciation — the Word of God in the life and mission of the church. Catechesis humbles us as Mary and the Archangel Gabriel were humbled at those words: "And the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us! God 'pitched his tent' and lives among us. He invites us to prepare to 'pitch our tent' and live with him in eternal life."

Father Arnsperger is vicar for education in the Diocese of Charlotte and pastor of St. Michael the Archangel Church in Gastonia.

Labor of love

Seeing work as a journey of discovery that makes us fully alive

When we think of the people that are most alive, it is those who love their work. I think of the woman who cuts my hair, a woman named Carmen from Puerto Rico who has a small unisex shop in my neighborhood.

She recently returned from a vacation cruise and said she could hardly wait to get back to work. She literally dances around you as she does her job.

I think also of Maryknoll missionary priest Robert McCahill, who has worked for decades in Bangladesh.

What a joy it is to hear him talk about the life he shares with the poor, even living in a thatched roof hut as they do, and peddling a bicycle through the poorest neighborhoods seeking out the sick, sometimes even carrying them to a clinic or hospital.

I think too of craftsmen whose works proclaim their industry, love and dedication decades and even centuries after they passed from this life.

Genesis tells us that after God created the earth and all its elements and life forms he "looked at everything he had made, and he found it very good" (1:31).

It is common, however, to see work as God's punishment for the disobedience of Adam and Eve. And certainly the Scriptures provide justification in God's words to Adam:

"Cursed be the ground because of you! In toil shall you eat its yield all the days of your life. ... By the sweat of your face shall you get bread to eat, until you return to the ground" (Gn 3:17, 19).

But our first parents already had a job before they sinned; it was not as if God had consigned them to a life of idleness. He had given them the Garden of Eden and entrusted them "to cultivate and care for it" (Gn 2:15).

Their failure was similar to many of ours today. Failing to see the challenge, do our homework, work hard enough, persevere. Instead of patiently working to discover the infinite marvels of God's creation, they thought they could gain wisdom the easy way: by eating the forbidden fruit.

What they did is analogous to today's get-rich-quick schemes, and all the self-illusion that short-circuits the sweat and tears.

Yet the Garden of Eden did not disappear with the disobedience of Adam and Eve. It is with us still, the entire universe in which we live, containing all the wonders that humankind has discovered and has yet to discover — in mathematics, medicine, science, philosophy, psychology, theology, social science and much more.

There are no limits to what we can learn. To be alive, then, is to see work not as cruel fate but as a journey of discovery.

That perspective may be hard to sell to a factory worker who endures the monotony of an assembly line or the laborer who wields a pick and shovel.

Yet even they can rejoice in the shelter, food and education their labors provide for their families. And if our workday does not yield satisfaction, perhaps we can find it in work we do in our off hours, in our homes or our communities.

I often see joy in the enthusiasm of immigrants cutting lawns or shoveling snow.

Implicit in the words "Inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world" (Mt 25:34) is the judgment: "Your work was good."

Cross shows true love does not exist without suffering, pope says

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — God's love poured out on humanity through the cross of Jesus offers healing and salvation to all people, Pope Benedict XVI said.

At his Sept. 17 weekly general audience, the pope reflected on his Sept. 12-15 trip to France, which he said had brought him many blessings.

"In Lourdes, at the school of Mary, the first and perfect disciple of the crucified one, pilgrims learn to consider the crosses of their lives in the light of the glorious cross of Christ," he said.

"The cross reminds us that true love does not exist without suffering; there is no gift of life without pain," he said. "Many learn that truth in Lourdes, which is a school of faith and hope because it also is a school of charity and of service to one's brothers and sisters."

Our encounter today gives me the opportunity to retrace the steps of my recent pastoral visit to France. After a warm welcome in Paris, I met with men and women from the world of culture, with whom I reflected on the monastic ideal of seeking God — quaerere Deum — as the bedrock of European culture.

I wished to emphasize that meditation on the Scriptures opens our minds and hearts to the Logos, God's creative reason in the flesh.

In the magnificent Cathedral of Notre Dame, I gathered with bishops, priests, religious and seminarians, sharing with them the treasures of the Holy Spirit and the cross. My brief stop at the Institute de France was followed by the joyful Eucharistic celebration on the Esplanade des Invalides.

I then made my way to Lourdes to join thousands of pilgrims in this jubilee year commemorating the apparitions of Our Lady to St. Bernadette.

The holy Mass near the grotto of Massabielle providentially coincided with the feast of the Exaltation of the Cross, the perennial sign of the "mystery of death and of glory."

The cross demonstrates that God so loved the world that he gave us his only Son. It teaches us that there is no genuine love without suffering, and no gift of life without pain.

Lourdes is thus a school of faith and hope because it is a school of charity and service. I am deeply grateful to God and to all who made this trip a blessed, memorable success. Thank you.

Abortion and common ground

Ways abound to reduce prevalence of abortion

Following the national conventions, the question has been raised anew whether there is any common ground to be found on the ever divisive topic of abortion. How we pursue agreement may make all the difference.

Recent events suggest that contesting what modern genetics cannot deny — namely, that life begins at conception — is a non-starter, but closer attention to those arguing for improvement in the social and economic circumstances of families, especially families with little or modest wealth, may pay a handsome dividend in the strengthening of a culture of life.

Of course, no Catholic should try to find common ground on unstable terrain. Church teaching is clear: Abortion is intrinsically wrong and no amount of linguistic parsing provides escape.

The lack of maneuverability here is aptly illustrated by a recent public conversation between House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and the bishops over medievalist theology.

On a recent "Meet the Press" appearance, Pelosi noted that some Fathers of the Church differed on when life begins.

Not so, said Cardinal Justin Rigali of Philadelphia and Bishop William Lori of Bridgeport, Conn., chairmen of the U.S. bishops' pro-life and doctrine committees, respectively.

While in church history several notable theologians disagreed over when ensoulment occurred, when life begins and ensoulment are different, procured abortion has never been acceptable to the Catholic Church.

The bishops' correction was fairly given. What was most unfortunate was some conservative partisans and media taking unnecessary glee in the correction — feeding yet again what divides us rather than that which brings us together.

More helpful was the circulation of new compilations of data illustrating often overlooked facts about the incidence of abortion. Hugh Skees of Miamisburg, Ohio, has culled from the public records of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention that from 1979 to 1990 the annual rate of abortion increased by 14.2 percent.

"If the rate had not increased during those 11 years, approximately 740,000 abortions would have been prevented," Skees said. "From 1990 to 2000, the annual rate decreased by 34 percent. If the rate had not decreased as it did, approximately 2.3 million more children would have been aborted, but instead are alive today."

What was so favorable in the 1990s that abortion rates dropped? Skees speculates that it was the relatively prosperous economic times and policies that favored the average family.

Skees may be on to something. Catholics in the Alliance for the Common Good, under director Alexia Kelley, produced an even finer grain study finding that the abortion rate among women living below the poverty level is more than four times that of women above 300 percent of the poverty level.

This study of all U.S. states from 1982 to 2000 finds that social and economic supports such as public assistance to low-income families and other maternity and prenatal benefits have contributed significantly to reducing the number of abortions in the United States over the past 20 years.

At a minimum the findings suggest that while the Supreme Court may have blocked one means of dealing with the scourge of abortion — that of legal prohibition — there is no reason why we can't make an effort to reduce its prevalence.

Perhaps the sign of common ground is agreeing that there is, in fact, more than one way to be pro-life. As Dorothy Day of the Catholic Worker Movement so well taught, one need not wait for an institution to do good, since we ourselves can start today.

The thousands of Catholic volunteers in crisis pregnancy centers know this full well.

CHARLOTTE — A priest of the Diocese of Charlotte returned recently from a two-week trip to the jungles of Peru.

Father Mark Lawlor, pastor of St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte, visited Aug. 25-Sept. 11 the small-town church with which his parish has established an outreach program.

"While their ministry is in many ways different from the ministry here in a city parish in Charlotte, there is a bond that we all share by virtue of our baptism and faith," said Father Lawlor.

It was two years ago that Father Lawlor and parishioner Luis Lecaros visited and established a relationship with St. Martin de Porres Church in Aguaytia, in the Apostolic Vicariate of Pucallapa.

"An apostolic vicariate is a

LINVILLE — Many would agree the mountain scenery around Linville is awe-inspiring. Now Catholics in Linville have a refurbished church to inspire awe in the Lord.

"In this church, our relationship with Christ will be deepened and nourished," said Father Christopher Gober, pastor of St. Bernadette Mission in Linville, during the church's rededication Mass.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis celebrated the Mass Sept. 19, with former pastors and other diocesan priests concelebrating.

The event was the culmination of more than a year's worth of work to expand and refurbish the church, a growing mission of St. Lucien Church in Spruce Pine.

"St. Bernadette is unique in that it serves a largely seasonal population from beginning of summer to fall," said Father Gober.

The additional Mass that was scheduled to accommodate the influx of visitors did not alleviate the growth.

"This was the most pressing reason for the expansion. We had to develop for the immediate need but for the future as well," said Father Gober.

CHARLOTTE — Busy doesn't even begin to describe the amount of activity that took place at St. Matthew Church in Charlotte Sept. 19-21.

The weekend was packed full of celebration marking the 22nd anniversary of the church. At the center of it all was a spirit of service, a theme that runs deep through the parish and its 104 ministries.

"It was truly a community celebration of a parish trying to be connected to Christ, by being his hands and feet in this day and age," said Msgr. John McSweeney, pastor.

Adding to the celebration was the feast day of St. Matthew, which was particularly fitting, and Catechetical Sunday whereby 600 catechists received a special blessing at Volunteers assist in unloading a truck full of water and MREs ("meals ready to eat") at St. Christopher Church in Houston Sept. 20. The food and water distribution was organized by the local Catholic Charities agency. More than 40 staff and volunteers distributed the much needed items to hundreds in the area, most of whom were left without electricity after Hurricane Ike swept through the area Sept. 13.

Catholic social agencies mobilize in Hurricane Ike relief efforts

HOUSTON (CNS) — In the aftermath of Hurricane Ike, Texas Catholic social agencies have swiftly mobilized to offer assistance to those affected by the storm, which hit the region Sept. 13.

In mid-September, staff members and volunteers from Catholic Charities visited coastal communities such as Texas City, Dickinson and Bacliff, as well as Houston, to provide assistance to those in need. They were continuing those efforts in the coastal area.

"Our goal is to take care of the immediate, basic needs by supplying water, canned goods, diapers, those kinds of items," said Yolanda Gutierrez, on-site supervisor for Catholic Charities of the Archdiocese of Galveston-Houston.

By coordinating relief efforts, Catholic Charities USA has opened a warehouse specifically for the purpose of delivery of goods to distribution sites.

"We are focusing on Galveston County, and the needs of far-reaching communities who have limited access to government sponsored PODs (point of distribution)," said Jim Gajewski, Catholic Charities vice president of program services.

"We see our niche reaching out deeper into communities, the pockets of disenfranchised who are impoverished and don't have the means to get to these PODs," he said.

Catholic Charities planned to continue its efforts in the field into the foreseeable future, as long as supplies lasted and the needs remained.

"We are taking it day to day; we really have to be flexible and keep our ear to the ground," Gajewski said. "As long as the need is out there, we want to be providing for those needs."

Catholic Charities was out at St. Christopher Church in Houston Sept. 20, distributing water and MREs, which stands for "meals ready to eat."

James Rodriguez and his family waited in line for his allocation.

"It's tough right now. We don't have electricity so we can't cook anything," said Rodriguez, who is a house painter.

While he expects to be busy soon, he had been unable to work following the storm as potential clients waited for insurance companies to assess damage.

"You never want to complain as long as you're eating," Rodriguez said. "I appreciate Catholic Charities for feeding us tonight."

The Society of St. Vincent de Paul suffered damage to all of its program locations, but officials were trying to maximize their resources to help others through their "Arms Wide Open" project.

"We have about 2,000 elderly clients in our program, so our mission right now is to go door-to-door of homes to visit and make sure everyone is OK," said Wendy Garaghty, the society's executive director. "We will bring them all of the essentials, as well. We also have some formula, because we have a lot of clients with newborns."

Local organizations were relying on St. Vincent de Paul councils across the nation and state — including Austin, San Antonio and Dallas — who have been trucking food into the Galveston-Houston area.

Garaghty said she is always inspired to see so many people working together to assist others through a time of trial and devastation.

"To be able to go in and bring health and comfort to people in need ... we always walk away better people having met these individuals we serve," she said. "Our spirituality grows as well as the persons we are visiting. We don't preach the Gospel, but we certainly see God everywhere we go."

Cardinal urges Congress to reject proposed Freedom of Choice Act

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Declaring that "we can't reduce abortions by promoting abortion," the chairman of the U.S. bishops' Committee on Pro-Life Activities has urged members of Congress to reject the proposed Freedom of Choice Act.

In a Sept. 19 letter, Cardinal Justin Rigali of Philadelphia said the legislation "would counteract any and all sincere efforts by government to reduce abortions in our country," force all Americans to subsidize abortion with their tax dollars and overturn "modest restraints and regulations on the abortion industry" in all 50 states.

"No one who sponsors or supports legislation like FOCA can credibly claim to be part of a good-faith discussion on how to reduce abortions," he added.

The Freedom of Choice Act was introduced in both the House and Senate April 19, 2007, the day after the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act in Gonzales v. Carhart.

It states that "every woman has the fundamental right to choose to bear a child, to terminate a pregnancy prior to fetal viability, or to terminate a pregnancy after fetal viability when necessary to protect the life or health of the woman."

Although no action has been taken in either house since then, the U.S. bishops "are gravely concerned about any possible consideration" of the legislation in the final weeks of the 110th Congress, Cardinal Rigali said.

"Pro-abortion groups and some of the bill's congressional sponsors have said they want this legislation enacted soon," he added.

Cardinal Rigali said that recently "the national debate on abortion has taken a turn that may be productive" as members of both political parties "have sought to reach a consensus on ways to reduce abortions in our society."

FROM THE VATICAN

Vatican official urges government to protect religious minorities

GENEVA (CNS) — Governments must find ways to promote religious tolerance and avoid blasphemy laws that can backfire by targeting religious minorities, said a Vatican official.

The Vatican's representative to U.N. agencies in Geneva, Archbishop Silvano Tomasi, said in some countries, religious defamation laws "have been used as weapons against personal enemies or as an excuse to incite mob violence."

"Such actions result in polarizing religious communities rather than in promoting intolerance," he said Sept. 19 at a U.N. Human Rights Council session focusing on racism, racial discrimination, xenophobia and intolerance.

Archbishop Tomasi noted that an "intensified expression of religious intolerance" has flared in recent weeks in several parts of the world.

Without specifically citing the recent violence and persecution against Christians in India, Pakistan and Iraq, the archbishop discussed incidents of religiously motivated attacks and killings, the desecration of places of worship and the threats and fears forcing thousands of people to flee their homes.

"Impunity for these crimes, as is often the case, gives the message that violent aggression against, and even the physical elimination of, people from a different faith conviction is acceptable," said Archbishop Tomasi.

He said governments should work to promote tolerance through concrete juridical norms, ending discrimination on the state and social level. He also said they should promote better protection of individuals from group violence and should adopt "the practice of reasonable accommodation of religious practice."

Schools, the media and faith communities also play a vital role in fostering mutual understanding and constructive coexistence, he said.

Church, 2205 W. Market St., Oct. 1 6:30 - 9 p.m. The theme of the reflection will be the four objectives of the Catholic family. The event is free and open to all Catholic men. Pizza and refreshments will be served at 6:30 p.m. in the cafeteria followed by a talk 7 to 9 p.m. in the church. For more information, contact John Endredy at (336) 449-3656.

GREENSBORO — The parish health ministry and flames of fire prayer group will sponsor a Charismatic Healing Mass at Our Lady of Grace Church, 2205 West Market St., Oct. 18, 1-3 p.m. The celebrant for the Mass will be Father Fidel Melo. Music will be provided by Freeway. Richard Collins, parishioner of Our Lady of Grace Church, will be speaking about the Holy Spirit in our daily lives. Healing teams will be available for personal ministry after the Mass. For more information, contact Ben D'Apollito at (336) 812-3730.

WINSTON-SALEM VICARIATE

CLEMMONS — Justin Catanoso, author of My Cousin the Saint, A Search for Faith, Family and Miracles will be at Holy Family Church, 4820 Kinnamon Rd., to share his spiritual journey and sign his book Oct. 4, 3-4:30 p.m. This event is sponsored by the Holy Family Church Evangelization Commission and Holy Family Church Seniors. For more information, contact Larry Chance at (336) 403-3689 or lchance@bellsouth.net.

Is your parish or school sponsoring a free event open to the general public? Deadline for all submissions for the Diocesan Planner is 10 days prior to desired publication date. Submit in writing to kmmoore@charlottediocese.org or fax to (704) 370-3382.

Vatican newspaper says crisis shows failure of 'new economy'

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The current financial crisis pummeling the United States and beyond is a sign that the so-called "new economy" and its risky investments have failed, the Vatican newspaper said.

The booming growth of financial markets did not correspond to real growth or concrete development for society because it created an artificially robust gross national product, said a Sept. 24 article in L'Osservatore Romano.

The only real growth registered in this crisis has been "the commissions, profits of the banks and bonuses for the managers," it said.

The article, with the headline "A costly illusion," was written by Ettore Gotti Tedeschi, an Italian economist and professor of financial ethics at the Catholic University of the Sacred Heart in Milan, Italy.

The U.S. financial meltdown has been blamed on "the greed of managers and lack of regulations. But curiously, no one ever refers to the indirect responsibility of the government's economic policy" which, he wrote, tried to cover the lack of any real economic development with a booming Wall Street.

He said the U.S. government's proposed bailout may stave off any worst-case scenario for its troubled financial markets, but it will not repair the root causes of the crisis.

"Despite various attempts, the Western world does not know how to map out a model of development that is capable of guaranteeing stable wealth," the article said.

The West has "not succeeded with its new economy project, it did not succeed with accelerating growth in Asia by transferring low-cost production (there), and it did not succeed after inventing a boom in the GNP through risky financial models that were poorly conceived and badly regulated," it said.

"In order to maintain this sham GNP, the banks financed things that were not guaranteed" and that should not have been financed, like the subprime loans, it said. Financial institutions created an "economic growth out of debt and, therefore, (created something) very risky," it added.

The article said the lesson to be learned is that nations cannot build a healthy economy or experience real development if it is not based on "balanced demographic growth."

It said the world economy also needs to be run responsibly and transparently with precise rules.

Priest, atheist debate God and science

NEW YORK (CNS) — A conversation between the Catholic theologian Msgr. Lorenzo Albacete and the outspoken atheist Christopher Hitchens was billed as an inquiry into the question "Does science make belief in God obsolete?"

In reality, the Sept. 23 post-luncheon tussle at a New York hotel was more entertaining than enlightening, but the 325 observers didn't seem disappointed that there was no resolution to the question.

Msgr. Albacete, a former physicist, is national director of the Catholic lay group Communion and Liberation. Hitchens is a critic and author of many books, including "God Is Not Great: How Religion Poisons Everything." The event was one in a series of "Big Questions" conversations sponsored by the John Templeton Foundation.

Msgr. Albacete said he had defended his faith in scientific circles throughout his career and was able to affirm his faith every day, in part because it is the source of honesty, he said. When Hitchens dismissed religion as unscientific and unprovable, Msgr. Albacete quickly drew a distinction between religion and faith. He said religion is an attitude toward life and is of human origin.

each of the weekend Masses.

Festivities began on Friday evening with a Respect Life spaghetti dinner and the showing of the movie "Bella."

"On Saturday we dedicated our sixth habitat house," said Msgr. McSweeney.

Funded by the teenagers of the parish, the home was completed in 14 weeks with the help of more than 200 participants clocking approximately 2,200 hours of volunteer time.

In keeping with their ongoing effort to alleviate homelessness in Charlotte, in June Msgr. McSweeney challenged his parishioners to a special project. They were asked to save a penny per day, per family member, to be collected on the anniversary weekend.

At the weekend Masses Sept. 20-21, parishioners brought their pennies to the altar, which was particularly significant according to Msgr. McSweeney because the altar itself "was given by the people in 1996 by collecting coins."

This time, the fruits of the collection will be focused on the community. The money will be distributed to different organizations serving the homeless in the Charlotte area, especially those serving single mothers and children.

A ministry fair, showcasing the 104 ministries of the parish was held in the Parish Center gym following the weekend Masses.

To top everything off, St. Matthew Church was recognized with the national "Outstanding Parish" award by the Migration and Refugee Services of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops and the Catholic Legal Immigration Network, Inc.

The award is given to a parish that has answered the call to "welcome the stranger" through its ministry to assist in the resettlement of newly arriving immigrants and refugees.

The award was presented by Mary Jane Bruton, community relations coordinator for Catholic Social Services' Refugee Resettlement Office in the Diocese of Charlotte, who nominated the parish for the award.

Accepting the award on behalf of the parish was Bill LaMay, coordinator of the parish refugee ministry.

"St. Matthew Church has been a consistent standout in the measure of commitment and support, whether monetary or volunteer, for the refugee office for many years," said Bruton.

"Msgr. McSweeney has a phrase that he uses, 'attitude of gratitude,' and I think it runs as a common thread through everything they do," she said. "They give back in so many ways."

Father Mark Lawlor, pastor of St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte, baptizes a child in the chapel in Nueva Esperanza (New Hope) during his trip to Peru Aug. 25-Sept. 11.

mission territory that has not yet reached the stability to be named a diocese," said Father Lawlor. A mission territory was "the status of North Carolina prior to the establishment of the Diocese of Raleigh."

Peru is a nation of some 25 million people, 90 percent of whom are baptized Catholics. A significant percentage of adults earn about $2 per day.

The apostolic vicariate is a vast area served by 21 priests, 35 women religious and a number of lay leaders and catechists.

"There are approximately 400,000 Catholics in about 500 communities," said Father Lawlor. "Each parish has the pastoral charge of numerous chapels. Other communities meet in homes or public places."

While some parishes and communities have a weekly Mass, others have Masses that are celebrated monthly, quarterly or even annually.

"In the absence of a priest to celebrate Mass, there may be a Communion service with the Liturgy of the Word or perhaps just the Lectionary readings and hymns," said Father Lawlor.

Members of the Daughters of Our Lady of Mercy provide most of the pastoral care to Catholics in Aguaytia. Although the apostolic vicariate was helping them to build a convent and pastoral center beside St. Martin de Porres Church in Aguaytia, the sisters still needed help acquiring supplies and catechetical materials.

So in 2006, St. Vincent de Paul Church began raising funds to assist the sisters and their outreach.

A year later, in October 2007, two priests serving in the apostolic vicariate visited St. Vincent de Paul Church to give an update on their pastoral challenges and needs.

From a special collection taken up at St. Vincent de Paul Church, funds were donated that were divided between construction of a new chapel in Neshua, a small town experiencing a population increase; programs for children and the poor; catechetical and liturgical materials; and furnishings for their pastoral centers.

During his recent visit, Father Lawlor visited the site of the new chapel.

"We are all aware that there are many needs and many worthy projects. I am pleased that we are able to do a small part to help with the mission of evangelization in another part of the world," said Father Lawlor.

Father Lawlor visited three other communities and baptized 10 children in a small rural chapel with an earthen floor. One of the trip's highlights, he said, was visiting a small mission in Tournavista on the Pachitea River.

"It was like going to the end of the earth," said Father Lawlor.

There, four sisters visit 52 communities scattered along the river via small motorized canoes. It may take them two-to-three days to reach some of the more distant communities.

The sisters live with four postulants in "what looked to be an old farmhouse," said Father Lawlor.

"They do not have running water or a phone," he said. "As they only have electricity for two-and-a-half hours per day, they have no refrigeration. They use a small gas burner for cooking."

The sisters and postulants haul water from a community well for cooking and washing, and all share a rustic outhouse.

Father Lawlor said his heart was moved by their humble quarters and their Christian joy.

Upon his return, Father Lawlor consulted with his parish pastoral council about having another special collection this fall to raise funds to help build a well for the sisters in Tournavista.

"The trip to Peru energized me in my ministry here in Charlotte. I hope to return there again in the future," said Father Lawlor.

"I promised to buy a mission bell for the chapel in Tournavista and I promised that I would return again to ring it," he said.

Standing for life

Life Chains to be held around Diocese of Charlotte

BY KATIE MOORE
STAFF WRITER

GREENSBORO — Catholics in the Diocese of Charlotte will soon line the streets of their cities and towns to show their support for the sanctity of human life.

The U.S. Catholic Church observes October as Respect Life Month, with Respect Life Sunday falling on Oct. 5.

To help kick off the month and show their support for life, hundreds of parishes in dioceses around the country will be participating in Life Chains.

In the Diocese of Charlotte, parishioners will be standing along the property lines of their respective churches, on city sidewalks and with other church groups in their towns.

People will hold pro-life signs with messages such as "Abortion Kills Children" and "Jesus Forgives and Heals."

"It's a prayerful witness," said David Foppe, organizer of the Greensboro Life Chain. "We're holding our signs in public but we're also praying while we do it."

"We don't get to see all the fruits of our prayers," said Foppe, "but lives are definitely saved and mothers who have received abortions receive healing."

This year, Foppe is expecting about 1,000 people from 35 area churches to participate in the Greensboro Life Chain.

The U.S. bishops inaugurated the Respect Life program with a resolution they adopted in the spring of 1972.

The first of what the resolution called a "week of prayer and study dedicated to the sanctity of human life and the many threats to human life in our world" was held that October.

EUCCHARISTIC CONGRESS

FOURTH DIOCESAN EUCCHARISTIC CONGRESS

OCT. 3-4, 2008

CHARLOTTE CONVENTION CENTER

It Is Christ Whom We Proclaim

Dear Brothers and Sisters in Christ,

I invite you to participate in our Eucharistic Congress on Friday, Oct. 3, and Saturday, Oct. 4, at the Charlotte Convention Center.

During this past year, the Eucharistic Congress committee has devoted many hours of selfless labor to prepare for this joyful event, and I am grateful for the service they have given to the Lord and to the Church.

At the Eucharistic Congress we see the entire Diocese of Charlotte present. Parishioners from parishes, schools, lay movements and associations from across the diocese let us know they are participating by the banners they reverently carry in the eucharistic procession on Saturday morning and in the procession before Mass on Saturday afternoon.

In the great eucharistic moments that occur during the congress — namely, the eucharistic procession through the streets of Charlotte, the holy hour of adoration and the Sacrifice of the Mass — we see how marvelously the Eucharist brings us together as one. We, though many, are one body, for we all partake of the one Eucharistic Lord. The Eucharist strengthens our unity as a diocesan family, and makes us grow in faith and charity.

After the consecration of the Eucharist at every Mass, the priest issues an invitation to the congregation: "Let us proclaim the Mystery of Faith." We are invited at that moment to proclaim Christ and his paschal mystery, for he has indeed become really and substantially present under the appearances of bread and wine. To proclaim Christ is the great privilege and mission of every Christian. The theme of this year's Eucharistic Congress — "It Is Christ Whom We Proclaim" — reminds us of our mission to proclaim Christ in our daily lives.

This year's congress begins Friday evening with a welcome from Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin of Charlotte, followed by a concert of sacred music. We are honored to have His Eminence John Patrick Cardinal Foley as the keynote speaker this year. Cardinal Foley is grand master of the Equestrian Order of the Holy Sepulchre of Jerusalem, and president emeritus of the Pontifical Council for Social Communications.

On Saturday, we start the day with a eucharistic procession through uptown Charlotte. The procession goes from St. Peter Church to the convention center. Archbishop Emeritus John F. Donoghue of Atlanta will deliver the homily during the holy hour that follows. We will then hear from an array of very inspiring speakers. Children, teens, adults and Hispanics have separate programs with messages specifically directed to them. Eucharistic adoration and the sacrament of confession are available during the day.

The day culminates with everyone participating in the celebration of the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass in the convention center. My brother priests will join me in the concelebration of the Eucharist. This Mass will fulfill your Sunday Mass obligation.

On the following pages you will find more detailed information, as well as a map of the eucharistic procession route. Other information is available at the Web site www.goEucharist.com.

The Eucharistic Congress is a beautiful opportunity for the faithful of the diocese to come together in faith and charity each year to proclaim Christ Our Savior. I look forward to seeing you at this event, which is a great blessing for our diocese.

Sincerely yours in Christ,

+ Peter J. Jugis

Most Reverend Peter J. Jugis
Bishop of Charlotte

Watching and participating in the eucharistic procession

THE ROUTE

The eucharistic procession, led by Bishop Peter J. Jugis, will begin at 9 a.m. on Saturday, Oct. 4, at St. Peter Church, South Tryon Street and First Street. (First communicants with parent or guardian, clergy, religious and banner carriers should gather on Tryon Street south of St. Peter Church at 8:30 a.m.)

The procession will head north on Tryon Street for two blocks, then turn east onto Martin Luther King Boulevard for two blocks. The procession will then turn south onto Brevard Street to the Charlotte Convention Center.

People of the Diocese of Charlotte are encouraged to line the procession route.

TO PARTICIPATE

As the Blessed Sacrament comes near, it is the custom to be silent and kneel until the monstrance passes.

After the Blessed Sacrament passes by, look for your parish's banner. When your parish banner passes by, you may fall in along with your parish to join in the procession. Once you have connected with your parish group, simply join in the communal prayers or just pray silently as the procession moves along.

When the procession arrives at the Charlotte Convention Center, move as directed by the ushers to enter the main hall. Proceed to the seating area, joining in the singing until the beginning of the holy hour.

Frequently asked questions about the Eucharistic Congress

What is the Eucharistic Congress?

The Eucharistic Congress is a teaching and worship event that is centered on the Eucharist, the source and summit of Catholic life.

What is the schedule of events?

The Congress begins Friday evening, Oct. 3, with a greeting from Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin, a concert of sacred choral music and a talk by Cardinal John P. Foley, grand master of the Equestrian Order of the Holy Sepulchre of Jerusalem.

Afterward, the Eucharist will be available for adoration throughout the night at St. Peter Church, 501 S. Tryon St.

Events on Saturday, Oct. 4, begin at 9 a.m., with the eucharistic procession from St. Peter Church through downtown Charlotte to the Charlotte Convention Center, where there will be a holy hour with a homily by retired Atlanta Archbishop John F. Donoghue.

Beginning at 11:30 a.m., there are programs (or "tracks") for adults, Hispanics, teens and children.

From 12:30 until 2:30 p.m. will be culture hours in native languages for Filipino, Korean and Vietnamese Catholics. At 3:30 p.m., there will be a concert of sacred music.

During the day, the Eucharist will be available for adoration in a special chapel in the Charlotte Convention Center. Priests will be available for confessions all day and there will be an area for vendors selling religious merchandise and offering information about Catholic vocations, religious organizations and ministries, etc.

The Congress concludes with a Vigil Mass that begins at 4:30 p.m.

Where does the idea for a Eucharistic Congress come from?

The first eucharistic congress was held in Lille, France in 1881 under the direction of Msgr. Gaston De Segur. In time, eucharistic congresses developed to their present international character.

The congress of 1908, which met in London, was the first occasion on which a representative of the pope had entered England since the Protestant Reformation. Two international eucharistic congresses have been held in the United States — Chicago in 1926 and Philadelphia in 1976.

The Diocese of Charlotte celebrated its first Congress in September 2005.

Who is allowed to take part in the procession?

Everyone. Leading the procession will be altar servers, organized societies such as the Knights of Columbus, clergy and, most importantly, the Eucharist. Following will be banner carriers representing churches, schools and organizations in the diocese.

The faithful are invited to join the procession as the banner for their church or organization passes by.

What if I am handicapped or unable to walk in the procession?

The Charlotte Convention Center is handicapped-accessible. In addition, individuals with handicaps and those who choose not to walk in the procession are invited to witness part of the procession on the video screens in the Convention Center. Music and clergy will be available in this location until the eucharistic procession arrives.

What if it rains?

The Eucharistic Congress will be held rain or shine. The procession may be moved into the Charlotte Convention Center depending on the weather.

Where can I park?

There is ample parking around the

FRIDAY, OCT. 3

KEYNOTE SPEAKER

CARDINAL JOHN P. FOLEY, GRAND MASTER OF THE EQUESTRIAN ORDER OF THE HOLY SEPULCHRE OF JERUSALEM

Ordained a priest in 1962, Cardinal Foley has been involved in Catholic communications in its many forms. He served as editor of The Catholic Standard & Times, newspaper of the Archdiocese of Philadelphia, and for 23 years was president of the Vatican's Pontifical Council for Social Communications, a post he held until 2007.

Named an archbishop in 1984, he was made a cardinal in November 2007.

In his position as grand master, he guides the Knights of the Holy Sepulchre in the organization's support of the Latin Patriarchate of Jerusalem and its response to the needs of Catholics in the Holy Land.

In April, he became only the fifth person to receive the Christopher Leadership Award in the Christopher Awards' 59-year history. The Leadership Award recognizes individuals who have set a leadership example in the fields of media, church or government.

SATURDAY, OCT. 4

ARCHBISHOP JOHN F. DONOGHUE, who retired as archbishop of Atlanta in 2004, will deliver the homily during the eucharistic holy hour and Benediction on Saturday morning. He has attended all of the Diocese of Charlotte's Eucharistic Congresses since 2005.

BISHOP PETER J. JUGIS, a Charlotte native and fourth bishop of Charlotte, will offer welcoming remarks at the conclusion of the Saturday morning eucharistic holy hour.

GENERAL TRACK, SATURDAY

Dorothy Day diaries offer glimpses of very human saint

REVIEWED BY NANCY L. ROBERTS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Just in time for this year's 75th birthday of the Catholic Worker Movement, its co-founder Dorothy Day's diaries have been painstakingly edited by Robert Ellsberg and published under the title "The Duty of Delight."

Ellsberg, who lived as part of the Catholic Worker community in New York (1975-1980), whittles Day's diaries to the wheat, not to mention the boon of an easy familiarity with her handwriting.

The historian David O'Brien has famously called Day (1897-1980) "the most significant, interesting and influential person in the history of American Catholicism."

There was no separation between Day's Gospel ideals and the way she lived, in voluntary poverty serving the poor and witnessing for peace and social justice, as Ellsberg has written in the introduction to "Dorothy Day: Selected Writings," an earlier book he ably edited.

Unsealed 25 years after her death, Day's diaries are kept in the Dorothy Day-Catholic Worker collection at Marquette University in Milwaukee along with her other personal papers.

The diaries eloquently reveal the daily challenge of trying to live the Gospel. They begin in 1934, shortly after the founding of the Catholic Worker, and end just before her death in 1980, transporting the reader with her through the Great Depression, World War II (in which Day and her paper, The Catholic Worker, remained staunchly pacifist), the Cold War, the Korean and Vietnam wars and the struggle for civil rights.

Day emerges as fully involved in the everyday work of feeding and sheltering the poor.

She dealt each day with alcoholics, drug addicts and the insane; she worried about paying bills; she got her clothing from the common clothing bin and ate whatever was served in the soup kitchen each night. She also recounts witnessing to her long-standing pacifism and nonviolence through public demonstrations and civil disobedience, and on the most personal level, through her frequent struggle to become more compassionate and charitable, more forgiving and more prayerful.

Day, who found strength in daily Mass, prayer and the sacraments, is a very human saint here. She is also a devoted mother to her daughter Tamar and grandmother to nine, a lover of music and literature who devoured books from Dostoevski to Flannery O'Connor, a colleague of Blessed Mother Teresa's, a world traveler and so much more.

A delightful sense of humor occasionally peeks through, as in her September 1964 account of caring for her grandchildren: "It is hard to write or think when the record player is blaring with 'Devil Woman.'"

Ellsberg includes a thoughtful introductory essay and timeline as well as occasional excerpts from Day's Catholic Worker columns.

The editor's occasional annotations are well placed and clear. Overall, the book's intimate look at how Day tried to see God in everyday life is extremely engaging and valuable.

Roberts is author of "Dorothy Day and the Catholic Worker" and co-editor of "American Catholic Pacifism: The Influence of Dorothy Day and the Catholic Worker Movement."

What some underestimate, God raises to new heights

BY JEFF HEDGLEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

When I was in grade school I had a lot of friends. We played together every day at recess and spent the night at each other's houses on weekends.

We built forts in the woods, told ghost stories, talked about girls and played a lot of sandlot whiffle ball. We were inseparable.

Something mysterious happened in the summer between grade school and middle school. Part of my group of friends found other friends. They became the popular crowd, and I was left in the dust with the rest of the group.

I did not understand what had happened. I didn't feel any different, and my old friends in the new popular crowd didn't look any different. It seemed arbitrary, but for some reason I had been rejected by them.

This feeling of rejection stayed with me until my family moved to Texas. I was given a new start. There was a whole new set of people who didn't know my history of being rejected.

I got involved in church and school activities and soon found that I was being included instead of abandoned, invited instead of left out, sometimes even leading instead of following.

In my previous life in Michigan I didn't know what I could become because rejection had stifled my spirit in a powerful way. Never in my wildest dreams did I think I would lead teenagers to deeper faith for more than 20 years, play in a band before 3,000 people, or be a published columnist.

I could not dream it, but God never doubted.

As today's readings show us, God protects and upholds that which he created for good. What others underestimate, and even reject, God raises up to new heights.

When others saw a poor shepherd boy, God saw King David. When others saw simple fishermen, God saw the foundation of a new church.

When I saw only rejection, God saw the future.

God always believes in us, no matter what. Nothing can shake his faithfulness. We may be broken, wounded, depressed, lost, exhausted, empty or rejected, but God stays at our side, always loving, always encouraging and always believing we are a cornerstone.

Questions:

Have you ever seen God raise up someone others underestimate? How have you seen the God's faithfulness?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"The stone that the builders rejected has become the cornerstone; by the Lord has this been done, and it is wonderful in our eyes" (Matthew 21:42).

Bishop rededicates church

The church can now accommodate about 500 people for Mass. Other changes include a new 5,000-square-foot social hall complete with kitchen and faith formation classrooms, a wider parking lot and a new rectory.

"Father Gober had a vision of what he wanted to do. He asked for our help and we said we'd be honored to do it," said Bill Woolley, who served as project manager and co-chaired the capital campaign with his wife, Delores.

"It was a thrilling project with lots of challenges, but it's been wonderful," she said. "There has been such generosity from the parishioners."

"The response was overwhelming. They really supported the vision," said Father Gober.

During the Mass, Bishop Jugis expressed appreciation for their efforts.

"I am grateful for the faith and devotion of all you who have come together to refurbish this church. I am grateful as your bishop for the sacrifices you have made," said the bishop.

He noted that the capital campaign proceeded at an "amazing pace."

"The co-chairs, Bill and Delores Woolley, worked diligently and devoted many hours on behalf of their brothers and sisters here," said Bishop Jugis.

"They put a significant, personal investment into the project, not only in helping raise funds but their overall management of the project," said Father Gober, who presented them with a papal blessing from Pope Benedict XVI during the Mass. "They put their hearts into it," Father Gober added.

In his homily, Bishop Jugis noted the Mass's Scripture readings "describe the beauty of the church and the beauty of the sacred mysteries that are celebrated here."

The second reading, from Revelation, "describes the beauty of the heavenly Jerusalem," said Bishop Jugis. "A parish church is a foretaste of the heavenly Jerusalem for two reasons."

They are that the "worship of the Lamb that takes place continuously in the heavenly Jerusalem already takes place in the parish church" at Mass, he said, and the "beauty of the heavenly Jerusalem is reflected in the beauty of the parish church and its furnishings and decorations."

"Both the beauty of the Mass and the church building prepare us to celebrate the fullness of that beauty one day in the heavenly Jerusalem," he said.

The Scripture reading described Jerusalem gleaming with God's splendor, its radiance like that of a precious stone.

"This parish church, now renovated and enlarged, also gleams today with the splendor of God and is radiant like a precious gem," said Bishop Jugis.

Among the interior features are a tabernacle from Spain, an altar from Italy and four angel statues from Holland.

"I love that Father Gober brought in historical pieces from faraway places," said parishioner Mikey O'Neal. "He put a lot of research and effort into making the church more spiritually connected to those places."

"The changes and beauty within the church are to inspire the people and draw them deeper into the sacred mysteries," said Father Gober.

"As an icon is described as a window into heaven, the new church will be a window and reflection of the heavenly Jerusalem," he said.

Humble beginnings

In 1984 the Diocese of Charlotte purchased a 10-acre tract of land facing Grandfather Mountain. Fundraising efforts began and in 1987, then-Bishop John F. Donoghue gave approval for building to begin.

The first Mass was celebrated in the new St. Bernadette Mission Dec. 31, 1988. Bishop Donoghue dedicated the building in June 1989. During the summer of 1999, a grotto honoring the Blessed Virgin Mary and St. Bernadette was dedicated.

Father Gober was appointed pastor of St. Lucien Church and St. Bernadette Mission in 2003.

EXPLORING THE BIBLE

Library of Congress offers access to 800 years of biblical evolution

to closely examine the Giant Bible of Mainz and the Gutenberg Bible.

The computerized display intrigued her and once at the site she wanted to know more about these giant books filled with Scriptures.

"You can read it and you can flip through the pages just by touching the screen," she said. "Look, this one was handwritten by monks. It's so cool."

This is the kind of excitement library officials were hoping to generate in the spring of 2008 when they set up the hi-tech apparatus next to the two famous centuries-old bibles, which are glass-encased and out of the reach of human touch, said Erin Allen, a staff member in the Public Affairs Office of the Library of Congress, the largest library in the world.

"Are these the only two Bibles in the library, or are there more?" the curious Savannah asked her mother, who shrugged her shoulders indicating she didn't know the answer.

The Library of Congress actually has thousands of Bibles in more than 150 languages, about 1,500 of which are considered significant editions for their rare or historic value, said Mark Dimunation, chief of the library's Rare Book and Special Collections Division.

Some of the oldest Bibles in the collection date back to the 13th century and were handwritten by scribes, Dimunation said.

In the Lessing & J. Rosenwald Room — a space separated from the Great Hall in the library's Thomas Jefferson Building by a maze of hallways, an elevator shaft and a locked golden-caged door — the rare books chief showed a reporter and photographer from Catholic News Service some of the most significant Bible editions in the Library of Congress collection.

Though most of the Bibles are more than 100 years old, the library official was generous with the accessibility of the books, some with worn leather, pigskin, embroidered or velvet bindings, often complete with gold-leafed pages of yellowing paper.

"They are all accessible to the public," Dimunation said. "As long as you are over the age of 18 and registered (with the library) to be a reader, you can come in and look at them."

And those who have valid research agendas are permitted to page through the rare books, under proper supervision, Allen said.

"The library gets about one research request a week to pour over the rare Bibles," Dimunation said.

The most celebrated Bibles in the collection are the Gutenberg and the Giant Bible of Mainz, which are proudly featured in the Great Hall, but some of the rarest Bibles, written in languages ranging from Hawaiian to Mongolian, are housed on shelves far removed from the main exhibits.

The Giant Bible of Mainz is one of the last great handwritten Bibles of Europe and it represents hundreds of years of work disseminating the word of God, according to the library's Web site.

The Gutenberg Bible is the first great book printed in Western Europe from movable metal type and it marks a turning point in the art of bookmaking and consequently in the transition from the Middle Ages to the modern world, the Web site reads.

The rest of the collection — which Dimunation said is ongoing with new acquisitions, and will never be complete — provides readers with an opportunity to witness 800 years of biblical evolution.

Some of the Bibles are considered significant because of the number of copies printed, the volumes that survive or the massive undertaking that was involved in the distribution, such as the Indian Bible, printed in 1663 in Cambridge, Mass., in the Algonquin language, which was used to evangelize Native Americans, Dimunation said.

"This Bible is also significant because it was the first Bible printed in America. There are 16 languages alone in the Bibles from the Thomas Jefferson collection," Dimunation said. "The older Bibles are in Latin. However, we start to see different languages as the years go on, from Hungarian to Arabic. We can reflect on the history of the Bible when we examine these rare and wonderful books."

Though the featured Bibles in the glass-encased exhibits in the library's main hall are as wide as a door frame, some of the Bibles are small enough to fit in an adult hand.

A copy of the Confederate Soldier's Bible printed in 1862 in Augusta, Ga., is small enough to fit in the pocket of a uniform worn by the men who fought for the South in the U.S. Civil War.

The Bible used during the 1861 inauguration of U.S. President Abraham Lincoln isn't necessarily considered a significant book, except for the fact that it was used to swear in the man who is credited with preserving the nation during one of its bleakest periods in history, Dimunation said.

An interesting detail about that Bible is that Roger B. Taney — the first Catholic appointed chief justice of the U.S., the author of the Dred Scott decision that would indirectly lead to the Civil War and a bitter political rival of Lincoln — was required to administer the oath of office to a man he would continue to cross swords with for the next three years.

Most of the rare Bibles were gifts to the library, but others have been purchased, and vary in price depending on their significance, Dimunation said.

"You can't really put a price tag on these books, from a curator's point of view," he said.

"We are a major resource for the study of the Bible. We never talk about the money. It gives people the wrong sense of these books, with texts that remain a valid expression for all sorts of interests," he said.

Perspectives

A collection of columns, editorials and viewpoints

Moral clarity in an election year

Editor's note: A version of this column ran Oct. 22, 2004.

Every election year places added responsibilities and burdens upon us as faithful Catholic citizens. If we are to participate in the world, it is necessary to become acquainted with the pressing issues of the day as well as the candidates who are seeking public office.

We are encouraged by the church to participate willingly, to the extent possible, in worldly affairs. The Catechism of the Catholic Church (CCC) teaches that "submission to authority and co-responsibility for the common good make it morally obligatory to pay taxes, to exercise the right to vote, and to defend one's country ..." (CCC No. 2240).

In other words, as faithful Catholic citizens, we have a privilege, right and obligation to express our faith by our participation in the electoral process.

As such, let us look at the complex issues to inform our consciences on Election Day. Indeed, our Catholic faith can provide us with guidance as we sift through the moral considerations of electing officials to public service. We could all benefit from a prayerful and reasonable consideration of the task of electing our representatives to office.

Before we evaluate issues, candidates and positions, we must first clarify the role of the conscience. Contrary to popular understanding, one's conscience cannot determine right and wrong. Many people today mistakenly think that "following their conscience" means that they create the moral laws and rules by which to live, as if their conscience were akin to the legislative branch of government.

But the conscience cannot create law. On the contrary, the function of the conscience (built into our human nature by God) is merely to judge whether our particular actions are in conformity with the truth, whether our actions are in accord with God's law or natural law (CCC Nos. 1776-1785).

As such, the conscience resembles the judicial branch of government, rather than the legislative branch. It is only capable of applying already existing law, revealed by God or found in nature itself, to specific situations.

What criteria must we use to make our voting decisions? We are encouraged not to base a vote on a particular party affiliation or our earlier voting habits since many candidates, especially today, do not establish their agenda on traditional party platforms and positions.

We are also encouraged not to base a vote on a particular candidate's appearance, personality or opinion of the media. And we are also encouraged not to vote for candidates who merely claim to be Catholic, since many politicians who claim to practice the Catholic faith reject basic Catholic moral teaching, which is, in fact, a great sign of a lack of a candidate's integrity.

We are encouraged, therefore, to base our vote on candidates who seek to promote political agenda that are in accord with God's revelation and natural law, especially concerning the human person.

These issues are the most significant because they treat issues of life and death and the very stability of the family and society. They are non-negotiable because each of the issues concerns actions that are always morally wrong, morally illicit and must never be promoted by law.

Abortion

According to natural reason, abortion is always intrinsically evil and is never to be permitted or tolerated.

This truth also is confirmed by divine revelation and therefore taught by the church without compromise. In fact, the church has consistently taught this ever since the first century and will never change its teaching (see CCC No. 2271).

The catechism states: "Human life must be respected and protected absolutely from the moment of conception. From the first moment of his existence, a human being must be recognized as having the rights of a person — among which is the inviolable right of every innocent being to life" (No. 2270).

And although our modern, secular society and culture uses euphemistic language to conceal the truth — such as "women's rights," health of the mother, population control, the termination of pregnancy, "pro-choice," even the word "abortion" — the harsh truth is that those who promote such social and political programs are promoting the killing of thousands of innocent babies each day.

Each day more than 4,000 innocent children are put to death legally by abortions. Imagine the loss of life greater than the terrorist attack of Sept. 11, 2001 — each day. That is the brutal reality that permeates the society in which we live. We have a very serious obligation to speak out against this evil by not promoting and encouraging it with our vote. To be Catholic is to be pro-life — period. One cannot be pro-abortion and claim to be a practicing Catholic.

Euthanasia

Closely related to abortion is euthanasia, which usually involves the direct killing of a handicapped, sick or dying person. Like abortion, euthanasia is always morally wrong and illicit and must never be promoted or made licit by law.

In the case of abortion, age does not determine personhood. Likewise, old age does not forfeit the rights and dignities afforded to humans. Moreover, sickness, disease or other handicaps and impairments, including imminent death,

Guest Column

FATHER
BUETTNER

do not render human beings non-persons.

It is never permissible to kill oneself (suicide) or assist in another's death (homicide) as in cases of euthanasia, but it is permissible to allow the effects of a disease or illness to run their course if the medical treatment is overly burdensome, dangerous or disproportionate to the expected outcome (Cf. CCC No. 2278).

As in cases of abortion, much confusion and euphemistic language has been employed to obscure the dehumanizing reality of euthanasia. Many who seek its justification and legal acceptance speak of euthanasia as an act of "compassion." However, this is nothing more than a diabolical reversal of the truth. The word "compassion" comes from two Latin words meaning "to suffer with." Oftentimes the desire to commit or to comply with euthanasia comes from the refusal "to suffer with" the patient. Euthanasia is an act that rejects compassion; it is an act that makes "suffering with" a loved one impossible.

Stem cells, cloning

Akin to abortion and euthanasia, embryonic stem-cell research redefines the human person in order to justify the murder of persons for scientific and medical advancements. The problem: extracting the embryonic stem-cells from a living human embryo kills the embryo, thus murdering the human person. The solution: legitimate and highly effective procedures already exist for obtaining human stem cells that do not require killing human beings.

It is well documented that stem cells from bone marrow, placenta and umbilical cords of live births are already in use in treating leukemia and show promise for possible results in treating Parkinson's and other diseases.

Human embryos bear the same rights as every person (No. 2274). In the same manner that the church defends the dignity and legal rights of the human embryo, it also condemns human cloning: "Certain attempts to influence chromosomal or genetic inheritance are not therapeutic but are aimed at producing human beings selected according to sex or other predetermined qualities. Such manipulations are contrary to the personal dignity of the human being and his integrity and identity which are unique and unrepeatable" (No. 2275).

Non-marital means of engendering human life change its generation from an act of procreation to one of reproduction, treating the child as if he or she were a product of a scientific experiment. In other words, in the generation of a child in the marital act, the child is "begotten, not made"; whereas in the case of human cloning, the child is made, not begotten.

Homosexual 'marriage'

Another evil threatening our society's stability is homosexual "marriage." While the church does not condemn those struggling with homosexuality and, in fact, advocates that such persons "must be accepted with respect, compassion, and sensitivity," nonetheless, the inclination towards persons of the same-sex is "objectively disordered" (No. 2358).

Further, the law of human nature, sacred Scripture and the constant tradition of the church all affirm the truth that "homosexual acts are intrinsically disordered" (No. 2357). Therefore, while the church respects the dignity of persons, it also encourages them to turn away from sinful acts, live chastely and seek the freedom of Christian perfection as it encourages all who are bound by various spiritual or psychological disorders.

By definition, marriage is the life-long partnership between a man and a woman, which is ordered to the well-being of the spouses and to the procreation and education of children. We should support only those candidates who regard the common good of society by protecting the institution of marriage from those who would seek to redefine and destroy it.

War, capital punishment

While war and capital punishment are concerned with the protection of the common good — a principal duty of the state — they are not intrinsically evil and both can be justified under certain criteria.

The church teaches that "as long as the danger of war persists ... governments cannot be denied the right of lawful self-defense, once all peace efforts have failed" (No. 2308). "The evaluation of these conditions for moral legitimacy belongs to the prudential judgment of those who have responsibility for the common good" (No. 2309). Therefore, the church recognizes elected officials have the moral responsibility of protecting citizens, without excluding the possibility of war as a legitimate means of defense.

Similarly, the church recognizes and teaches that the state "has the right and the duty to inflict punishment proportionate to the gravity of the offense" (No. 2366) and "the traditional teaching of the church does not exclude recourse to the death penalty" (No. 2367).

Therefore, in both war and capital punishment, the church upholds the state's obligation to protect the common good of its citizens. Neither is preferable. However, there is a fundamental difference between acts that are intrinsically evil and never morally licit, such as abortion, and those that are justified under certain circumstances, such as capital punishment.

We live in difficult times with many serious issues, such as a failing economy, a lingering war, the consistent threat of worldwide terrorism, immigration reform policies and the increasing energy crisis. Yet, none of these compare to the non-negotiable issues affecting the dignity of human life.

We have the opportunity and obligation to elect to public office candidates who will ensure justice and social stability for all citizens, especially the most vulnerable and those unable to speak on their own behalf.

Father Buettner is pastor of St. Dorothy Church in Lincolnton.

The abortion misconception

Poor prenatal diagnosis often leads mothers to wrong choice

Editor's note: This is the first in a series on prenatal diagnosis.

Kelley Wheeler knows how it feels to carry a baby to term following a poor prenatal diagnosis.

Months before her son's birth, a routine ultrasound found an abnormality that had allowed abdominal organs to move up into his chest. This condition, known as congenital diaphragmatic hernia, or CDH, resulted in the crowding of the heart and lungs and made normal growth and development impossible.

Unwilling to consider abortion, Kelly began searching for information regarding available treatment options. She was convinced that Baby Michael could be saved, and she was right. Today Michael is a playful preschooler, running and jumping like any other child his age.

Judy Townsend has a similar story. Her son, John Isaac, was diagnosed with a fetal heart defect known as hypoplastic left heart syndrome, or HLHS, 20 weeks into her pregnancy. HLHS causes a fatal underdevelopment of the left side of the heart.

At diagnosis, little hope was offered for John Isaac's survival, but Judy would not consider abortion. Instead, she sought treatment options because she believed he could be saved and felt she owed her son the best possible chance at life.

Almost a year later, following surgeries and even a few setbacks, John Isaac Townsend is doing very well. Despite the requirement of one more surgery, the prognosis his mother was given bears little resemblance to the promise of the smiling baby she now holds.

That is the problem with the connection between poor prenatal diagnosis (PPD) and the abortions that follow. The grim medical prognosis often provided robs parents of hope, and that — coupled with a fear of the unknown — make carrying to term seem unbearable.

The truth gets lost that some fetal defects, though lethal, can be treated successfully. Thinking that a PPD is an ending, approximately 80 percent of parents choose to abort their unborn babies.

My world was turned upside down by the news of a PPD in 2000. Having declined an abortion, I too focused on the hope of treatment for my unborn son. In that pursuit, Tanner had two surgical procedures "in utero," and I drove 80 miles round trip two times a week for amnio-infusions that would support healthy lung development.

I met with pediatric nephrologists and researched dialysis and kidney transplants, and I even toured the children's hospital where Tanner would be treated after birth. With no regret, I did everything I could do to give Tanner the best possible chance at life.

That's not to say that carrying to term was easy. It was a time of indescribable anguish and grief. My resilience was tested everyday. I had to rely on family and friends for support and encouragement, and often even strangers for the kindness of prayer.

I was pressured by medical providers to reconsider abortion, which left me feeling unsupported. Often the burden felt overwhelming, and at those times I would cling to my faith that God would not leave me to bear this cross alone.

I somehow always found the faith and strength for the day I was living, and enough trust that tomorrow God would provide the same.

Like Kelley and Judy, I never lost hope that Tanner could be saved, and when he was born my heart overflowed with love at first sight of him. But quickly the news was bad.

His beautiful life lasted for 36 hours, for despite all my best efforts, his kidneys could not be repaired.

Sometimes there is the misperception that only those parents whose babies live will feel positive about the experience of carrying to term. Sadly, that supports the notion that abortion is somehow easier. I couldn't disagree more.

Whereas Kelly and Judy's stories might have haunted me had I given up on Tanner too soon, they provide instead the best possible argument for having hoped. I wouldn't change a thing I did despite our very different outcomes.

I miss Tanner every day, but I would never trade the gift of those brief newborn hours in which he knew the comfort of my arms. In the end, there is tremendous peace in knowing that I mothered my son to the best of my ability, even if just for the brief time that he was mine.

Pope: Faith based on personal encounter with Jesus through the church

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — For St. Paul and for all Christians, faith is not based on a myth, but on a personal encounter with the risen Jesus through the church, Pope Benedict XVI said.

At his Sept. 24 weekly general audience in St. Peter's Square, Pope Benedict focused on St. Paul's relationship with the Twelve Apostles first chosen by Jesus to preach the word of God to the ends of the earth.

Because St. Paul never met Jesus during his public, earthly life, he needed to consult with and be confirmed by the first disciples who lived with Jesus and were chosen by him, the pope said.

In his writings, the pope said, St. Paul makes it clear that he recognizes the primacy of the first apostles and that the teaching he is handing on is the teaching of the apostles.

St. Paul makes clear his position that the Eucharist is the center of the church's life and that Christ "is risen and continues to live in the Eucharist," the pope said.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

In today's catechesis we turn again to the life of St. Paul and consider his relationship with the Twelve Apostles.

In his letter to the Galatians, Paul speaks of his visits to Jerusalem where he consulted Peter, James and John, reputed to be the "pillars" of the church. Paul's mission to the Gentiles needed to be confirmed and guaranteed by those who had been disciples of Jesus during his earthly life, and they offered to him and to Barnabas the right hand of fellowship.

Paul passed on the living tradition that he had received: the words of Jesus at the Last Supper, his death and resurrection, and his appearances to Peter and to the Twelve.

Paul emphasizes that Jesus died "for our sins," he offered himself to the Father in order to deliver us from sin and death. And now that Jesus has risen from the dead, he is living in his church and in the Eucharist, where we continue to encounter him.

Just as Paul's teaching is rooted in his experience on the road to Damascus, and in his knowledge of Christ acquired through the church, so too our faith is grounded, not on myths or pious legends, but on the words and deeds of Jesus of Nazareth, and on our encounter with the risen Lord, present in the life of his church.

The rabbit and the wolf

A tale of love and St. Francis of Assisi

As the Diocese of Charlotte celebrates the fourth Eucharistic Congress Oct 3-4, the whole world celebrates the "Poverello" (or, little person) of Assisi — the feast of St. Francis of Assisi is Oct. 4.

What is peculiar about this saint is the fact that he is admired not only by Catholics but by Christians, Muslims and Hindus. Among his qualities was his humble holiness. I like him because he embraced the whole world, made of people, animals and nature. He saw and loved all of these as a reflection of God.

For instance, St. Bonaventure related to us in his "Legenda Major" (VIII:8) that when Francis was in Greccio, he was given a small hare, which he put down to run free where it pleased. And at his call, it leapt quickly into his lap.

He nurtured it with the pious affection of his heart and, after warning it with gentle talk not to let itself get caught again, he let it go free. But as often as he placed it on the ground to run away, it would return to him as if it perceived with some hidden sense the piety he had for it. Finally, at his command, his brothers carried the rabbit away to a safer place of solitude.

In the same way, on an island in the lake of Perugia, also known as Lago Trasimeno, a rabbit was caught and offered to St. Francis. Although it had fled from everyone else, it entrusted itself to his hands and heart as if to natural security.

Then, in the "Little Flowers of St. Francis of Assisi" (Ch.21), there is the fascinating story of the wolf of Gubbio — a fearsome and ferocious wolf that devoured both animals and humans. The citizens were in fear as this wolf came near the town, where St. Francis was staying. He decided to go out against advice and meet the wolf.

When the wolf saw him, it ran forward with its mouth open. As it neared, St. Francis made the sign of the cross toward the wolf and said, "Brother Wolf, come here. I command you on behalf of Christ that you do not harm me or anyone."

Immediately the fearsome wolf closed its mouth and stopped running, and became meek as a lamb.

"Brother Wolf," Francis continued, "I want to make peace between you and these people ... I promise that I will have food given to you constantly, as long as you live, and you promise me that you will never harm any human person nor any animal. Do you promise this?"

The wolf bowed his head as a sign of promise. St. Francis reached out his hand, and the wolf lifted its right paw and tamely placed it on top of the hand.

The story goes on to describe the behavior of the wolf and the people of Gubbio in remarkable detail. What we learn is that when we really love, we become contagious with it.

As Christians, we want everybody to love God. In St. Francis' "Canticle of All Creatures," he invites the sun, moon, stars, water, wind and air to praise God above all: "Praise and bless my Lord and give him thanks, and serve him with great humility." Happy feast of St. Francis!

Do you know where the presidential candidates really stand on these issues? Do you know what the Catholic Church really teaches on them?

The U.S. bishops' document, "Forming Consciences for Faithful Citizenship," seeks to provide a blueprint on how Catholic social teaching should affect political participation by Catholics.

With this issue, The Catholic News & Herald begins a series of articles examining the political views of presidential candidates Sen. Barack Obama and Sen. John McCain in regard to "Faithful Citizenship" and Catholic social teaching.

COACHING CATHOLICISM

Faith is key to success, says Florida basketball coach

ST. AUGUSTINE, Fla. (CNS) — The University of Florida's head basketball coach, Billy Donovan, said he is a "big believer that everything starts with God."

The coach of the Florida Gators knows a thing or two about good starts with 285 wins in 12 seasons and national championships in 2006 and 2007. In the past 40 years, Donovan is among three college coaches to have won back-to-back NCAA titles.

But along with winning games, Donovan, a Catholic, said he also has a passion for helping young people find faith, success and happiness.

During the summer, without the distraction of daily team practices and meetings, Donovan relishes his chance to work with young people at his annual basketball camps. Even though he doesn't spend much time with the campers, he said it's the perfect opportunity to "recharge his batteries" after a long season, reflect on his faith and speak to young people.

"Teenagers have so much in front of them today," said Donovan. "The big thing that I've always tried to talk to our children about and other teenagers is to try to make good decisions."

Donovan said he talks about having faith and "being fair and respectful to everybody's relationship with God."

"If your faith is strong and you're living a faith-based life, the chances are that you will make better decisions and you're probably going to be happier," he said.

He says he tries to talk to youngsters about "taking the strengths, talents and gifts God gave them and utilizing them to help other people." He also asks them to "remember five words: peace, love, hope, joy and forgiveness!"

If people could "feel those five things every single day," he added, "we would be so happy nothing else would make a difference."

Donovan said faith is a "gift from God."

"To me, it's something that takes away our insecurities, our fears, our self-doubt and our worrying all the time," he continued. "I think it's easy to have faith when things are going really well, but I think in everything we do, we worry about the next day, our jobs, our friends, our children, our health, our families."

He stressed that it's important to keep one's faith in tough times, too. The 43-year-old coach encourages young people to pray and read the Bible.

Since he works at a public institution where a lot of different religious denominations are represented, Donovan is careful not to force religious beliefs on anyone.

"I've found that most of the kids I've coached believe in a higher power," no matter what their faith, he said. "Just taking time to give thanks to God is always a great thing."

Bishop hopes new initiative can bring peace between U.S. and Muslims

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A new report calling for stronger diplomatic relations between the United States and Muslims around the world is a step toward peace, said Auxiliary Bishop Denis J. Madden of Baltimore.

"It offers a very good approach to what can be done" and also stresses that the divide between the United States and the Muslim world is "not as wide as people make it out to be," said the bishop, one of 34 American leaders who produced the 146-page document "Changing Course: A New Direction for U.S. Relations With the Muslim World."

The report was created by the Leadership Group on U.S.-Muslim Engagement, which included representatives from religious, business, military, foreign policy, academic, foundation and nonprofit circles.

The group released the report Sept. 24, a day after briefing members of the House Foreign Affairs Committee and members of Congress on its key points.

The project involved 18 months of examining various polls and studies of Muslim and American attitudes and coming up with possible solutions for improving relations, including not only more diplomacy but also a major investment in economic development in Muslim countries that would create more jobs for youths.

The report urges the next U.S. administration to take immediate steps. It calls on the next president to renounce the use of torture and to appoint a special envoy to facilitate negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians.

Bishop Madden said he only became involved in the initiative in recent months but that he was impressed by the work of the committee members and the body's bipartisan nature.

"We all signed off on the document, even though there wasn't always full agreement," he said.

Vatican's security force to join Interpol

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — After setting up two new anti-terrorism units this year that work closely with international police, the Vatican's security force has plans to join Interpol.

Vatican Radio reported Sept. 28 that the Vatican's security force will join the international police organization sometime before Oct. 10 in St. Petersburg, Russia.

The announcement of the alliance was made during a Sept. 27 celebration at the papal summer villa in Castel Gandolfo, south of Rome. Pope Benedict XVI briefly appeared at the celebration and gave his "sincere thanks for the competence and dedication" of the security force, or gendarme corps.

The feast day of St. Michael the Archangel, the corps' patron saint, is Sept. 29.

The corps' director, Domenico Giani, said the force also is looking into forging an "agreement of cooperation with the Italian police," reported Vatican Radio.

The Vatican and Pope Benedict have been named as potential targets by extremist groups in recent years. Although the Vatican has downplayed the threats, it also has beefed up security, adding metal detectors for all visitors to St. Peter's Basilica and attendees at papal events.

The gendarme corps also has been deployed at Vatican territories outside Vatican City, in particular at Rome's patriarchal basilicas.

The gendarme corps, which has about 130 members, works in close collaboration with the Swiss Guard, especially during events involving the pope.

Earlier this year the gendarme corps started working more closely with Interpol, and in June Giani told reporters that the arrangement marked a big step forward for Vatican security.

The collaboration gives the Vatican access to a large data bank of suspects, the latest information on criminal or subversive organizations, and information on the latest anti-terrorism operational procedures.

Vatican official: Death penalty support denies basic Christian belief

ROME (CNS) — Support for the death penalty is a denial of the basic Christian belief that God can turn any person from a life of sin, a Vatican official told a group of justice ministers, judges and lawmakers examining positions on capital punishment.

Archbishop Agostino Marchetto, secretary of the Pontifical Council for Migrants and Travelers, spoke Sept. 29 at the conference "No Justice Without Life," which gathered representatives from 16 countries in Rome for a daylong meeting.

The conference, sponsored by the Sant'Egidio Community, included government officials from Rwanda, Ivory Coast, Guinea, Burkina Faso, Gabon, Kenya, Benin, Tanzania, Mozambique, South Africa, Guinea-Bissau, Lesotho, Liberia, Mexico, the Philippines and Kazakhstan.

Archbishop Marchetto said the United Nations' 2007 resolution urging a moratorium on the use of the death penalty was the "first necessary step" to abolishing capital punishment completely.

The moratorium, he said, should give countries who still have death penalty laws time to "adopt appropriate instruments of law" to ensure the most serious criminals are not a threat to society and to increase the foundations of "a culture of life," paving the way for the abolition of the death penalty.

"Despite everything, the church has always and will always defend the sacredness of human life from conception to natural death as a universal value," the archbishop said.

If one accepts that respect for human life reflects the reality that God created people in his image and likeness, he said, then "the death penalty increasingly appears to be an unacceptable instrument even more than being a useless and dangerous one."

"As Christians, how can we accept that someone be denied the hope of redemption?" the archbishop asked.

"A man or a woman who made a mistake, who committed a crime, no matter how brutal, must have the possibility of being forgiven — while serving a tough sentence — and of living in hope," he said.

First saplings of Vatican reforestation project to be planted

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The first saplings of the Vatican Climate Forest, a reforestation project to offset the Vatican's carbon dioxide emissions, will be planted in November.

The U.S.-based Planktos Inc. and its Hungarian partner, KlimaFa Ltd., are restoring more than 600 acres of forests in Hungary along the Tisza River to offset emissions of carbon dioxide (CO2). The two companies earn money by selling greenhouse-gas mitigation credits to individuals and businesses. Whatever carbon dioxide emissions an individual or company cannot eliminate can be offset by planting trees or buying the carbon mitigation credits of a company that plants trees or takes other action to eliminate carbon dioxide from the atmosphere.

Planktos and KlimaFa donated to the Vatican enough mitigation credits to offset the Vatican's annual CO2 production, estimated at 10,000 tons. The monetary value is almost $250,000.

The planting of 125,600 oak, white willow, black poplar and wild fruit trees would begin in November to compensate for the greenhouse gases emitted by heating and cooling Vatican buildings and driving Vatican cars.

A Bible for every taste, but are they piquing Catholic interest?

Despite variety, only one Bible authorized for English-language Mass

BY NANCY FRAZIER O'BRIEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Editor's note: This is part of an ongoing series on the Bible.

WASHINGTON — These days you can get a Bible that coincides with pretty much any interest.

For the environmentally conscious, there is the Green Bible, complete with soy-based inks, recycled paper and special features that trace Scripture's environmental themes.

For the young and hip, there's the Manga Bible, illustrated in the popular Asian comic-book style and available in versions dubbed "raw" (with commentary and instruction on the manga style) or "extreme" (with the New Testament text written out).

You can listen to "The Word of Promise," an audiobook of the New Testament that features the voices of leading actors like Jim Caviezel, Marisa Tomei, Michael York, Richard Dreyfuss and Terence Stamp as the voice of God.

There are Bibles aimed at couples, students, children, women and participants in just about every sport you can imagine — skiers, skateboarders, surfers and on and on.

The custom Bible program at Thomas Nelson, one of the largest Bible publishers in the United States, allows groups to raise money by creating and selling Bibles that include "special study notes from the ministry's leader that will encourage and equip members and donors in their spiritual walk." One group created the "Cowboys & Cowgirls Holy Bible" through that program.

Thomas Nelson also markets a variety of "Biblezines" — glossy magazines with names such as "Revolve," "Refuel" and "Divine Health" that team New Testament passages with self-help articles such as "240 ways to walk the walk," "Are you dating a godly guy?" and "Cures the Bible way."

But not all Bibles are created equal. And not every Bible reflects a Catholic understanding of Scripture.

Catholic text

Although Catholics may read any version of the Bible for their personal use, the Bible authorized for use in English-language Masses in U.S. Catholic churches is the New American Bible, for which the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine holds licensing rights.

The confraternity operates out of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops' Office of Publishing.

Mary Elizabeth Sperry, associate director for USCCB permissions and New American Bible utilization, handles each request to use all or part of the NAB text, using guidelines developed by the membership of the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine.

She refers any borderline requests back to the confraternity's board of control, made up of Scripture scholars appointed by the confraternity's president.

Requests that would be turned down are those that "interpret the Bible in a way not consonant with Catholic teaching or do not reflect the integrity of the Catholic text," Sperry said.

The Confraternity of Christian Doctrine currently has licensing agreements with publishers of the New American Bible in Korea, India, Philippines, the United States and "most of Anglophone Africa," she said, and other agreements are in the works.

The U.S. situation is rather unique because "we are one of the few publishers that controls a copyright but does not publish" a Bible itself, Sperry said.

When a new translation of the Old Testament is completed — the hoped-for date is sometime this fall — Sperry predicts "an explosion" in the licensing and publication of so-called "niche Bibles" for Catholic women, couples, youths and other groups.

"Catholics want to have the same choices that their Protestant friends have, but they want to have a Catholic text," she said in an interview with Catholic News Service.

Reading the Bible

Catholics' interest in the Bible still lags behind that of their Protestant counterparts, however, according to polling in recent years.

The Barna Group found in its 2006 survey of religious behaviors and beliefs that 47 percent of Americans reported reading the Bible in a typical week, outside church services.

That was the highest Bible readership since the evangelical polling firm began asking the question in the 1980s.

The number had been as low as 31 percent in 1995, according to the series of surveys, which had a margin of error of plus or minus 3.2 percentage points.

But a survey this spring by LeMoyn College in Syracuse, N.Y., and Zogby International found that nearly two-thirds of adult Catholics said they never read the Bible (31.6 percent) or read it only a few times a year (31.3 percent).

Only 8.4 percent said they read the Bible daily; another 14 percent said they read it at least once a week.

A 2005 survey by the Center for Applied Research in the Apostolate at Georgetown University in Washington found that 87 percent of adult Catholics in the United States said they had a Bible in their home, but 54 percent said they had never read it outside Mass in the past 12 months.

Another 28 percent said they read it less than once a month and only 2 percent said they read it daily.

The margin of error for the LeMoyn/Zogby survey was plus or minus 2.6 percentage points; for the CARA poll it was plus or minus 2.76 percentage points.

Other sources

But Catholics may be going to sources other than the printed word for

A worn edition of the New American Bible rests on a book cart during a New Testament class at St. Luke Church in Brentwood, N.Y., in July. The New American Bible, often called the Catholic Bible, is the version authorized for use in English-language Masses in the United States.

Bible reading, if the Web site of the USCCB is any indication.

In the first six months of 2008, the New American Bible page on the USCCB Web site had 8.7 million hits — 70 percent of the 12.4 million hits to the entire Web site.

And podcasts of the daily Bible readings were downloaded nearly 1 million times during that period.

It's unclear how many of those Web visitors were Catholics but an informal poll of visitors to the NAB page over two months in 2007 found that more than half of the respondents identified themselves as parishioners or parish volunteers.

More than 90 percent reported attending Mass at least weekly. Also difficult to gauge is the number of Bibles published each year and to date.

Luke Timothy Johnson, the R.W. Woodruff professor of New Testament and Christian origins at Emory University in Atlanta, has estimated that the Bible has been printed some 5 billion times since the early 1800s and translated into more than 2,000 languages.

The publishing unit of the New York-based American Bible Society said the "best estimate" for Bible sales and distribution worldwide is well more than 100 million per year, although the figures are not fully reported.

There are dozens of English translations of the Bible.

"If the Bible were tracked in terms of best-seller lists, it would pretty much be a constant at the top of that list, week after week," said Tamara Collins, public relations officer of the society.

Wycliffe Bible Translators, a worldwide interdenominational movement that sends translators as missionaries to remote areas where the Bible has not been translated into the local language, estimates that some or all of the Bible has been translated into 2,426 of the 6,912 languages spoken in the world. The nonprofit organization is named for John Wycliffe, who became the first person to translate the Bible into English in the late 1300s.

'Hope and Trust in Life'

Respect Life program brings attention to words of Pope Benedict XVI

WASHINGTON (CNS) — "Hope and Trust in Life" is the theme for the 2008-09 Respect Life program, centered around Pope Benedict XVI's message during his celebrated visit to the United States in April.

A new packet of materials distributed by the U.S. bishops' Office of Pro-Life Activities includes pamphlets, a flier containing important points made by Pope Benedict during his April 15-20 U.S. visit and a CD with full-length versions of articles on a variety of life-related topics, with recommended resources.

All are linked to the pope's message of hope and trust as an antidote to what he called "America's brand of secularism."

The Respect Life program packet mirrors the range of pro-life issues that are necessary for Catholics to comprehend regarding their church's beliefs. The topics include:

— The false hope of embryonic stem-cell research and the real hope offered by research using adult stem cells, outlined by Maureen Condit, a researcher and associate professor in the department of neurobiology and anatomy at the University of Utah School of Medicine.

— The dangers of advance directives that presume in favor of withdrawal of medical treatment, written by Stephen Mikochik, a professor at Temple University Law School and chairman-elect of the National Catholic Partnership on Disability.

— Conscience and the Catholic voter, by Bishop William E. Lori of Bridgeport, Conn., chairman of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops' Committee on Doctrine.

— "Pornography: What's the Problem?" by Mark Houck, co-founder and president of a lay apostolate called The King's Men.

— A reflection on the African-American family and the culture of life, by Auxiliary Bishop Martin D. Holley of Washington, chairman of the USCCB Subcommittee on African-American Affairs and a member of the USCCB Committee on Pro-Life Activities.

— Male grief and trauma following abortion, by Vincent Rue, a psychotherapist who is co-director of the Institute for Pregnancy Loss in Jacksonville, Fla.

The packet also contains a liturgy guide, program models and notable pro-life quotes, in both English and Spanish.

The Committee on Pro-Life Activities creates this package annually to encourage schools, religious education programs and Catholic institutions and organizations to use these materials to help spread the Catholic Church's pro-life message.

Although the Respect Life program is year-round, October is observed as Respect Life Month and the first Sunday in October, Oct. 5 this year, is designated as Respect Life Sunday by the Catholic Church in the United States.

To mark the day, parishes in the Diocese of Charlotte are participating in Life Chains on Respect Life Sunday, Oct. 5. Parishioners will stand along property lines of churches, on city sidewalks and with other church groups in their towns as a sign of support for life.

They will hold pro-life signs with messages such as "Abortion Kills Children" and "Jesus Forgives and Heals."

Discussing the framework

COURTESY PHOTO

Daniel Mulhall, a former staff member for the U.S. bishops' Committee on Evangelization and Catechesis, presents the doctrinal framework for high school catechesis during a diocesan Education Vicariate in-service day at St. Charles Borromeo Church in Morganton Sept. 25.

Mulhall's presentation was based on "Doctrinal Elements of a Curriculum Framework for the Development of Catechetical Materials for Young People of High School Age," which was approved by the U.S. bishops at their November 2007 meeting.

The document sets the framework for material that should be covered in high school religion classes in Catholic high schools, parish religious education or youth ministry programs and for home-schooled Catholic teenagers.

The core curriculum, outlined in the document, includes a format for teaching about who Jesus is, how he is revealed in Scripture, his mission and how the church continues it, encounters with Jesus in the sacraments and how to follow the example of Jesus in modern life.

'About discipleship, not membership'

Ongoing program explores RCIA process

BY JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
CORRESPONDENT

BREVARD — "Susan" and "Jack" are falling in love, but not with each other. They're falling in love with God.

Susan, who has never been baptized or had any experience of church, has been impressed with co-workers who seem to have a more peaceful, joyful attitude than other people she knows.

When asked, they tell her it's a result of their Catholic faith. Susan goes to visit their pastor and tells him she wants what her co-workers have.

Jack has been married to Linda for six years. Linda is a practicing Catholic; Jack was baptized and grew up in another Christian faith tradition, but didn't strongly participate in that tradition. He believes that it's important for families to worship together, so he attends Mass every Sunday with his family.

Jack helps greet people outside the church before Mass, assists with taking up the collection and is a member of the parish team that cooks dinner two Saturday evenings a month at the local soup kitchen. Now he wants to be in full communion with the parish community.

Learning more about how to help people embrace the Catholic faith through the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (RCIA) is the purpose of the four-workshop program, "The Initiation Process in Rural and Small Parishes," sponsored by the Diocese of Charlotte in collaboration with the North American Forum on the Catechumenate.

The first workshop, "The Period of Evangelization and the Precatechumenate," was held at Sacred Heart Church in Brevard Sept. 20.

The workshop covered the rite of acceptance/welcome, reflection on the rite, vision of the inquiry period, rural dynamics, elements of inquiry and discernment for the rite of acceptance.

The three remaining workshops, also scheduled to be held at Sacred Heart Church, will be "Period of the Catechumenate" in spring 2009, "Period of Purification and Enlightenment" in fall 2009 and "Period of Mystagogia" in spring 2010.

This diocesanwide program on RCIA will benefit RCIA team members and coordinators, sponsors and faith-journey partners, spouses of catechumens and candidates, catechists, priests, deacons and liturgy committee members.

Speakers of the Sept. 20 workshop were Franciscan Sister Gael Gensler, who has been involved with adult and children's initiation for 20 years; and Msgr. Michael Clay of the Diocese of Raleigh, whose doctorate from Catholic University of America had as its emphasis RCIA in rural and small town settings.

"We're about discipleship, about continuing the mission of Jesus Christ to spread the Gospel," Sister Gensler said. "The goal is about discipleship, not membership. The goal of RCIA is conversion to Christ."

"All of us are called to something bigger than ourselves, which is hard because our culture tells us we live in Burger King land: you can have it your way," Msgr. Clay said.

Discipleship is a call to mission, listening to the word of God, he said.

"No activity is more important than listening," Msgr. Clay said. "Is our attitude, 'Speak, Lord, your servant is Franciscan Sister Gael Gensler makes a point during "The Initiation Process in Rural and Small Parishes" workshop at Sacred Heart Church in Brevard Sept. 20.

listening'; or is it, 'Speak, Lord, and I'll think it over and get back to you'?"

Discipleship is answering the call, but it's not easy.

"We fear the cost, that we'll have to change," Msgr. Clay said. "We can fear that I'm too young, too old, don't have enough education. All calls are to mission and response."

A way to grow

If Susan decides, after several months of inquiry into the Catholic faith (the precatechumenate), that she is ready to progress further in her Catholic faith journey, she becomes a catechumen.

"Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults," the U.S. bishops' manual for the RCIA process, states: "The term 'catechumen' should be strictly reserved for the unbaptized who have been admitted into the order of catechumens; the term 'convert' should be reserved strictly for those converted from unbelief to Christian belief and never used of those baptized Christians who are received into the full communion of the Catholic Church."

Thus, if Susan completes RCIA and is baptized in the Catholic faith, she's a convert to Catholicism.

Jack, who has already been incorporated into Christ through a valid Christian baptism, is a candidate for reception into full communion with the Catholic Church.

A valid baptism "consists in immersing the [person] in water, or pouring water on the head, while pronouncing the invocation of the Most Holy Trinity ('I baptize you in the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit')," according to the Catechism of the Catholic Church.

Jack has already demonstrated his Catholic discipleship by his regular participation in the Catholic way of life.

RCIA, Sister Gensler pointed out, is a process rather than a program. It's a way for people to grow in their love of God.

"God is always present," she said, "but we're not always aware of it."

It's the Holy Spirit that prompts a person to want to find out more about God, she said.

state's Catholics a greater voice in the political process via an informative and nonpartisan Web site, Bishop Peter J. Jugis of Charlotte and Bishop Michael F. Burbidge of Raleigh have surveyed political candidates on issues relating to church social teaching.

Posted on the diocesan Web sites of Charlotte and Raleigh are the results of the survey sent to all candidates running for elective office to represent North Carolina as governor and in the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives and the state Senate and House.

Candidates were asked questions on a variety of topics, including health care, education, social security and abortion.

The candidates, as listed by the N.C. Board of Elections, were notified of the survey via mail in July and asked to complete the survey online at the Catholic Voice NC Web site, www.catholicvoicenc.org.

Candidates who did not respond to the initial inquiry were sent follow-up notices, with the option to complete the survey online or by hard copy. Candidates were informed the results would be made available online.

Results can be viewed at the Diocese of Charlotte's Web site, www.charlottediocese.org.

The bishops encourage all Catholics in their diocese review the survey results prior to voting. In a Sept. 23 joint statement on voter preparation, the bishops also asked every adult Catholic to be "aware of church teaching to assist you in the formation of your consciences."

"We also note the moral duty we have to vote, both as an exercise of our

Priests for Life takes education campaign on abortion to Congress

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Abortion supporters, including members of Congress and candidates for public office, are being challenged to explain their understanding of abortion by Priests for Life and other pro-life leaders.

In a campaign that was taken to both houses of Congress over three days in mid-September, the pro-life leaders asked the elected officials, "Is this what you mean by abortion?" after showing them graphic diagrams, quotes from medical texts and testimony about the most common abortion procedure by a physician who once performed the procedure.

The campaign is designed to come to a common understanding of the term abortion, said Father Frank Pavone, national director of Priests for Life, during a media briefing Sept. 18 at the National Press Club.

Joining the effort was Alveda King, the niece of Rev. Martin Luther King Jr., and Dr. Anthony Levatino, an obstetrician-gynecologist who said he performed about 1,200 first- and second-trimester abortions during his first five years in private practice.

"To have a meaningful debate on any topic, those having the debate must have a common starting point," said Father Frank Pavone, national director of Priests for Life.

"In the abortion debate, however, the debating sides are rarely talking about the same thing," he said. "The purpose of our effort is to establish a common starting point, so that those discussing abortion have the same thing in mind when they start off the discussion."

Responding to recent comments about the Catholic Church and abortion by two prominent Catholic lawmakers, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and Democratic vice-presidential candidate Sen. Joseph Biden, Priests for Life said that "those who support legal abortion are all too often unable or unwilling to describe what it is that they are supporting."

Many people are in denial that abortion actually is "an act of violence that kills a child," Father Pavone said. "Anyone using the word should be able to answer that question. Moreover, the project is completely nonpartisan and applies to people of any party or no party."

Candidates' stands on life cover more than abortion

Some finer points, differences difficult to ferret out

BY NANCY FRAZIER O'BRIEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Editor's note: This is the first in a series on the 2008 election.

WASHINGTON — On few topics do presidential candidates Sen. Barack Obama and Sen. John McCain diverge as sharply as on abortion.

But on other life issues — embryonic stem-cell research, assisted suicide and the death penalty — the differences are not always easy to ferret out.

On abortion, McCain's campaign Web site said the Republican candidate "believes Roe v. Wade is a flawed decision that must be overturned" as "one step in the long path toward ending abortion."

Obama's Web site says the Democratic nominee "will make safeguarding women's rights under Roe v. Wade a priority" and that he "opposes any constitutional amendment to overturn that decision."

In their 2007 document, "Forming Consciences for Faithful Citizenship: A Call to Political Responsibility," the U.S. Catholic bishops stress the importance of the life issues.

"The direct and intentional destruction of innocent human life from the moment of conception until natural death is always wrong and is not just one issue among many," the document says. "It must always be opposed."

Martin Shaffer, a political science professor and dean of the School of Liberal Arts at Marist College in Poughkeepsie, N.Y., said the impact of the life issues "may be murky at best given that neither candidate has been known nationally as a leader in either direction on those issues."

"Although John McCain's selection of Sarah Palin for his ticket is in part an attempt to make connections to voters on the life issues, neither presidential candidate is crystal clear and consistent on these issues," Shaffer told Catholic News Service Sept. 17.

Stem-cell research

On stem cells, neither McCain nor Obama fully embraces the bishops' unequivocal opposition to any stem-cell research that involves the destruction of human embryos.

McCain "opposes the intentional creation of human embryos for research purposes" and "will strongly support funding for promising research programs, including amniotic fluid and adult stemcell research and other types of scientific study that do not involve the use of human embryos," according to his Web site.

Obama believes "we owe it to the American public to explore the potential of stem cells to treat the millions of people suffering from debilitating and life-threatening diseases," his campaign site says.

But both candidates voted for — and Obama co-sponsored — the Stem-Cell Research Enhancement Act of 2007, which President George W. Bush vetoed and the U.S. bishops had strongly opposed.

The legislation would have permitted the destruction of so-called "spare embryos," unused after fertility treatments, for use in embryonic stem-cell experiments.

Phyllis Zagano, senior research associate in the religion department at Hofstra University in Hempstead, N.Y., and a columnist on Catholic issues, said she believes the life issues "will play a very big role in the election, not only for Catholics but for all people of religious faith."

But because both candidates would permit embryonic stem-cell research and McCain has said he would allow abortions in cases of rape, incest and danger to the mother's life, "for people for whom life issues are primary, I honestly don't know how it will fall," she told CNS Sept. 18.

Zagano said, however, that the combination of Palin's "appeal to the middle of America" and McCain's stronger position on abortion will likely mean that religiously motivated voters "will fall more on the McCain side."

Other life issues

The topic of assisted suicide does not come up on either candidate's campaign Web site, and neither has taken a public stand on Washington state's Initiative 1000, which would legalize physician-assisted suicide.

In "Faithful Citizenship," the bishops say, "The purposeful taking of human life by assisted suicide and euthanasia is not an act of mercy, but an unjustifiable assault on human life."

The bishops also criticize "our nation's continued reliance on the death penalty" and said they support "efforts to end" its use and moves to limit it "through broader use of DNA evidence, access to effective counsel and efforts to address unfairness and injustice related to application of the death penalty."

Asked by U.S. Catholic magazine about their positions on capital punishment, neither candidate embraced that view.

"I support the death penalty for heinous crimes in which the circumstances warrant capital punishment," said McCain.

Obama's stand was a bit more nuanced. "Throughout my career I have worked strenuously to ensure that the death penalty is only administered fairly and justly," he told U.S. Catholic. "But I do believe that there are some crimes that are so heinous that they deserve the death penalty."

Frank McNeirney, co-founder and national coordinator of Catholics Against Capital Punishment, says he does not expect the death penalty to be much of an issue for Catholic voters in the 2008 elections.

Even in 2004, when the Democratic candidate for president, Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, opposed the death penalty, "it was not a big factor in any of the debates," he said.

More than 100,000 expectant couples each year receive the devastating news of a poor prenatal diagnosis (PPD). It may be the detection of a fetal heart defect, kidneys that are too small for gestation, or evidence of spina bifida or Down Syndrome, but whatever the specifics, shocked and broken-hearted parents have lost the baby and the pregnancy they had anticipated. With little or no information or resources available that support the option of carrying to term, 80% of these pregnancies end in abortion.

Authors seek to replace 'either-or' politics with Catholic vision

REVIEWED BY DAVID GIBSON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

A deeply ingrained "politics of division" erects walls in today's America that keep people from conversing civilly about public policy concerns and leave them to approach issues on an "either-or basis," according to Chris Korzen and Alexia Kelley, joint authors of "A Nation for All." They view the common good as the big loser in this divisive atmosphere.

Korzen and Kelley think that neither major U.S. political party in recent years has lived up "to the call to the common good." Their goal? To examine policies and ideas holding sway in this divided time and "offer a vision of the common good that can benefit" everyone.

Korzen is co-founder and executive director of Catholics United, while Kelley is principal founder and executive director of Catholics in Alliance for the Common Good.

Their organizations, born in 2005, hope "the national dialogue on faith and politics" can be turned around.

The politics of division "takes place when our leaders encourage us to put aside our commonalities and focus on our differences"; it is witnessed, for example, when leaders resort "to scare tactics and name-calling" to advance their agendas, the book explains.

Sen. Robert P. Casey, D-Pa., a pro-life Democrat, speaks in the foreword about an "ideological rigidity fused with partisan hostility (that) makes collaboration and consensus impossible."

It seems to me that a daunting challenge faces the authors of a book like this one: how to get beyond preaching only to the choir. After all, if today's politics of division is as they describe it, who on the divide's other side will read their book?

The authors seem aware of this challenge. They point out that "shared experiences and time together" foster trust and civility between political rivals, and that increased understanding of the common good helps people get past the political divide.

Casey suggests that "dialogue and consensus-building" are needed.

Still, I cannot help wondering how such a dialogue will happen in the context the authors describe. Perhaps this is a topic for yet another book — by these or other authors.

One would expect this book to examine the moral responsibilities of Catholic voters, the withholding of holy Communion from some Catholic politicians, abortion and the scope of Catholic social teaching, and to survey the history of contemporary debates on the church and politics — and it does.

The authors view abortion as an affront "to human life and dignity," while holding that discourse on human life too often presents a "false choice" between fighting to end abortion or fighting to promote social justice. Research shows consistently that a majority of women seeking abortions "do so for economic reasons," they write.

If "A Nation for All" opposes a politics of division, it places great hope in a politics of the common good. It recommends focusing "more on the kind of society we should have and less on the kind we shouldn't."

Furthermore, the book says, the church's "long history of grounding the common good in the dignity of the human person and the specific demands of justice makes Catholics especially well suited to challenge our nation's leaders to embrace a more robust common-good agenda."

God's gifts are to be used, shared

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

In the "First Principle and Foundation" of his spiritual exercises, St. Ignatius Loyola explained that God's gifts are presented to us so that we can come to know him more easily and better return his love.

He added, "We appreciate and use all these gifts of God insofar as they help us develop as loving persons."

This is the twofold message in today's Gospel parable about the banquet God places before us: We must recognize the richness of his gifts and also reverence them.

The first part of the story shows people simply ignoring the gifts; the second part shows people partaking in the banquet but with a total lack of appreciation for what they are offered and no clue as to what to do with it.

As Ignatius suggests, how we respond to the particular gifts God offers each of us is the foundation of our lived faith.

If she were in the parable, my friend Jackie probably would not have been on the original invitation list. She wasn't born into privilege and wasn't academically gifted.

Struggling through school, she watched others go to college while she worked to pay bills and tuition for courses in various professional programs. She was repeatedly disappointed by being turned down for admission or missing the final cut.

Test-taking was a particular obstacle.

Last month her decade-long persistence paid off as she completed a medical technician program and passed the certification test.

But throughout her long personal struggle, she took every opportunity to give what she had — in ministry to youth caring for family members, offering support to friends and celebrating the lives and accomplishments of other people.

I guess you could say she was sort of sneaking food.

So as Jackie continued to hang near that banquet hall, when she finally got invited in she was dressed for the occasion.

She donned her sacrificial love for her family; she sported deep friendship and spiritual growth she'd nurtured in her teens; she wore her favorite perseverance and good grace that somehow kept her from resenting others' gifts; she was dressed in her continuous relationship with her church community — it was practically painted on; and she brought her abiding love for her host.

Questions:

What gifts has God put on the banquet table he's spread in your life? How have you revered them — or failed to?

Catholic film critics laud Paul Newman's career, generosity

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Catholic film critics lauded the work of actor Paul Newman, who died Sept. 26 at age 83 of cancer. Other praise came from the Vatican's newspaper.

"In his films he was the tough guy and the braggart, the rebel and the conquistador," said a notice in the Sept. 29 issue of L'Osservatore Romano. "In reality Newman was a generous heart, an actor of a dignity and style rare in Hollywood quarters."

The obituary mentioned his role in the 1954 biblical epic "The Silver Chalice," although Newman at one point took out a full-page ad in a Hollywood newspaper deriding the movie as one of the worst ever made.

"He and (Marlon) Brando are gone now, and they pretty much defined screen acting in the '50s," said Jim Arnold, who wrote movie reviews for 39 years for St. Anthony Messenger magazine before retiring in 2003. "That kind of defined the end of a generation in Hollywood."

"Probably every Catholic film professor or adult is fond of certain films of his," said Arnold.

Arnold talked about his personal favorite: "'Cool Hand Luke,' of course, being the classic one — the Christian parable in which the Luke character played by Newman is a Christ figure coming to the nasty world of the prison and sacrificing himself for others — not in a very conscious, churchy way but in a subtle, very intelligent way.

"It was a very, very good film. It was shown a lot in the 1960s and '70s in a lot of church halls as well as at film festivals," he said.

Gerri Pare, a former director of the U.S. bishops' Office for Film & Broadcasting, couldn't stop at just one Newman favorite. She chose the 1990 movie "Mr. and Mrs. Bridge," starring Newman and his real-life second wife, Joanne Woodward. In her review, she said the "standout performances" of the two previous Oscar winners merited them additional Academy Award statuettes.

Pare also picked Newman's last major on-screen film role, 2002's "Road to Perdition."

Pare noted how Newman made his gangster character in that film "really realize there would be consequences to all his criminal activities: 'You know what we have done, and there's not going to be a heaven for us afterwards.'"

"We don't see that too often. ... It made a real moral point," said Pare, who rated it one of the best movies of 2002. "He was just outstanding in 'The Verdict' and you couldn't help but be entertained by 'The Sting' and 'Butch Cassidy (and the Sundance Kid).'"

"A gentleman's sense of character always came through" in Newman's performances, said Joseph Cunneen, who has reviewed movies for the National Catholic Reporter weekly newspaper. "There was a human generosity behind it all that makes him different from the usual Hollywood star."

"I am not ready to rate him as an actor against other great actors. That's not a problem I'm ready to solve," Cunneen said, but recalled that "he was in very few bombs."

"His relationship with his wife was very gratifying. They acted well to each other and encouraged each other to go after roles in films that were particularly worthwhile," he said.

Newman's last film credit was as narrator of the 2007 documentary "The Price of Sugar," which chronicled the efforts of a British-born Catholic priest to help the Haitians who had migrated to the Dominican Republic make money by planting and harvesting sugar.

Although Newman's voice-over is gravelly, "it fits our story," said director Bill Haney last year during the film's release. "It's a bit of the voice of God. He's got a bit of Methuselah in his voice."

Newman had announced earlier in 2007 he was retiring from acting because of his advancing age and his decreased ability to remember his lines.

Arnold mentioned the Newman's Own line of specialty foods that bear the actor's name and likeness.

"When he became wealthy and could afford to do that kind of thing, he had the advantage of finding a more healthy way to have a product with his name on it," he said.

Sales of Newman's Own products have generated millions of dollars for charities.

"As a matter of fact, two nights ago," Pare told CNS, "I was watching 'Larry King Live,' a memorial tribute to him (Newman), and I ate Newman's Own popcorn during it. I thought that was an appropriate tribute."

About this presentation...What principles form the basis of the U.S. Catholic Bishops' call for comprehensive immigration reform? How can the faith community help bring about a society that welcomes newcomers, especially people fleeing poverty and/or seeking reunion with family? As we seek immigration reform, can we concurrently reach the goals of fulfilling our faith's mandate to "welcome the stranger," maintaining our nation's security, and respecting the moral values and civil laws which guide our actions? These questions will be addressed during this presentation. For information on the "JFI Campaign" visit www.justiceforimmigrants.org.

Mr. Cube is the National Director of the USCCB's "Justice for Immigrants" Campaign. He has a broad range of experience in public affairs consultancy, community outreach, communications and legislative assistance. Prior to his current position, Mr. Cube served as the legislative director of the Washington State Catholic Conference and as a public relations consultant for the Washington State Department of Transportation.

ARCHIVAL ANECDOTA

For the month of October, here are some historical facts about Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin, the third bishop of Charlotte.

ARCHIVAL PHOTO

Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin is pictured with Missionaries of Charity in their convent in Charlotte, which was opened in June 1995 during a visit to the Diocese of Charlotte by Blessed Mother Teresa.

Biographical information:

- Aug. 30, 1927: Born in Portsmouth, Va.
- May 25, 1957: Ordained a priest for the Archdiocese of Washington, D.C. by Cardinal Patrick O'Boyle.
- Nov. 10, 1987: Appointed titular bishop of Rosemarkie and auxiliary bishop of Washington, D.C.
- Dec. 20, 1988: Ordained auxiliary bishop of Washington, D.C. by Cardinal James Hickey; appointed regional bishop of southern Maryland counties.
- Feb. 22, 1994: Appointed third bishop of Charlotte by Pope John Paul II.
- April 13, 1994: Installed as bishop of Charlotte at St. Gabriel Church, Charlotte.
- Sept. 10, 2002: Retired as bishop of Charlotte.

During his time as bishop of Charlotte:

- The number of Catholics increased from 95,000 to more than 135,000;
- Blessed Mother Teresa, a friend, spoke at an ecumenical prayer service at the Charlotte Coliseum June 13, 1995. A convent for the Missionaries of Charity was opened in Charlotte during her visit.
- In November 1997, the chancery and diocesan offices moved from Morehead Street to Church Street in Charlotte.
- Bishop Curlin and Raleigh Bishop F. Joseph Gossman issued a joint pastoral letter, "Of One Heart and One Mind," to N.C. Catholics in 1997. The letter presented the difficulties of the poor in N.C. through the use of personal accounts and discussed church teaching regarding responsibility to assist those who are less fortunate. The bishops asked for action in not only addressing the effects of poverty but also in confronting the root causes of it.
- The Church of Mary Help of Christians at Belmont Abbey was elevated to a minor basilica July 27, 1998. The dedication occurred March 22, 1999.

Bishop Curlin's coat of arms

(designed by Anthony W.C. Phelps)

- Episcopal motto: Sentire cum Christo (To think with Christ), adapted from Philippians 2:5.
- Top left quarter: Celtic cross edged in gold honoring St. Patrick, patron saint of the Diocese of Charlotte's cathedral. Bottom left quarter: Gold crown symbolizing Queen Charlotte for whom the see city was named.
- Right half: Personal arms of Bishop Curlin. Cross quartered in red and blue over a white shield. Red and white are colors for Christ, blue symbolizes Blessed Virgin Mary. Blue with red and white professes the unique union of Mary with Christ in the mystery of redemption. The gold fleur-de-lis symbolizes Our Lady and is a remembrance that all of the parishes Bishop Curlin served as priest held titles relating to the Blessed Mother.
- The green pontifical hat with six tassels on each side indicates rank of bishop.

Interesting facts about Bishop Curlin:

- He told people they could stop by the bishop's residence any time they saw the light on and needed to talk.
- As a priest in Washington, D.C., he stayed at a homeless shelter overnight to experience what the poor endure.
- He acted as "cook" and scrubbed floors at the Missionaries of Charity convent in Washington, D.C.
- During one 5-month period in his first year as bishop of Charlotte, he put 21,000 miles on his car attempting to visit as much of the diocese as possible. He enjoyed praying the rosary on the long trips.
- Bishop Curlin has a special affinity for the sick and dying, and uses the words of St. Paul of the Cross as a maxim: "In the twilight of life, God will judge us by the love we offered the poor and the suffering on earth."

St. Gabriel School celebrates 50 years of fostering faith

The celebration also included a film highlighting the school's 50 years and an indoor picnic. Among the attendees and special guests were past administrators and teachers.

In 1958, Father Paul Byron, the first pastor of St. Gabriel Church, opened a school with one kindergarten; a first grade was added the following year.

In 1960, St. Gabriel School was dedicated by Bishop Vincent S. Waters of Raleigh. The school opened with 150 students in kindergarten through eighth grade. Administrative and teaching duties were assumed by the Sisters of Mercy, and Sister Jeanne Marie Kienast was the school's first principal.

"The thing that stands out most in my mind was the happiness and the closeness that we felt," said Sister Kienast.

In the early days, classes were held in quail huts on the church property; the original gym could seat no more than 50 people; and in the first school building there was no way to get from the first floor to the second floor without going outside in the rain, recalled Father Sheridan, who gave the homily.

"The campus has changed, but the mission has not," said Father Sheridan.

And that mission, he said, is "to provide an environment where things can take place that really matter — to provide an environment where there is true Christian guidance for our children and our parents."

The family atmosphere was evident at the picnic, which was attended by approximately 800 people, according to Lynn Erin Tyler, PTO president.

Among them was Pete McArdle, who graduated from St. Gabriel School in 1983. He said he credits the school for providing him with "a good moral compass and a solid Catholic background."

"I have four kids, all of whom go to school here," he said. "The school's a lot bigger now, but it's the same spirit and the same energy."

Fellow alumni Todd Siczek also has two children attending the school.

"It's pretty special," said Siczek, of seeing his children attend his alma mater, "especially given that the children of classmates of mine are friends with my kids."

St. Gabriel School has come a long way over the past 50 years.

In 1992, a new parish center was built, which housed the school and also served as the location for faith formation and adult education activities.

The new 79,000-square-foot building included 19 classrooms, a 500-seat cafeteria and a 600-seat gymnasium, allowing for an increase in enrollment from 385 to 535 students.

Today, enrollment is up to 595 students, the school has a state-of-the-art computer lab and teachers use interactive smart boards, according to Principal Sharon Broxterman.

But like Father Sheridan said, the mission of the school has remained the same.

"Most importantly, we are a Catholic school," said Broxterman. "Our purpose is to pass on that faith to the next generation."

Hannah Grendahl, an eighth-grader at St. Mark School in Huntersville, holds a sign during "Wash for Life" Sept. 23. Twenty-one eighth-graders participated in the national pro-life event, during which youth groups from around the country hold car washes to raise funds for local pregnancy care centers. Organized by middle school youth minister Katie Herzing, the event raised $340 for Room at the Inn, a Catholic maternity home in Charlotte.

Due to the drought in North Carolina, the students washed only the insides of cars. Working in groups, the students cleaned windows, vacuumed carpets and seats, collected debris and dusted the interiors. "The day was a huge success, and we plan on participating in the Wash for Life next year and washing 100 cars," said Herzing.

A look into the heart of prejudice

The better we know ourselves, the wiser and less indiscrete we are

"This country isn't ready for an African American president!"

"We will never have a woman vice president as long as I am alive!"

One way to learn about innate prejudices in people is to discuss the upcoming election. Without a doubt, everyone has a right to an opinion.

In fact, people's ability to voice their opinion is what has made our country great.

But where do we draw the line between sound opinion and prejudice? What does being wrongfully prejudiced say about a person?

The word "prejudice" means to pre-judge. Webster's defines it as "injury due to some judgment or action of another, as in disregard of a person's rights."

By its nature, prejudice spawns injury. It can result in character assassination and destroy reputations, actions that often are much more painful than physical injury.

In the U.S. Supreme Court, a frieze depicting the works of good and evil stands above the justices; one of the works of evil is slander, one of the handmaids of prejudice.

Whenever we talk about prejudging, we also are speaking of imprudence. Prudence advises us to be clear-sighted in seeking the truth, not flinching when something is not to our liking.

So knowing the real truth is essential for prudent judgment. It is also the antithesis of indiscretion and foolishness.

How do people become prejudiced?

One answer can be found in Fyodor Dostoyevsky's book, "The

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE
HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

Brothers Karamazov."

In one of the episodes, Fyodor and his three sons visit a wise old monk named Zosima. During the visit, Fyodor plays the part of a buffoon. When he finally settles down and admits his indiscretion, he beseeches Zosima to share wisdom on his behavior.

Zosima replies, "You are lying!" He tells Fyodor he is not truthful to himself, and hence not to everyone around him.

Prejudice, more often than not, is the result of a person not being truthful with himself or herself. Prejudiced persons love their own self-deceit, wallow in it.

They have no desire to leave their comfortable, narrow world to learn the real truth and the discomfort it can create.

The opposite of prejudice is wisdom that encourages us to ask what ultimately is behind our heavy heartedness and the feelings that are locking us into our one-sided world.

The better we know our true hearts, the wiser and less indiscrete we are.

That should govern the way we pick our next president and vice president!

No common ground for abortion

I was dismayed by Douglas Kmiec's Sept. 19 column ("Abortion and common ground"). Dr. Alveda King (niece of Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.) and others have made a compelling moral analogy between abortion and slavery.

Both are grave evils that deny personhood and claim ownership of another life. If we apply this slavery analogy to Kmiec's argument, we would seek to improve economic conditions to make slavery unnecessary but ignore the unjust law that legalizes such grave evil.

Kmiec asks us to find "common ground." He states "there is, in fact, more than one way to be pro-life."

But there is only one way to be pro-life — with all your heart, soul and mind.

— Peter Miller
Hickory

Moral clarity appreciated

We want to express our gratitude for Father Matthew Buettner's column in the Sept. 26 issue ("Moral clarity in an election year"). The definitions of the moral issues of our current political scene with the respective positions of the Catholic Church were crystal clear, consistently logical and documented with references to the catechism.

The conclusions are irrefutable and the responsibility of each Catholic voter is obvious. Thank you for making this outstanding material available to members of the Diocese of Charlotte.

Fighting the force

High abortion rate associated with Down syndrome diagnosis

Editor's note: This is part of a series on prenatal diagnosis.

This morning, I went to Mass with my family. Admittedly, I was a bit distracted by my 6-month old son, George, who was trying to get my husband's attention with his newest tricks — grabbing noses, blowing bubbles, trying to sing (or at least that's what we call it).

When George does all those regular baby things, we rejoice more than we did with his older siblings because George has Down syndrome, a chromosomal disorder.

After the doom and gloom prognosis we were given for him, it's now wonderful as we realize that he's overwhelmingly more like his siblings than different from them.

As I sat in church today, I wondered where all the other babies with Down syndrome were. Last week we were at a violin concert, and there was a happy, busy 4-year-old with Down syndrome sitting behind us.

In May, I brought George to an education conference where I saw three other babies with Down's in the room.

So where are the babies with Down syndrome at my church? There's a wonderful young man, Nathan, who has Down syndrome. He was in my Sunday school class several years ago, but he's on his way to middle school now.

In my 11 years of working with every first Communicant at our parish, Nathan has been the only kid with Down syndrome to celebrate that sacrament. Nobody I've asked has been able to think of a baby with Down syndrome baptized at our church in the past few years, other than our George.

I can't think of any reason Catholic moms wouldn't conceive just as many babies with an extra chromosome as the rest of the world's women — so where are the babies?

Ninety percent of all babies prenatally diagnosed with Down syndrome are aborted.

From personal experience, I can tell you that the obstetrical care system is a strong force, and truly a challenge for even the most passionately pro-life families. While early prenatal care and screening is valuable and positive for many reasons, as soon as there is even a remote possibility of a fetal problem all the relationships in that system change.

It's called poor prenatal diagnosis (PPD). When obstetricians provide a PPD, the system can go from one geared toward investing in the health of mother and baby to a fast-paced, frightening, very negative organization.

When our family learned that George probably had Down syndrome, we made it absolutely clear to everyone that we would keep our son. I was, however, amazed at how much time and effort it took to go against the flow. Why would these professionals make life more difficult for a family struggling with a PPD? Why wouldn't they be supportive of a family carrying to term?

Things became more difficult when we had additional pregnancy complications that required a specialist. Finding a maternal fetal medicine doctor willing to help us bring George into the world in as healthy a state as possible required much time and grief.

We managed to resist the force, and we kept George. He was premature, and he has Down's, and he brings joy to our family.

So I think of Newton's Third Law: "Every force has an equal and opposing force." Perhaps that explains why there aren't any other babies with Down syndrome in my church, because the force of the fast-paced, frightening, non-pro-life obstetrical industry isn't being met with much of anything to oppose it.

How can we create a force, equal in speed, strength and power to that of the medical system, that could support families dealing with bad news about their babies?

Our force must be positive, peaceful, honest and gentle. Families in this situation are so vulnerable, so options must be visible and immediately available. Often medical-related issues happen so fast that if parents don't know about supportive options ahead of time, it might be too late.

And finally, our efforts to support these families must be fully integrated into a culture of respect for life — no matter how brief, no matter how handicapped — in every aspect of our faith community.

Effective parish leadership

Servant leadership qualities encourage 'followership'

There's a lot of talk about leadership these days, most notably, of course, in the campaign for the presidency.

But it was encouraging to see an emphasis on leadership in early September at Corpus Christi Catholic Church in suburban Philadelphia where hundreds of people from surrounding parishes gathered to discuss leadership, involvement, community and spirituality in parish life. I was invited to offer some keynote thoughts.

There is a distinction, I pointed out, between leadership and management, and that distinction was not news to this predominantly lay assembly. They agreed that management deals with complexity and leadership deals with change.

Although it is sometimes said that you lead people and manage things, I reminded them that the late Peter Drucker, an expert on business management, held that, "Management deals with people, their values, their growth and development — and this makes it [the study of management] a humanity."

Aware, however, that leadership deals with change, the parish leaders in this assembly realized that any attempt to bring about change will draw resistance; they know that most humans prefer to live in the immediate past.

So those who want to lead,

I suggested, have to be persuasive communicators. It is more important, of course, for a leader to have integrity and creativity, but if you don't write and speak well you are probably not going to lead effectively.

Although the emphasis at the Corpus Christi gathering was on parish leadership, it was natural to think of political and business leaders, even military leaders, as we considered various styles of leadership and their applicability to the leadership challenge in a parish.

There's something to be said for "followership" too, but it was up to the subgroups in this gathering to decide how best to generate more involvement and wider participation on the part of parishioners in parish activities.

I mentioned that I had read an interesting book recently: "Counselor: A Life at the Edge of History" by Ted Sorensen, special counsel to President John F. Kennedy and best known, perhaps, as Kennedy's chief speech writer.

Speaking of Kennedy as leader, Sorensen says: "JFK was a wonderful boss. We never argued, quarreled, shouted or swore at each other. He never bawled me out. He never asked me to lie to anyone. He never misled or lied to me. ...

"When mistakes occurred, whether in his campaign or in his presidency, he never blamed me or anyone else on his staff, or disavowed me or others when under political or journalistic pressure. To the contrary, he always protected and defended us.

"When a speech of his on which I had worked went well, or a political task I had undertaken for him succeeded, he often telephoned me the next day with profuse thanks."

In this political season, the entire nation is assessing leadership qualities. Most of us like a friendly leader.

We want evidence that the would-be leader's ears are not purely ornamental; we want to be heard by the one we're being asked to follow. We want honesty, integrity and veracity as well as energy in our leaders.

Years ago in a panel discussion at the University of Notre Dame the following three essentials of Christian leadership were mentioned: availability, accountability and vulnerability.

Where parish leadership displays those three, can engaged followership be far behind?

Freedom means imitating Christ, especially serving poor, pope says

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Christian freedom is not being able to do anything one wants, but being free to imitate Christ, especially in serving the poor, Pope Benedict XVI said.

"Let us allow ourselves to be guided by the Spirit, trying to live in the freedom that finds direction in faith in Christ and becomes concrete in service to our brothers and sisters," the pope said Oct. 1 at his weekly general audience.

"Being increasingly like Christ is essential. That is how one becomes truly free," the pope told those gathered for his audience in St. Peter's Square.

The pope's audience talk focused on how St. Paul and the other apostles resolved differences they had, particularly regarding whether new Christians from pagan families were required to observe Jewish law.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

In our continuing catechesis on St. Paul, we now consider two events that illustrate Paul's relationship to the Twelve, which combined respect for their authority with frankness in the service of the Gospel.

At the Council of Jerusalem, Paul defended before the Twelve his conviction that the grace of Christ had freed the Gentiles from the obligations of the Mosaic Law. Significantly, the church's decision in this matter of faith was accompanied by a gesture of concrete concern for the needs of the poor (cf. Gal 2:10).

By endorsing Paul's collections among the Gentiles, the council thus set its teaching on Christian freedom within the context of the church's communion in charity.

Later, in Antioch, when Peter, to avoid scandalizing Jewish Christians, abstained from eating with the Gentiles, Paul rebuked him for compromising the freedom brought by Christ (cf. Gal 2:11-14).

Yet, writing to the Romans years later, Paul himself insisted that our freedom in Christ must not become a source of scandal for others (cf. Rom 14:21).

Paul's example shows us that, led by the Spirit and within the communion of the church, Christians are called to live in a freedom which finds its highest expression in service to others.

Why isn't school choice a national issue?

Anti-religious bias still blocks educational choices

My father was a protégé of the first Mayor Richard Daley of Chicago. He took great pride in being one of the mayor's "foot soldiers" in the regular Democratic Party in the "city of big shoulders," as Carl Sandburg put it so well in poetic lyric. My dad liked that image, since it conjured up the idea of taking up in a very Catholic way other people's worries and helping them out.

In my dad's day, that's what politics was about — helping somebody get a break who truly needed one. And not surprising, in a city like Chicago, New York, Detroit or Cincinnati, it was frequently new immigrant families that needed help finding a job, a decent place to live, getting the kids into schools.

Immigrants of Irish, Polish, Italian and German descent often sought to enroll their children in Catholic schools. But Catholic schools were crowded then. In many Catholic schools today, the problem is less space than the affordability of parochial education.

It was inequitable to Dad that taxpayers could not direct a portion of their own tax monies for education to the schools of their choice. Indeed, it was not uncommon for Dad to hear from new immigrants that this had long been done in "the old country" — Europe.

But in the United States it was different. In the late-19th and early 20th century, an anti-immigrant wave swept the country, aided and abetted by Ohio Republican James Blaine, who thought he could get himself elected president by getting American citizens (mostly immigrants themselves only a generation or two earlier) to fear the new arrivals.

Blaine focused this dislike on Catholics, accusing them of being in league with a foreign pope and often running their own schools.

While Blaine's attempted amendment of the federal constitution failed, he was successful in getting some pretty mean wording added to 37 state constitutions: "(No) revenue ... shall ever be taken from the public treasury directly or indirectly in aid of any church, sect or religious denomination or in aid of any sectarian institution."

Dad's retired now in Florida, but at 86 he still follows politics closely. Recently an effort by the Florida Tax and Budget Commission caught Dad's attention.

The commission proposed to ask the people of Florida on the November ballot whether or not to get rid of Blaine's anti-Catholic language and substitute something more evenhanded: "Individuals or entities may not be barred from participating in public programs because of religion."

Faith & Precedent

DOUGLAS W.
KMEIC

The elegant simplicity and fairness of those few words would have permitted parents to get a voucher and send their children to the school of their choice: public, independent or religious.

However, the proposed measure awakened the state's public school teachers' union, which opposed it. Then, because of a bureaucratic technicality, the Florida Supreme Court justices decided to keep the proposal off the ballot.

Apparently the tax commission is the wrong entity to propose state constitutional amendments about state taxes. As the kids say, "whatever."

For now at least, the ghost of Jimmy Blaine stands again in the way of religious freedom.

Catholic Floridians and Catholics in every state where educational choice is blocked by the anti-religious bias of an earlier era ought to keep trying.

Years ago, the U.S. Supreme Court cleared away any lingering federal objection to school choice. Any state that doesn't follow suit will be employing an ethic that says "I've got mine, get your own."

That's not the Catholic way, and come to think of it, it shouldn't be the American way either.

CARDINAL DANIEL N. DINARDO OF GALVESTON-HOUSTON GREETS MASSGOERS SEPT. 28 AFTER CELEBRATING THE FIRST MASS ON GALVESTON ISLAND AFTER HURRICANE IKE HIT SEPT. 13. THE MASS WAS AT ST. PATRICK CHURCH, WHICH WAS IN RELATIVELY GOOD SHAPE ALTHOUGH THE RECTORY AND OLD SCHOOL BUILDING WERE BOTH COMPLETELY INUNDATED BY THE STORM SURGE. LAST CENTURY THE CHURCH WITHSTOOD THE GREAT STORM OF 1900.

Returning to life after Ike

Hope, faith in abundance at first Mass on Galveston Island since hurricane

CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

GALVESTON, Texas — An hour prior to Mass, Cardinal Daniel N. DiNardo of Galveston-Houston was walking around the grounds of St. Patrick Church, taking time to speak with those who showed up early for the first Mass on Galveston Island since it was battered by Hurricane Ike Sept. 13.

They all shared similar stories. Some had lost everything. Some had only lost their utilities and were still waiting.

Some were born on the island. Some weren't.

Regardless, they all shared in the hope that the historic island would recover as it has after previous storms, and they all shared the same faith — that Jesus Christ in the Eucharist would lift their spirits during these challenging times.

And like his predecessors — from Bishop Jean Marie Odin to retired Archbishop Joseph A. Fiorenza — Cardinal DiNardo was present to his flock when they needed him most, sharing a smile, a word of hope or just a simple pat on the back.

"I want the people of Galveston to know that faith is going to be pretty important for them as they begin all of their cleanup and rebuilding and we are here with them," Cardinal DiNardo said.

This Mass, celebrated Sept. 28, was followed by another Mass at Sacred Heart Church just down the street a few hours later. While the sanctuary of each church was useable, both parishes sustained heavy damage.

"St. Patrick is in relatively good shape. The big problem here is the air condition(ing) is gone," Cardinal DiNardo said.

"When you go inside, the church looks very fine. It was one of the reasons I decided to come here to St. Patrick," he said.

While St. Patrick and Sacred Heart churches were able to celebrate Mass, the rest of the churches on the island did not fare as well.

Cleaning crews meticulously scrubbed every inch of St. Mary's Cathedral Basilica, the mother church of the state of Texas, which was inundated with more than 5 feet of water.

Archdiocesan officials were finally able to reach St. Therese Church on Point Bolivar. The church, like most buildings on that part of the island, suffered catastrophic damage.

Regardless, Cardinal DiNardo preached a message of hope as crews from a disaster response company worked feverishly throughout the week to get St. Patrick Church ready for the Mass.

"They are working hard and we are working with them and we hope to have the buildings back up and running — including the schools here — as fast as possible," Cardinal DiNardo said.

The Mass at St. Patrick was concelebrated by a number of priests who currently serve the Catholic faithful on the island.

Franciscan Father John Bok, the pastor, was greeted by members of his flock happy to see a familiar face.

"I am grateful to be back. My heart was lifted up just from the experience, it was wonderful. I think we all needed it, to get back on the island a little bit of normalcy," Father Bok said.

"It helped us all to get back a little sense of what we are used to; the norm," he said.

While the church fared well during the storm — it had previously been lifted 5 feet after the great storm of 1900 — Father Bok lost his living quarters during Ike as a result of the storm surge. He is currently residing elsewhere.

Father Bok's living situation has given him insight on how many of his parishioners are feeling without a place to call home.

"One of the sad things is that it has been difficult to keep track of people because we dispersed all over the place. I don't know where many of our parishioners were; they probably didn't know where I was until today," Father Bok said.

"That is another thing that is wonderful about being able to make these connections again. To see some of the people whom we may have not known how they are, where they have been," he said.

After the Mass, Cardinal DiNardo spent a half-hour shaking hands and offering words of hope to the standing-room-only crowd who attended the Mass.

And as Galvestonians gathered after Mass, neighbors shared hugs and stories. The favorite question was, "Do you have lights?" This was the first time many had seen each other since Ike.

"Faith" and "hope" were two words being repeated, like the new mantra of those who are going to rebuild their lives on Galveston Island.

"I'm almost 73 years old, I have lived a long time. I've learned, even in the midst of our valleys, what Psalm 23 said, 'The Lord is our shepherd,' and in the darkest valleys, he is there with us," Father Bok said.

"And people who have faith, like these people here today, realize that God is with us, and God is going to get us through it," he said.

"It is a very difficult time of adversity for all of the people of Galveston. I am zeroing in on the Catholic community but my heart goes out to all the people in Galveston," Cardinal DiNardo said.

If everyone is "in solidarity with one another and we move step by step," he added, "we can build up again this great city" and its faith communities.

Mobile Mexican consulate helps immigrants, is target of protests

CONWAY, S.C. (CNS) — A visit by a mobile Mexican consulate to a Catholic church in Conway drew hundreds of people seeking immigration services but also sparked a protest by activists opposed to illegal immigration.

Members of the Horry County chapter of the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps and other local residents showed up to protest the consulate's visit because they said it helped Hispanics who were in the country illegally get fake identification.

Officials from the mobile consulate, based in Raleigh, N.C., said they were there to help Mexican nationals get valid cards called "matriculas" that could be used for travel or to prove identification in other situations.

Consulate staff set up their services at St. James Church Sept. 27, with large crowds of people gathering at the church throughout the day.

The group of 20 Minuteman held signs with anti-immigration slogans and some that criticized the Catholic Church and St. James Church for allowing the consulate's visit.

Michael Visnjic, leader of the Horry County Minuteman chapter, refused to be interviewed by The Catholic Miscellany, newspaper of the Charleston Diocese, because he said he had disagreements with the Catholic Church over its treatment of illegal immigrants and other issues.

Other protesters refused to give their names, and some said it was because they feared reprisals from pro-Mexican activists.

"I'm protesting the fact that the Mexican consulate is giving out fake IDs," said Ted Sejda, a Vietnam veteran. "These people are using these IDs to get bank accounts and other things illegally. Illegals are overrunning the country."

The mobile Mexican consulate's workers were in Conway to provide photo ID cards, said Rosa Curto, a Raleigh-based Mexican consul who serves North and South Carolina.

To get the "matriculas," people had to provide original documents such as birth certificates which were checked against a database of Mexican records, she said.

"Every year we schedule our visits in areas where there is a large Mexican community," Curto said. "People can use these cards to prove their nationality. They have an official ID they can show to authorities and use to do things like cash a check."

Father Rick LaBrecque, pastor of St. James Church, invited the mobile consulate to visit. The church serves a large Hispanic community in Conway and at its nearby mission church.

"We knew it would be a real service to our community," he said. "This consulate provides people with a universally recognized ID. We mainly wanted to provide a service to our parishioners, but anyone who came for the services is welcome."

The Minuteman Civil Defense Corps is a volunteer organization with state chapters around the country. Members provide local law enforcement agencies with what they say is evidence of violations of U.S. immigration law.

Too early to see effects of financial crisis on faith lives, some say

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Although spiritual directors are not seeing much effect on their work from the nationwide economic crisis thus far, many predict that financial burdens facing the people they counsel will eventually affect their spiritual lives as well.

That was the consensus from Catholic News Service interviews with Catholic spiritual directors chosen at random from the Web site of Spiritual Directors International.

"Right now I can't say that I've seen an increase" in concerns about the economic situation, said Sister Beatrice Ste. Marie, a School Sister of Notre Dame who serves as a spiritual director in the Diocese of Brooklyn, N.Y.

"But the insecurities prompted by the financial crisis raise a number of spiritual issues for people," she added. "I expect that I'm going to see and hear more of it."

Jesuit Father Kenneth Caufield of New York said, "I don't have many people who have been affected" because he provides spiritual direction primarily to men and women religious. "I get it indirectly, in their concern for their families," he said.

Sister Iris Ann Ledden, a School Sister of Notre Dame, provides spiritual direction individuals in the Lexington, Ky., area. "None of them has really brought up that this is affecting" their faith lives, she said. "It's a little too early. But down the line I may begin to see it in a different light."

But Sister Ledden has seen some changes in the lives of those with whom she works. "One directee had retired, but now is going to have to go back to work," she said.

Another told Sister Ledden she is now going to have to make appointments with her in conjunction with other activities she has scheduled, in order to save on gas costs.

"They're all beginning to feel the pinch," she said.

Vatican official urges governments to rid world of nuclear weapons

VATICANCITY(CNS)—Humanity deserves to live in a world that is free from nuclear weapons, a Vatican official told the United Nations’ nuclear watchdog agency.

Archbishop Dominique Mamberti, the Vatican’s chief foreign affairs official, said the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons Treaty, which aims to limit the spread of nuclear weapons, is “an important element for further development of nuclear energy applications for peaceful purposes” and “it must not be weakened.”

“Humanity deserves no less than the full cooperation of all states on this important matter,” he said.

Nearly 200 countries have agreed to the treaty, including the U.S., U.K., Russia and China.

The archbishop spoke Sept. 29 during the 52nd International Atomic Energy Agency General Conference, held in Vienna, Austria, Sept. 29-Oct. 4.

Prenatal Diagnosis Oct. 24, 9 a.m.–3 p.m. at the diocesan Pastoral Center, 1123 S. Church St. The purpose of this conference is to help the Catholic community better encourage parents to carry to term after a poor prenatal diagnosis. Registration is required. For information, contact Tracy Winsor at (704) 543-4780 or e-mail at ohboys@carolina.rr.com.

CHARLOTTE — St. Peter Catholic Church, 507 S. Tryon Street, hosts “Learning and Voting the Common Good,” a presentation by Father James Hug, in Biss Hall (beneath the church) Oct. 25, 9–11 a.m., with refreshments served at 8:30 a.m. Father Hug is executive director for the Washington, D.C.-based Center of Concern, a Catholic organization working in collaboration with ecumenical and interfaith networks to bring a prophetic voice for social and economic justice to a global context. This event is free and open to the public. For more information, contact Barbara Dellinger at (704) 807-6125.

MINT HILL — A public square rosary will be held in honor of the 150th anniversary of Our Lady of Lourdes and the Miracle of the Sun in Fatima, Oct. 11 at noon at The Park on Fairview, 8850 Fairview Rd. This rosary is in conjunction with 3,000 others nationwide and is coordinated by The American Society for the Defense of Tradition, Family and Property and its America Needs Fatima campaign. GREENSBORO VICARIATE

GREENSBORO — To honor the 35-year anniversary of the St. Joseph Intercessory Prayer Group, a celebration will be held in the Kloster Center at St. Pious X Church, 2210 N. Elm St., Oct. 13, 7:30 p.m. Speakers will be Father James Stuhrenberg, parochial vicar of Our Lady of Grace Church, and Hannah Hammer, parishioner of St. Pious X Church. Music will be provided by Freeway. Light refreshments will be served. For more information, call Pat Condon at (336) 288-6093.

GREENSBORO — The parish health ministry and flames of fire prayer group will sponsor a charismatic healing Mass at Our Lady of Grace Church, 2205 West Market St., Oct. 18, 1-3 p.m. The celebrant for the Mass will be Father Fidel Melo, pastor. Music will be provided by Freeway. Richard Collins, parishioner of Our Lady of Grace Church, will be speaking about the Holy Spirit in our daily lives. Healing teams will be available for personal ministry after the Mass. For more information, contact Ben D’Apollo at (336) 812-3730.

Archbishop Mamberti said the Vatican urges government authorities to “resume with greater determination a progressive and mutually agreed dismantling of existing nuclear weapons.”

“Global security must not rely on nuclear weapons” and to that end governments must work together to support and enact the Comprehensive Nuclear Test-Ban Treaty, he said.

The treaty would ban nuclear explosions for military or civilian purposes. More than 40 countries must ratify the treaty for it to be enacted. The U.S., China, India, Pakistan, Israel and North Korea have not yet ratified the treaty.

He said the Vatican is convinced the ratification and enforcement of this treaty would represent “a great leap forward for the future of humanity, as well as for the protection of the earth and environment entrusted to our care by the Creator.”

GREENSBORO — A presentation on “The Catholic Church’s Case for Comprehensive Immigration Reform” will take place in the Parish Life Center at St. Paul the Apostle Church, 2715 Horse Pen Creek, Oct. 20, 7 p.m. Antonio Cube, national director of the U.S. bishops’ Justice for Immigrants Campaign, will present. Pope urges church to help couples see beauty of natural procreation

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The church must find ways to help Catholic couples see the beauty of respecting the true design of procreation and avoid artificial reproduction and contraception, Pope Benedict XVI said.

Pope Benedict asked why is it that the world and many Catholics still have a difficult time understanding the church’s teachings 40 years after Pope Paul VI’s encyclical on human life and birth control.

The encyclical, “Humanae Vitae” (“Of Human Life”), “illustrates and defends the beauty of conjugal love” while respecting the divine laws of nature, he said in a written message addressed Oct. 3 to participants of an international congress dedicated to the encyclical.

The Oct. 3-4 congress in Rome was sponsored by Rome’s Catholic University of the Sacred Heart and the John Paul II Institute for Studies on Marriage and the Family. Pope Benedict said technical responses to “the great human questions” such as life and death often seem to offer the easier solution.

“But in reality (a technical solution such as artificial contraception) obscures the underlying question concerning the meaning of human sexuality” and the need for couples to exercise “responsible control” over their sexual desires so that the expression of those desires may become expressions of self-giving, “personal love,” he said.

When talking about love between two people, technical responses cannot replace “a maturation of freedom,” the pope said.

Reason is not enough for understanding the true meaning of conjugal love, he said, as “the eyes of the heart” also are needed to grasp the demands of true love and “embrace the totality of the human being.”

The church, in its teachings and pastoral programs concerning marriage and the family, “must know how to guide couples to understand with their hearts the wonderful plan God has inscribed in the human body.”

Pope Benedict also praised and encouraged the work of Catholic research institutes for their efforts in helping couples overcome infertility through natural methods that fully safeguard the dignity of human procreation.

“The possibility of procreating a new human life is included in the full giving” of husband and wife, he wrote.

By creating life, the expression of conjugal love not only “resembles, but takes part in the love of God who wants to express himself by calling people” to be open to life, he said.

Excluding the possibility of bringing new life into the world denies “the intimate truth of nuptial love,” he said.

Scholars look at morality in the Bible

top Catholic scholars.

The various books of the Bible were written in different epochs, in different cultures and by different authors, the scholars said, so when looking for moral precepts, a Christian cannot focus on just one line.

In their new document, "The Bible and Morality," the scholars on the Pontifical Biblical Commission said biblical morality is not so much a set of dos and don'ts as it is a set of principles meant to help Christians grow in perfection and contribute to establishing God's kingdom on earth.

The English translation of the document rolled off the Vatican printing press Sept. 24, less than two weeks before the opening of the world Synod of Bishops on the Bible.

In the 235-page booklet, the biblical scholars presented two main criteria for judging human actions or potential actions: Does it protect and promote the dignity of the human person? Does it conform to something Jesus would do?

With those two criteria in mind, and taking into account the fact that some biblical precepts are repeated so often that their ongoing validity cannot be denied, the scholars addressed only a very few specific moral questions.

Acknowledging a development in morality throughout the Old Testament and culminating with the teaching of Jesus, they said the Bible: clearly insists on protecting human life from conception to natural death; defends marriage as the lifelong union of a man and a woman; obliges human beings to safeguard the environment; and insists that priority be given to the needs of the poor, the weak and the sick when making decisions.

Commanding values

The scholars opened their document with a reprint of the Ten Commandments and the beatitudes from the Gospel of Matthew's account of the Sermon on the Mount.

The biblical idea of morality is more than "a code of behavior to be adopted or avoided" or "a list of virtues and vices to be practiced or countered" in order to protect individuals and society, they said.

For Christians, living according to biblical morality is a spiritual quest, the document said, and striving to act in a morally upright manner is a response to God's gift of love and his willingness always to forgive.

The Ten Commandments are not the harsh part of a carrot-and-stick approach God takes to dealing with humanity, but contain the principles necessary so that each person and all people together can deal responsibly with the freedoms God has given them, the scholars said.

The commandments promote the values of paying homage to God, recognizing his presence in the world, recognizing that time has a sacred value, honoring the family, upholding the right to life, safeguarding marriage, defending human freedom and dignity, protecting people's reputations, respecting their family and group ties and respecting personal property.

The scholars said the commandments "are presented in decreasing order of value, from the most to the least important," with God at the top and material goods at the bottom.

Unfortunately, they said, modern societies often seem to assign value in the completely opposite way, not just putting human beings before God, but putting material goods before people.

In his life and in the Sermon on the Mount, they said, Jesus literally radicalized the values promoted by the Ten Commandments, urging his listeners to strive toward perfection in truly being an image of God in the world.

For the scholars, that striving is a key point of biblical morality: Just as God revealed himself and his plan for salvation over time, the human response to God's gift is something that naturally occurs in stages and includes failures, forgiveness and starting again.

The Eucharist is both nourishment to strengthen believers and the renewal of Christ's total sacrifice, which reminds believers that they must never be content with divisions and moral failures, they said.

"Unless there is obstinate resistance on the part of individuals or the community, participation in the Eucharist will always be a strong call to conversion and the best means to give new vitality to the covenant, which renews the life and conduct of the church and, through the church, of the world," they said.

As some 250 bishops prepared to gather at the Vatican for the synod discussion on "The Word of God in the Life and Mission of the Church," the biblical commission document reminded readers that what the Bible reveals is not a specific moral code, but God himself.

What the Bible demonstrates, the scholars said, is that "God is not a dour creditor intent on putting his accounts in order, but a benevolent creator who restores human beings to their pristine conditions of being loved by him and mends the damage inflicted on the cosmos" by their errors.

Here's the word: Catholics must know Bible to know Jesus, say bishops

BY CINDI WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The Catholic Church wants people to know and love the word of God — the Bible — so that they will come to know and love the Word of God — Jesus Christ.

While the world Synod of Bishops is focusing on ways to educate Catholics in the importance of reading, understanding and praying with the Bible, several participants addressing the synod Oct. 6-7 insisted that people understand that for Christians the Word of God is Jesus.

"When asked what 'the word of God' is, many believers respond, 'the Bible.' The response is not wrong, but it is incomplete," said Italian Archbishop Salvatore Fisichella, rector of Rome's Pontifical Lateran University and president of the Pontifical Academy for Life.

Because the word of God is more than the Bible, he told the synod Oct. 7, Christianity is not so much a "religion of the book" as a "religion of the Word," who is Jesus.

Brazilian Bishop Filippo Santoro of Petropolis said it is through reading and hearing the written word that Christians can come into contact with Jesus, the Word made flesh.

Canadian Cardinal Marc Ouellet of Quebec, introducing the synod's work Oct. 6, said, "to begin, we must start from the mystery of a God who speaks, a God who is himself the Word and gives himself to be known by humanity in many ways."

Through creation, through his covenant with the Israelites, through the prophets and the Scriptures, God reveals himself, said the cardinal, the synod's recording secretary. God's revelation becomes complete in Jesus Christ.

The Bible contains the essential account of how God has spoken to humanity, he said.

"Thanks to the Bible, humanity knows it has been called by God; the Spirit helps humanity listen and welcome the word of God, thus becoming the 'ecclesia' (church), the community assembled by the Word," Cardinal Ouellet said.

Obama, McCain on immigration

the same page two years ago, as the 2008 election approaches, distinctions between the two candidates on the issue have become more pronounced.

Both candidates' policy statements on immigration contain many of the elements promoted by the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops in its election guide, "Forming Consciences for Faithful Citizenship."

But the ways in which Obama and McCain say they would approach their policy goals diverge, with McCain now taking an enforcement-first approach, while Obama continues to support addressing a wide range of problems at the same time.

"Faithful Citizenship" calls for a reform plan that includes "a temporary work program with worker protections and a path to permanent residency; family reunification policies; a broad and fair legalization program; access to legal protections, including due process and essential public programs; refuge for those fleeing persecution and exploitation; and policies to address the root causes of migration."

The 2006 McCain-Kennedy bill would have provided a path to legalization for many of the estimated 12 million immigrants who are in the country without proper documents, reformed the family immigration system and created a new temporary-worker program.

That bill and several subsequent versions crafted over the next year failed to get enough Republican support to come to a vote in the Senate. The House has held hearings on assorted immigration bills, but has not brought a wide-ranging bill to the floor.

The few bills that have come through Congress and made it into law in the last several years have all been focused on a border fence and enforcement measures.

As the presidential campaign progressed over the last year, McCain said he no longer would support his own bill because he has come to believe the U.S.-Mexican border must be secured against illegal entry before changes are made in law or policy.

The immigration plan on his campaign Web site says that only after border-state governors certify that "the borders are secure" would he work on other immigration issues.

Those later steps would include prosecuting "employers that continue to hire illegal immigrants," addressing labor demands for immigrant workers, and dealing with the backlogs in family immigration and the millions of undocumented immigrants already here.

Obama's immigration plan backs the multipronged approach referred to as comprehensive reform. While he also talks about better equipping border agents, he would at the same time seek a legalization program and make family immigration easier, according to his Web site.

Obama has said he would push for a comprehensive immigration reform bill in his first year in office.

Like Obama's plan, McCain's plan would require undocumented individuals to register, pay fines and back taxes, undergo background checks and wait for permanent legal status behind applicants who are applying for residency through the normal process.

McCain's proposal adds, "The program will also ensure that all undocumented aliens either leave or follow the path to legal residence." It does not elaborate on how that would work.

A key to McCain's shift in stated priorities on immigration lies in the "enforcement-first" emphasis of the GOP's base. The Republican Party's platform takes a more stern approach to immigration than McCain has. It devotes lengthy sections to "the rule of law" as the overriding principle for immigration policy, and says "we oppose amnesty."

It also says "the American people" have rejected the idea of mass legalization. It calls for completing the fence on the Mexican border, denying federal funds to "sanctuary" cities that don't actively seek information on immigration status and opposes allowing undocumented immigrants to have driver's licenses.

It also calls for a 2010 census that counts "every person legally abiding in the United States." That would be a reversal of Census Bureau policy and its concerted efforts in recent censuses to count every individual no matter his or her legal status.

Census data is used to allocate funding for schools, police and emergency services and other programs provided without regard to legal residency status.

The Democratic Party platform calls for comprehensive immigration reform in language that closely mirrors Obama's position paper.

Kevin Appleby, director of migration and refugee policy for the USCCB, said he believes that as president either McCain or Obama would "engage the issue."

Although Obama has seemed more inclined than McCain to push for a comprehensive immigration bill quickly, "we'll be able to work with either one of them," Appleby said. "When all is said and done, by the third year of the new administration, either one of them will fully engage the issue."

Immigration has not been much of a factor in the campaigning of either candidate — at least not in English. In Spanish-language media Obama and McCain have waged a battle of advertising and press releases.

The New York Times Sept. 19 took both candidates to task for lying about each other in Spanish-language advertisements on immigration.

It called one ad by McCain accusing Obama of helping kill last year's comprehensive reform bill "a jaw-dropping distortion."

The Times editorial said Obama's retaliatory ad "was just as fraudulent." It said the ad "slimed Mr. McCain as a friend and full-bore ally of restrictionists like Rush Limbaugh, even though Mr. Limbaugh has long attacked Mr. McCain's moderation."

The editorial noted that "immigration was broken long before the candidates started this repugnant ad war, and looks as if it will stay that way for at least the duration of this campaign."

Speakers inform and inspire

"I want people to get a sense of the implications of the Eucharist," said Cardinal Foley in an interview with The Catholic News & Herald.

Eucharistic congresses are important because they "give us an opportunity to celebrate our faith together and give witness of our belief to others," he said.

In keeping with the theme of this year's Eucharistic Congress, "It Is Christ Whom We Proclaim," Cardinal Foley encouraged the audience to imitate St. Paul by sharing faith with gratitude, with pride and with love.

"As Catholics I think we are sometimes too shy about sharing our faith with others," said Cardinal Foley.

"Faith is the only thing that increases as we give it away," he said. "Why don't we attempt to share that with others?"

The homilist during the holy hour and Benediction on Saturday morning, Oct. 4, was retired Archbishop John F. Donoghue, second bishop of Charlotte.

Archbishop Donoghue talked about the human reality of hunger and "the need for substance that amasses from the depth of our being."

"The food that nourishes our soul is Jesus Christ," said Archbishop Donoghue. "We are here to do this in his memory and bring to the Lord every good thing that we are as people and as church."

The archbishop spoke about the diversity of our church as represented by the attendees at this year's Eucharistic Congress. "Our roles, talents and our gifts are as countless as the stars in the sky," said Archbishop Donoghue.

"Throughout this day we are here to share our gifts and to help one another," he said. "Culture, language, age difference and prayer style will not divide us, but instead draw us together, giving us a better sense of who we are and how Christ lives in each of us."

The first speaker for the general session was Father Richard Ho Lung, founder of the Missionaries of the Poor, an international monastic order of brothers dedicated to service of the poor.

The title of Father Ho Lung's talk was "Servant of the Poor" and focused on the Eucharist and the transformation of human love into divine love.

"The Lord is calling us to love the poor, the stranger, the prisoner, the discarded and the forgotten," said Father Ho Lung, "to love our enemy and do good to those who hate us. It is a type of living and loving which transforms the world."

Father Ho Lung's presentation featured a musical performance by six members of the group "Father Ho Lung and Friends," made up of Jamaican artists performing songs written by Father Ho Lung.

When asked about the importance of music in his ministry, Father Ho Lung said, "It is a natural expression of who I am and the joys in my heart."

The next speaker for the general track was Tarek Saab, who appeared on NBC TV's "The Apprentice."

During his delivery, entitled "Faith Gut Check," Saab stressed the importance of living with the afterlife in mind. "There is a spiritual warfare ablaze in our society," said Saab. "Losing one's life is nothing compared to losing one's soul."

Saab shared a similar message when he talked to the high school-age audience. "We are a country of addicts," he said. "We're addicted to so many things that we seemingly can't live without. They take time away from our faith and distort our view of society."

In terms of what he wanted audience members to take away from his talk, Saab said, "My greatest hope is that people will shift their priorities."

"Power isn't having the world at your fingertips," he said. "Power is having the world at your fingertips and being able to give it up."

Following Saab was a presentation by architectural historian Denis McNamara, assistant director and faculty member of the Liturgical Institute at the University of St. Mary of the Lake and Mundelein Seminary in Mundelein, Ill.

In his lecture, "Proclaiming Christ in Sacred Art and Architecture," McNamara said he wanted people to "come away with an understanding that church architecture and theology work hand in hand."

"On earth we try to use material of earth to reveal what heaven is like," said McNamara. "We're getting ready for heaven by experiencing the glory of heaven now."

For McNamara, the study of sacred architecture has "been the vehicle that God has chosen for me to find my path to salvation."

But you don't have to be an architectural historian to reap the spiritual benefits of sacred art and architecture.

McNamara suggests reading the Book of Revelation, particularly chapters four and 20, for inspiration.

"In Revelation, St. John is taken on a tour of heaven by an angel. If you make your church look like that, and your liturgy sound like that," McNamara said, "then you have a very good start."

Dominican Sister Terese Auer was the final speaker for the general session.

Sister Auer is the chair of the bioethics department at Pope John Paul the Great Catholic High School in Dumfries, Va.

In her address, "Proclaiming Christ through Our Reverence for the Human Person," Sister Auer spoke about the dignity of the human person and how that is related to being in the image of God.

"Bioethics is the study of how we can use the life sciences and medicine in an ethical way," Sister Auer told the audience. "The criterion for any ethical issue is to focus on the human person."

She stressed the importance of this curriculum being incorporated into the science departments in our schools because she said "we want young people to be able to handle the bioethical issues of our time."

"In a society where science reigns supreme, we need an ethical balance so that science serves the person" as opposed to dominating the person, she said.

In terms of how bioethics ties into the moral responsibility of Catholics in today's world, Sister Auer said, "It is a hand and glove fit."

Speakers for the Hispanic track included Roberto Ramirez, a member of the Community of the Servants of Christ, who offered testimony of his conversion experience that called him to make radical changes in his life; Lupita Venegas, a family therapist and international speaker on human development; and Sister Bertha Lopez Chavez, a pro-life coordinator in Mexico, founding member of The City of Joy Foundation in Mexico and a director of PAIPID, a Catholic rehabilitation center providing care and counseling for people with HIV and AIDS and their families.

Thousands gather for Eucharistic Congress

St. Paul's Letter to the Colossians, as the congress occurred during the Pauline year convoked by Pope Benedict XVI to honor the 2,000th anniversary of the saint's birth.

"The Eucharistic Congress is an opportunity for the entire diocese to come together each year to celebrate our faith and our love for the eucharistic Lord," said Bishop Jugis in a June letter to parishioners about the congress.

"The Eucharist brings us together as one body in Christ. It is the source and the summit of our Christian life, as well as the heart of our Christian life," he said.

Knights of Columbus color guard and first communicants from around the diocese led the procession, followed by deacons and priests of the diocese and guest clergy, including retired Archbishop John F. Donoghue, second bishop of Charlotte.

Following Bishop Jugis in the procession were representatives of many of the 92 parishes and missions in the diocese, as well as religious ministries, lay ministries and cultural groups. Hundreds of people watching the procession along the city streets knelt reverently as the Eucharist passed by, and many of them joined the procession behind their parish banners.

"This shows that our faith is alive and well," said Joseph Barrett, a parishioner of St. Dorothy Church in Lincolnton. "For Catholics and non-Catholics, this is a good witness for our faith."

"It's great to see people from all over the diocese," said Grace Narus, a parishioner of St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte.

"It's growing each year because the church is growing bigger and better," she said.

The procession made its way into the convention center, where a holy hour followed with eucharistic adoration, prayer and song. Archbishop Donoghue delivered the homily during the holy hour.

Spirit-filled song

Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin of Charlotte opened the congress with a greeting Friday evening, Oct. 3, followed by a concert of sacred choral music.

The choir, comprised of approximately 110 singers from 14 churches around the Diocese of Charlotte, performed a collection of songs that represented the seasons of the liturgical year and various time periods in the history of the Catholic Church.

"We really did try to span all variables of music history," said Tiffany Gallozzi, concert conductor and music director at St. Barnabas Church in Arden.

Following the concert, Cardinal John P. Foley spoke about the importance of eucharistic congresses.

Cardinal Foley, the grand master of the Equestrian Order of the Holy Sepulcher of Jerusalem, talked about his experiences at the 1976 eucharistic congress in Philadelphia, one of two international eucharistic congresses held in the United States.

Afterward Cardinal Foley's talk, eucharistic adoration took place throughout the night at St. Peter Church, with a number of groups — including clergy, religious, young adults and families — each spending an hour before the Blessed Sacrament.

Conveying the Word

More music and speakers were featured throughout Saturday's program.

A choir from Charlotte Catholic High School entertained the crowd, as did Father Richard Ho Lung, founder of the Missionaries of the Poor. He spoke and performed with singers and musicians from Jamaica, while another lively band entertained the thousands of people attending the Hispanic portion of the congress. The talks in English and Spanish featured a variety of topics by several diverse speakers, including a reality TV star and a bioethicist.

Tarek Saab, a Maronite Catholic who appeared in 2005 on NBC's "The Apprentice," spoke to both teenagers and the general audience about living their faith. Denis McNamara, an architectural historian, presented the importance of sacred art and architecture.

Dominican Sister Terese Auer, chair of the bioethics department at Pope John Paul the Great Catholic High School in Virginia, discussed the importance of protecting human dignity.

Speakers at the Hispanic track included Roberto Ramirez, an active member of the Servants of the Living Christ, a community of lay people; Lupita Venegas, a family therapist and international speaker; and Sister Bertha Lopez Chavez, a pro-life coordinator in Mexico.

In addition to a large vendor area and cultural hours — where members of the African-American, Korean, Filipino and Vietnamese Catholic communities shared their cultures and traditions — there was a series of talks for middle- and high-school students and children.

Congress participants spent time in eucharistic adoration and hundreds received the sacrament of reconciliation offered in both English and Spanish.

Bishop Jugis has announced plans for a fifth Eucharistic Congress to be held at the Charlotte Convention Center Sept. 25-26, 2009.

St. Matthew "YOU"niversity presents – From the Pope to St. Paul to our Priests – and now to YOU!

Pope Benedict XVI had three reasons for proclaiming 2008-2009 the year of St. Paul. He hopes to encourage a scholarly study of the Pauline corpus. He hopes this will lead to an increase of daily study of Paul, deep spiritual reflection on his life and writings, and an explosion of desire on the part of all of us to pattern ourselves after Paul, as Paul patterned himself after the Lord.

In union with our Pope, in communion with our Church, the priests of St. Matthew offer these lectures as part of St. Matthew "YOU"niversity adult enrichment.

More than 100,000 expectant couples each year receive the devastating news of a poor prenatal diagnosis (PPD). It may be the detection of a fetal heart defect, kidneys that are too small for gestation, or evidence of spina bifida or Down Syndrome, but whatever the specifics, shocked and broken-hearted parents have lost the baby and the pregnancy they had anticipated. With little or no information or resources available that support the option of carrying to term, 80% of these pregnancies end in abortion.

Reflecting and proclaiming

Participants contemplate theme of Eucharistic Congress

BY DEACON GERALD POTKAY
CORRESPONDENT

CHARLOTTE — Thousands of Catholics from around the Diocese of Charlotte converged for the diocese's fourth annual Eucharistic Congress.

The event, this year themed "It Is Christ Whom We Proclaim," was held at the Charlotte Convention Center Oct. 3-4.

The theme was taken from St. Paul's Letter to the Corinthians, as the congress occurred during the Pauline year convoked by Pope Benedict XVI to honor the 2,000th anniversary of the saint's birth.

"St. Paul's sole passion was to proclaim Christ," said Bishop Peter J. Jugis in a June letter to parishioners announcing the congress theme.

"In our Eucharistic Congress, it is Christ whom we proclaim in our eucharistic procession through the streets of Charlotte, in our holy hour of exposition of the Blessed Sacrament, in the celebration of the Mass, in the talks by our speakers and in our sacred music concert," said Bishop Jugis.

"The entire Eucharistic Congress from beginning to end is a proclamation of Christ," said the bishop. "The theme we have chosen, therefore, not only honors St. Paul and his apostolic mission, but also appropriately expresses the spirit of the Eucharistic Congress — to proclaim Christ."

Throughout the two-day event, participants reflected on the theme and what it means to them.

"I proclaim Jesus as King by going to church, praying and believing in him," said teenager Jairo Riascos, a parishioner of Our Lady of Lourdes Church in Monroe. "I know that he (the eucharistic Jesus) exists for real and I proclaim him as my Savior by my actions, which include following the commandments and receiving the sacraments."

"By proclaiming Christ in our lives, we must give of ourselves to his life as we follow the Bible and love one another," said Nguyen Van De of St. Joseph Church in Charlotte. "We must give ourselves completely to Jesus and pray for his forgiveness as we join him along his way. This will bring us to eternal life."

By proclaiming Christ, we speak the "good news" across the entire world, said Peter Shaw, a seminarian for the Diocese of Charlotte.

To paraphrase "the words of St. Francis, we must go out into the world and proclaim the Gospel and, when necessary, we should even use words," said Shaw.

"We must proclaim Christ as Lord and Savior because he commanded us to," said Deacon Andy Cilone of Immaculate Conception Church in Forest City. "He is the Good News. He is the answer to our worldly strife. We accomplish this by living like him and imitating him in all things — all the way to picking up our own crosses and following him."

Archbishop calls Catholics to fight for 'soul of public square'

REVIEWED BY DAVID GIBSON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

"God did not put us here to sit out the struggle for the soul of the public square," Archbishop Charles J. Chaput of Denver writes in "Render Unto Caesar."

If one needed to sum up the book's principal intent in just 18 words, that sentence might well suffice.

Archbishop Chaput wants Catholics in today's America to nourish their nation's greatest ideals with "courage, honesty and active political engagement," and without leaving their faith on the sidelines of the public square.

He carefully explores how faith and political life interrelate — what their relationship should and should not be.

I suspect many will feel after reading this book that they've gotten to know Archbishop Chaput in a new way, particularly if in the past they knew him largely through brief quotations in news reports on occasions when he weighed in publicly on the church and politics. This is, indeed, a book of strongly held convictions, strongly presented.

Still, more than a few Catholics — whether right-leaning or left-leaning on political or ecclesial issues — may find themselves challenged by the archbishop's restraint and balance here on several sensitive matters.

What does Archbishop Chaput oppose and favor in "Render Unto Caesar"? In his vision, Catholics never would remain silent or complacent when faced with abuses of human dignity and violations of the natural law in the public realm.

Neutrality is decidedly not what Archbishop Chaput wants Catholics to express in public debate, nor does he want Catholics reduced by contested issues to a cowardly posture. The archbishop wants Catholics to shape their activities in the public square according to their beliefs.

If America "has changed from the land of opportunity to the land of private appetites over the last few decades," one reason is that "we haven't lived what we say we believe," he says, adding, "Homelessness, poverty, abortion, the exploitation of undocumented immigrants, the neglect of the elderly — these are brazenly real problems in contemporary America."

"They won't go away by ... kicking religion out of the public discussion."

For its survival, American democracy "depends on people of character fighting for their beliefs in the public square — legally, ethically and nonviolently, but forcefully and without apology," says Archbishop Chaput.

The 12 chapters of "Render Unto Caesar" afford Archbishop Chaput the opportunity to examine several issues now considered basic in discussions of the church and politics: abortion; the Catholic voter; whether to refuse holy Communion to some Catholic politicians; conscience; the separation of church and state; the natural law; bishops' roles; and major statements in the recent history of these discussions.

"Elected leaders," he says, "must make laws that reflect a well-formed conscience. When such laws are not produced, those same leaders must press to change them."

Furthermore, he insists, Catholics need to look much more self-critically at themselves as believers and at their "wholesale assimilation — 'absorption' might be a better word" — by America's culture.

It is quite natural for a book on Catholics and political life to turn some attention to church teaching on the relationship of the church and the modern world, a relationship that has preoccupied the entire church in a unique, ongoing way ever since the Second Vatican Council.

This relationship is addressed in a special way in Chapters 6 and 7 of "Render Unto Caesar" — key chapters for me.

In the council's Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, readers can see "a generous desire to positively engage the modern world," Archbishop Chaput says.

He points in a positive manner to church efforts to establish solidarity with the world's people and learn from the good things of this world.

At the same time, driving home his theme, he says Vatican II did not welcome "the extremes to which free societies tend," and he rejects any conclusion "that religion has nothing to say to the public square."

Chapter 7 concludes with this judgment: "Too many of us have become 'evangelizers' in the most ironic sense of the word: preaching the world to a church we claim to love, but which we no longer really understand."

God's compassion is infinite as universe

BY JEFF HENSLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

When I was a young man and had wandered away from God, one of the things that led me back to faith was my wonder at the enormity of creation.

My wife and I were in VISTA, a sort of domestic Peace Corps. We worked a half day in the local schools and with poor people in the rural Arkansas foothills the rest of the day.

We didn't do any harm and did a bit of good. I like to say it was the best money the federal government ever spent, because my wife has worked with poor kids ever since those days in 1971.

Living out in the country afforded me the luxury of taking my landlord's redwood picnic bench out onto the gravel drive in front of our tiny frame house evenings to lay down, lean back and take in more stars than I had ever seen before.

The thought of tiny me, gazing up at what God had created, opened up my heart to be in utter awe that the one who had created all this had also created me. And because I'd been raised a Christian, I had a sense that despite his own incredible complexity, power and scale, he loved little, truly insignificant me.

Now the road to conversion only begins in such places. My wife and I began going to the little Catholic church up the road. We found fellowship and had religious dialogue with some of the other VISTA volunteers. I read the Bible a lot.

When we moved back to Fort Worth, we began sporadically attending our neighborhood Catholic church. In time, we committed to attending regularly, believing we would get back only as much as we gave, and without committing ourselves, that wouldn't amount to very much.

Our faith lives just kept on growing from that point, and we've never looked back or regretted making those commitments, responding to the love of a God large enough to create the universe, but humble enough to become one of us.

The Scriptures for this weekend speak of the greatness of God. Psalm 96 says: "For great is the Lord and highly to be praised; awesome is he, beyond all gods. For all the gods of the nations are things of naught, but the Lord made the heavens." I couldn't agree more.

Questions:

How does the complexity and beauty of the universe affect you and your faith life? How does God's compassion toward you make you feel?

Local deacon works to 'fireproof' marriages

GASTONIA—A deacon in Gastonia is helping to "fireproof" the sanctity of marriage in his community.

Deacon Jack Weisenhorn of St. Michael the Archangel Church in Gastonia was instrumental in bringing together married couples and firefighters for a screening of the movie "Fireproof."

The film stars Kirk Cameron as a small-town fireman who, under the guidance of his born-again father, works to save his seven-year marriage, despite the unyielding obstinacy of his wife.

The message — that a successful marriage is grounded in the knowledge that God loves us with all our faults — is the overriding virtue of the heartwarming, evangelical-flavored film, according to a review by Harry Forbes, director of the U.S. bishops' Office for Film & Broadcasting.

Deacon Weisenhorn is a founder and board member of First Things First of Gaston County, a nonprofit organization working to reduce the number of divorces in the county through pre-marriage education and ongoing marriage enrichment programs.

After the deacon and his wife, Rosemarie, attended an advance screening of the movie in Charlotte in July, they wanted to share its message with as many people as possible. Upon discussing ideas with Father Roger Arnsparger, pastor of St. Michael Church, they decided to buy out a showing of the movie after its opening Sept. 26 and promote it in the community.

Because firefighters are featured prominently, Deacon Weisenhorn wanted to extend invitations to local firefighters. After a meeting with Gastonia Fire Chief Kenneth Lay, the church arranged for 90 tickets to be given to Gastonia-area firefighters.

Bishops' document on election goes high tech in podcast, video format

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Ask Catholic teenagers if they've read a recent document by the U.S. bishops and you might get a blank look.

But ask if they've heard of the bishops' statement "Forming Consciences for Faithful Citizenship: A Call to Political Responsibility," either through a podcast, a video quiz on YouTube or its page on the social networking site Facebook, and you might get a nod of recognition.

That's what the U.S. bishops are hoping anyway.

"Faithful Citizenship," the document that urges Catholic voters to form their consciences around a variety of social concerns based on Catholic social teaching, is not something new.

The bishops initially published the document in 1975 and produce a new version of it about every four years to coincide with the national elections.

The document for the 2008 election was approved by the bishops in November 2007. But this time the document looks a lot younger. For starters, its Web site, www.faithfulcitizenship.org, has resources for youths and those who work with them.

The site is "tech savvy," according to Jill Rauh, youth and young adult coordinator for the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops' Department of Justice, Peace and Human Development.

"I think if the church is going to be effective at communicating the message of 'Faithful Citizenship,' and all its messages, it needs to do so in ways that are appealing to young people," Rauh said.

She said getting youths to go beyond just reading the text or hearing about it is key to the new push behind the "Faithful Citizenship" quizzes, an iPod contest on the site and video clips.

The hope is that young people will not only get the document's message but talk about it, reflect on it and apply it to their lives.

The Web site suggests some formats for talking about "Faithful Citizenship," such as one called "Coffee Discussion," which includes a series of questions about social issues and Catholic teaching that friends could informally talk about over coffee.

And youth ministers and religious educators are not limited to just making handouts of the document. Instead they are given ideas for skits, murals, open-microphone nights and prayer services based on "Faithful Citizenship."

Rauh said the outreach to younger people is a recognition that they have "an important role to play in living out faith as leaders in the Catholic community. They are both the future and the present in our church."

And even if these Catholic youths are not old enough to vote, she said, they "still have a responsibility to be faithful citizens" — to be active in their communities and to challenge their leaders.

About this presentation...What principles form the basis of the U.S. Catholic Bishops' call for comprehensive immigration reform? How can the faith community help bring about a society that welcomes newcomers, especially people fleeing poverty and/or seeking reunion with family? As we seek immigration reform, can we concurrently reach the goals of fulfilling our faith's mandate to "welcome the stranger," maintaining our nation's security, and respecting the moral values and civil laws which guide our actions? These questions will be addressed during this presentation. For information on the "JFI Campaign" visit www.justiceforimmigrants.org.

Home is where the heart is

Exploring the difference between living and dwelling

"Where do you live?" is a not uncommon question; you hear it every day.

However, I recently heard an unusual answer to that question when a would-be wordsmith I know replied by saying, "I live wherever I am. I'm right here. I'm alive. Here is where I am, so this is where I live."

And then he added, "If you are asking me where I dwell, I'm happy to say that I dwell in Baltimore. I've dwelt there all my life."

Strange, isn't it, that "dwelling" carries something of a quaint connotation for most of us. Although it implies stability, it's rarely used as a meeting-of-the-coordinates, here-and-now specification of the place where you lay your head at night.

No, that's where you live.

There are many people who lived in Baltimore and moved. They live there no longer, but they are still alive. The same can be said of virtually any place or point on the map.

Those who live in a given place today may not be living there tomorrow, but they will still be alive; they will have simply changed dwellings.

So, "Where do you live?" is not an uncomplicated question.

You've heard many musings on what makes a house a home. You are aware of the distinction between a house and a household, a resident and a residence. (Keep on looking if you're on a college tour with your son or daughter and you visit a campus that calls its dormitories "resident halls.")

Well, the fellow who prefers to speak of where he dwells when asked where he lives also has a ready response whenever anyone inquires about his home.

"Home is where my heart is," he replies, "and my heart is now ...."

Circumstances will shape the completion of that reply, so will the identity of the questioner. Not everyone has a right, he says, to know where his heart is at a given moment, or to whom his heart belongs, what it values, to what it is committed.

"Home is where your heart is" is a beautifully compelling idea. If it triggers thoughts of places rather than persons, you have to wonder to what extent you are fully alive and engaged with other living beings.

Lingering regrets may try to direct you back to an earlier time, when you think about home, but that is not going to happen. You can't go back. You cannot up-end the hour glass or roll back the calendar.

Irreversible decisions may have separated you from persons and left you with memories of empty places that are now out of reach.

There's no way home — except through the heart.

Simple questions like, "Where are you from?" and "Where are you staying?" can open the door to reflection on your interior life and your most closely held values. Questions like that can be good for the soul.

Next time you hear someone call out, "Is anyone home?" remind yourself that home is where your heart is, and check to see who and what are there.

That's where you really live, isn't it?

All the difference in the world

Perinatal hospice option helps parents deal with poor prenatal diagnosis

Editor's note: This is part of a series on prenatal diagnosis.

Counting the number of babies "carried to term" may seem an unusual benchmark for success unless you are familiar with a new kind of "crisis pregnancy" impacting abortion rates in the United States.

The crisis results from the detection of fetal defects that are being diagnosed earlier in pregnancy due to advances in prenatal screening technologies.

Sadly, early diagnosis does not necessarily offer parents the hope of treatment. Instead the focus shifts from the baby — for whom there may be no cure — to a clinical perspective that views the pregnancy as the condition requiring intervention.

Abortion is then offered by medical providers who see little reason to continue a pregnancy when the prognosis is poor. In approximately 80 percent of these pregnancies, parents choose abortion.

This past summer in Greenville, S.C., a new program for pregnant parents celebrated its first year with an unexpected milestone.

"I thought we might see five babies carried to term," said Tammy Tate, CEO of Carolina Perinatal Support Network (CPSN). "Having ultimately served the families of six times that many is quite a surprise."

CPSN is one of a handful of perinatal hospice programs established to serve the 6,000-10,000 couples for whom abortion is not an option. As an obstetrics nurse, Tate was aware of the service gap that existed for these parents. Through practical guidance, education and compassionate support, CPSN provides ongoing assistance to parents from diagnosis to birth and beyond.

"We work to ease the emotional suffering experienced by parents while helping them make meaningful plans to honor the lives of their babies no matter the length of those lives," said Tate.

Perinatal hospice care is well-received by parents carrying to term who are suddenly burdened by a lack of information and support. This is particularly difficult as the experience of the diagnosis is isolating, and the decision not to abort may leave parents feeling alienated from the health care system.

Parents also note the profound grief resulting from the loss of the normal pregnancy and healthy baby they had anticipated, and the importance of being able to consider questions of baby care in advance while anticipating both the joy and grief of birth.

The benefit of perinatal hospice has also been recognized in the Catholic community. The National Catholic Bioethics Center noted in a 2004 statement that such services are a source of psychological support that can ease the emotional distress associated with the diagnosis of a fetal defect. In addition, the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops directed readers to an on-line hospice resource in a 2007 document addressing the issues of prenatal diagnosis and abortion.

Dr. Byron Calhoun, a maternal-fetal-medicine specialist, introduced the concept of perinatal hospice, believing the benefit of such programs extends beyond supporting just those who decide to carry to term on their own.

His experience has been that when offered a comprehensive program of support, parents will choose carrying to term over abortion. This is particularly true if the option of perinatal hospice is made clear at diagnosis when fear of suffering and sense of isolation may well color the decision to terminate.

In this way, perinatal hospice is providing a viable, pro-life alternative to abortion. Proof of that assertion lies in the difference between the five babies Tate expected and the 30 babies whose families ultimately received the supportive care of CPSN this year. In providing support to those for whom abortion was not an option, CPSN by its very existence asserted the sanctity of all human life, no matter how brief or how frail.

This year in Greenville, parents devastated by the news of a lethal prenatal diagnosis had an alternative to abortion, and for a couple dozen precious babies, that alternative made all the difference in the world.

What's not 'crystal clear' about candidate's views?

Nancy Frazier O'Brien's article ("Candidate's stands on life cover more than abortion," Oct. 3) stated that "neither presidential candidate is crystal clear and consistent on these (life) issues."

But Sen. Barack Obama has been very clear, stating he is pro-choice, would only recommend pro-choice candidates for Supreme Court nominations, has been a consistent champion of reproductive choice and would make preserving women's right under Roe v. Wade a priority as president.

He has criticized the Supreme Court decision that upheld a ban on partial-birth abortions, and recently proposed a new law that would wipe out state laws that have restricted abortions, such as parental notification.

I believe Sen. Obama has made his position crystal clear on the most important of life issues.

Pastors and politics

U.S. Catholic Church is under magnifying glass on tax-exempt status

Should pastors endorse political candidates from the pulpit? No.

Should church bodies endorse candidates in elections? No.

Should churches speak out about the moral content of social issues? Yes.

Does the government have the authority to withdraw the tax exemption of a church that gets directly involved in electoral politics by endorsing a candidate? Yes.

You would think the answers to these questions would be obvious, but every four years they come up again.

At the end of September, some evangelical pastors nationwide violated the Internal Revenue Code and made public endorsements of presidential candidates or parties.

They contended that the IRS regulations that forbid electioneering by tax-exempt organizations violate their constitutional right to free speech. Their "protest" was organized by a group called the Alliance Defense Fund (www.alliancedefensefund.org).

Some of the pastors endorsed Sen. John McCain. Similarly there have been pastors around the country who endorsed Sen. Barack Obama.

This question comes up nearly every presidential election cycle.

On one side, somebody challenges the right of religious groups to speak on social issues, seeking to muzzle the role of the churches in the formation of their members' consciences. The tax exemption is the chief weapon.

On the other side are churches that take an active role in politics. They invite candidates to speak from their pulpits. They distribute "issue" literature in an implicit endorsement of a candidate. They use tax-exempt property to influence elections.

None of this takes place in a vacuum. On both sides there are so-called "watchdog" groups that pretend to neutrality but actually seek to use the tax exemption to their advantage. As the largest church in the United States, the Catholic Church is particularly under the magnifying glass on this issue.

The evangelical pastors who made the protest at the end of September don't want to pay the price of their tax exemption. They have a right to their opinion but they do not have the right to ask the tax payers to subsidize their opinion.

The government gives tax exemptions to many groups because they contribute to the "commonweal." Years ago, Chief Justice John Marshall famously said that the "power to tax is the power to destroy." The tax exemption allows exempt groups to flourish.

Churches are not the only groups exempted. Perhaps the best-known provision of the Internal Revenue Code is the 501(c)(3).

People who know nothing of tax regulations know this section of the law, which states that, "to be tax-exempt ... an organization must be organized and operated exclusively for exempt purposes" that are "charitable, religious, educational, scientific," even literary, to name a few.

But freedom from taxation comes at the price of electoral "neutrality." If you want to "play" in electoral politics, you ought to "pay" on April 15. If you want the government to exempt you from taxation, you should not ask the government to subsidize your electioneering.

Hardly a week goes by that someone exiting Mass does not ask me about my personal views on some political candidate. Sometimes the person comes up with some provocative statement designed to get me to react.

As an Irishman, I have opinions, of course. If you want them, we can go have a beer and talk them over. But as a pastor, I cannot endorse any candidate.

In recent years, too many people have played "capture the cross" in electoral politics. Some pastors have even run for office. They try to give the impression that Christianity has chosen sides in elections, that God has a candidate.

As Catholics, we promote the common good. As Catholic priests, we seek to form consciences.

But as leaders of tax-exempt organizations, we leave the electioneering to others.

People need to learn about Jesus with their hearts, says pope

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — People need to learn about Jesus not as a historical figure but as "our brother, the Lord who is among us today," Pope Benedict XVI said.

Biographical details and a chronology of events give people a superficial idea of who someone is; "only with the heart does one finally truly know a person," the pope said Oct. 8 at his weekly general audience.

Jesus' life, teachings, his death and resurrection are important things to discover not as things of a distant past but as "a reality of the living Jesus," the pope told around 25,000 people gathered for his audience in St. Peter's Square.

The pope focused on St. Paul's knowledge of "the so-called historical Jesus" given that the saint never met Jesus during his earthly ministry.

He said St. Paul's understanding of Christ and his teachings came from the apostles and the early Christian community. St. Paul took this information to a new level by transposing Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom of God to what the kingdom meant after Jesus' death and resurrection.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

In our continuing catechesis on St. Paul, we now consider Paul's relationship to the so-called "historical" Jesus.

In a celebrated passage, Paul states that "even though we once knew Christ according to the flesh, we no longer know him in that way" (2 Cor 5:16). Here the Apostle does not claim that he knew Jesus during his earthly ministry, but rather that he once considered Jesus from a merely human standpoint.

Significantly, Paul's knowledge of Christ came from the preaching of the early church. Both his initial rejection of Jesus and — after his conversion on the road to Damascus — his preaching of the glorified Christ was based on the Gospel as proclaimed by the first Christian community.

In his Letters, Paul refers explicitly to the facts of Jesus' earthly life as well as to his teaching. His letters also reflect many central themes and images drawn from the preaching of Jesus.

Paul's teaching on the Jesus' identity as the Son of the Father, in whom we receive redemption and adoptive sonship, is clearly derived from the Lord's own experience and teaching.

In a word, Paul's knowledge of Jesus and his proclamation of the risen Lord as God's Son and our Savior, was grounded in the life and preaching of Jesus himself.

Reject fear of the unknown

Benefits of embracing beauty and trusting God

Dietrich Bonhoeffer (1906-1945), the Lutheran theologian and martyr who opposed the Nazi movement, wrote, "Nothing can make up for the absence of someone you love. ... The dearer and richer the memories, the more difficult the separation.

"But gratitude changes the pangs of memory into tranquil joy. The beauties of the past are borne, not as a thorn in the flesh, but as a precious gift."

Everyone goes through unbearable suffering of one kind or another. Many become disoriented, losing their bearings for while. If that ever happens to you, try to remember that you have a divine friend at your side. You are never alone.

The late Thomas Merton, a Trappist monk, wrote: "My Lord God, I have no idea where I am going. I do not see the road ahead of me. I cannot know for certain where it will end.

"Nor do I really know myself. The fact that I think I am following your will does not mean that I am actually doing so. I hope that I will never do anything apart from you. And I know that if I do, you will lead me by the right road.

"Though I may seem lost and in the shadow of death, I will not fear, for you are ever with me, and you will never leave me to face my perils alone."

Merton never mistook feelings of helplessness for actual hopelessness. He trusted God, even in the midst of confusion.

The Bible repeats "be not afraid" 365 times.

Jesus said, "Fear is useless; what you need is trust."

Whenever frightening thoughts cross your mind, reject them. Turn your mind toward the Lord, and count your blessings.

St. Francis de Sales tells us: "Do not fear what may happen tomorrow. The same loving Father who cares for you today will care for you tomorrow and everyday. Either he will shield you from suffering or he will give you unfailing strength to bear it.

"Be at peace then, and put aside all anxious thoughts and imaginings."

Reject fear of the unknown future. Even the elderly can change the pattern of negative thinking.

Bad habits can be confronted and uprooted with prayerful determination. Trust the Lord to do for you what you cannot yet do for yourself.

Eliminate anything that fosters fear. These thoughts are not from God. But if the upsetting thoughts continue, find a good doctor or therapist to guide you.

Spirituality for Today

FATHER JOHN CATOIR

Above all, trust in God's grace. The dark night of the soul is only temporary. One day the sun will come out and the snow will melt.

Also trust the past to God's mercy and the future to God providence. Look for God in the beauty of nature. Stay in the present moment, which is right before your eyes.

Wrote Thomas Kinkade: "Beauty enters your heart through all the senses, and beauty grows stronger when more than one of the senses is involved. ... Our joy can grow and flourish when fed a steady diet of beauty."

A sunset is God's way of saying "I love you." God awakens in you a desire to be one with him. Everything in nature awakens in us a hunger for God.

At a general audience in April of 2002, Pope John Paul II addressed the pilgrims with these words, "The need for God is a need that can be as physical as the need for food and water. Just as the arid land is dead until irrigated by rain, so the faithful yearn for God, in order to exist in joyful communion with him."

SEWING SAINTS

Maria Rioux and costume-maker Debra Fuhrman stand with children dressed as various saints Sept. 25. This year, Fuhrman will make and ship approximately 1,500 saint costumes before Oct. 24, her cutoff date for rush orders. Halloween is Oct. 31.

Seamstress's costumes of saints go marching out to customers

CUMMINGS, Kan. (CNS) — Debra Fuhrman is under the gun.

Barraged by orders arriving from Kansas, around the United States and even overseas, Fuhrman has been shipping out product as fast as she can. With All Saints Day just around the corner, you see, it's high time for the saints — or rather, their costumes — to go marching out.

Fuhrman runs a business in Cummings, population 580 or so, and as best as she can tell, it is the Catholic children's costume capital of the world.

That's quite an accomplishment for Fuhrman, a member of the First Christian Church of Atchison. Until just a few years ago, she didn't know the difference between St. Tarcisius and tartar sauce.

Fuhrman gives a lot of the credit for her success to her Catholic neighbor and friend, Maria Rioux, a member of St. Joseph Church in Nortonville.

Fuhrman began her costume career in 1999 with "princess style" dress-up clothes for her two daughters. When other parents began to ask her to make costumes for their kids, Fuhrman began a little bedroom-based business in 2002.

Initially, she only offered children's costumes of historical and literary figures. Then Rioux encouraged her to consider making saint costumes.

"I can't do that," said Fuhrman. "I'm Protestant. What do I know about the saints?"

But Rioux's fellow Catholic home-schoolers were looking for patterns for saint costumes for children. Those already on the market were mostly of the gag type for adults — shoddy and vulgar. Parents hated them.

With Rioux's help and guidance, Fuhrman began making saint costumes in 2004, and the saints must be smiling on her, because business has been very good. Her first order — which she considered "huge" — was for 16 costumes.

This year, she'll make and ship approximately 1,500 saint costumes before Oct. 24, her cutoff date for rush orders.

"We could double that if I had enough seamstresses," said Fuhrman.

Those first years, and costumes, weren't easy. Starting with patterns for a Benedictine monk, a Franciscan friar and a Jesuit priest, Fuhrman sought both quality and authenticity. A nun's cowl and a bishop's miter, for example, gave her fits.

"I lost so much sleep over the miter," said Fuhrman. "It's very hard to do the middle section."

And the secret to making a good miter? "I'm not telling," Fuhrman said with a laugh.

About 90 percent of the costumes made are of saints, and the majority of those are bought for Catholic home-schoolers. Occasionally, the costumes of saints not often requested are replaced by those growing in popularity.

"If I get more than three requests, I call Maria," said Fuhrman. "People keep asking for Padre Pio. Should we add him? I'll ask. She'll say, 'Yes,' or 'Why don't we wait?'"

"Or I'll say that he's Franciscan, and we've already got that," said Rioux.

Bishops criticize 'judicial activism' in ruling on same-sex marriage

HARTFORD, Conn. (CNS) — The Connecticut Supreme Court's Oct. 10 decision permitting same-sex marriage in the state was "a terribly regrettable exercise in judicial activism," the state's Catholic bishops said.

The court "has chosen to ignore the wisdom of our elected officials, the will of the people, and historical social and religious traditions spanning thousands of years by imposing a social experiment upon the people of our state," the bishops added in an Oct. 10 statement.

In a 4-3 decision in Kerrigan v. Commissioner of Public Health, the court majority said "the state's bar against same-sex marriage infringes on a fundamental right in violation of due process and discriminates on the basis of sex in violation of equal protection."

"We conclude that, in light of the history of pernicious discrimination faced by gay men and lesbians, and because the institution of marriage carries with it a status and significance that the newly created classification of civil union does not embody, the segregation of heterosexual and homosexual couples into separate institutions constitutes a cognizable harm," said Justice Richard M. Palmer, writing for the majority.

"The state has failed to provide sufficient justification for excluding same-sex couples from the institution of marriage," said the 85-page majority opinion.

Each of the three dissenting justices wrote his or her own opinion, with Justice Peter Zarella criticizing "the majority's unsupported assumptions that ... the sole reason that marriage has been limited to one man and one woman is society's moral disapproval of or irrational animus toward gay persons."

The Catholic bishops called on the citizens of Connecticut to vote "yes" on the Nov. 4 referendum on whether to call a constitutional convention. The state constitution requires asking voters every 20 years if they want such a convention.

FROM THE VATICAN

Vatican bank official says assets not threatened by global crisis

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican bank's assets have not been threatened by the global financial crisis, largely because it has avoided speculative investments, said an official of the bank.

"Our goal of not allowing a loss of capital to the religious institutions that entrust us with their resources remains fully achieved today," said Angelo Caloia, president of a supervisory council of the Vatican bank, known officially as the Institute for the Works of Religion.

He pointed out that the bank's exposure is limited because it does not operate as a lending institution, and its investments have always been conservative. In particular, he said, the bank has avoided investing in "derivatives," a type of higher-risk investment that is blamed for causing much of the current crisis.

Instead, Caloia said, the Vatican bank has made "clear, simple and ethically based" investments, avoiding speculation and staying away from companies tied to things like exploitation of children or the arms trade.

"Our patrimony is solid and we don't have a shortage of liquidity. We've always been very prudent, I would dare to say conservative, in managing our resources. We've always invested defensively," he said.

Caloia said the current financial crisis, which has hit major banks especially hard, has been caused primarily by "behavior that has been improper to the point of fraudulency." The solution, he said, will require more controlled regulation of the financial industry.

The Vatican bank was established in 1942 and is used by Vatican agencies, church organizations, bishops and religious orders around the world. It offers currency exchange services and interest-bearing accounts. Like all banks, it has an investment portfolio, which is not public.

Pope canonizes four saints, calls for end to violence in Orissa state

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI canonized four new saints, including the first native-born saint from India, where Christians recently have come under attack from Hindu gangs.

After the two-hour liturgy in St. Peter's Square Oct. 12, the pope made a pointed appeal for an end to violence against India's Christian minority.

He spoke after declaring sainthood for St. Alphonsa Muttathupandathu, a nun from southwestern India who was known for her holiness during a lifetime of suffering. The other new saints included an Italian priest, a Swiss missionary sister and an Ecuadorean laywoman.

The pope said their lives of faith and sacrifice should inspire contemporary Christians in all walks of life.

The liturgy marked a special moment for Indian Catholics. Thousands of Indian pilgrims, including many nuns and priests, applauded and cheered as the brief biography of St. Alphonsa was read aloud. An Indian government delegation also was present.

After the liturgy, the pope called for an end to violence against Indian Christians, in the wake of attacks on church personnel and institutions.

"As the Christian faithful of India give thanks to God for their first native daughter to be presented for public veneration, I wish to assure them of my prayers during this difficult time," he said.

The pope spoke in his homily about St. Alphonsa's life of extreme physical and spiritual suffering before her death.

"She wrote, 'I consider a day without suffering as a day lost.' May we imitate her in shouldering our own crosses so as to join her one day in paradise," he said.

The others canonized were:

— St. Narcisa de Jesus Martillo Moran, a 19th-century Ecuadorean known for her deep prayer and penitence.

— St. Gaetano Errico, an Italian priest who founded the Congregation of Missionaries of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary in the 19th century. He was known for the many hours he spent in the confessional, and for seeking out the sick, the abandoned and the spiritually afflicted in his native area of Naples.

— Sister Maria Bernarda Butler, a Swiss nun who founded the Franciscan Missionary Sisters of Mary, Help of Sinners.

With these canonizations, Pope Benedict has created 18 new saints in his pontificate of three and a half years. His predecessor, Pope John Paul II, presided over the canonization of more than 450 new saints.

The blessing was held the day after the feast of St. Francis of Assisi, known worldwide as the patron saint of animals, peace and the environment. The blessing of animals on St. Francis' feast day transcends denominational boundaries — Lutherans, Episcopalians and Presbyterians, among others, participate by inviting their congregants to bring in the animals in their care.

DIOCESAN REQUIREMENTS FOR REPORTING MINISTRY-RELATED SEXUAL ABUSE OF A MINOR

1. Any individual having actual knowledge of or reasonable cause to suspect an incident of ministry-related sexual abuse is to immediately report the incident to the Chancery.
2. The Chancery will then report the incident to the proper civil authorities. The individual reporting the incident to the Chancery will be notified of the particulars regarding the Chancery's filing of the incident with civil authorities.
3. This reporting requirement is not intended to supersede the right of an individual to make a report to civil authority, but is to ensure proper, complete and timely reporting. Should an individual choose to make a report to civil authority, a report is still to be made to the Chancery.

Former abortionist reveals industry secrets at banquet

Catholic maternity home that offers pregnancy assistance for unmarried pregnant women and their babies, both born and unborn, in the Charlotte area.

Everett said she speaks to pro-life supporters to reveal the often unknown, inner workings of the abortion industry.

"I want you to know the other side of an abortion clinic, so you truly appreciate Room at the Inn," Everett told the audience.

"It is truly a unique, life-affirming ministry ... that physically saves lives," she said.

Everett's journey into the abortion industry began soon after Roe v. Wade, the U.S. Supreme Court's decision legalizing abortion in 1973. She was under pressure from her husband and her doctor — an "abortion salesman," as she called him — to abort her pregnancy.

"Two weeks after Roe v. Wade, I was faced with a decision," she said. "As soon as I made it, I knew I made the wrong one. I knew I had killed my baby."

Her life quickly fell apart — she had an affair, started drinking and eventually left her husband.

In the early 1980s, as a single mother with two children, she found herself selling medical supplies for a business in Texas that turned out to be an abortion clinic. She was quickly swayed by the amount of money she could make by "selling" abortions.

"The so-called 'counselors' are paid by commissions on the number of abortions they bring in," said Everett.

They pretend to be the patient's friend, a confidant who has their supposed best interests at heart and will help them get rid of their "problem" before anyone finds out, said Everett.

"If a pregnancy test is positive, the woman is strong-armed into having a quick abortion before any other options can be considered," she said.

However, abortionists often perform "abortions" even if a woman's pregnancy test is negative, said Everett. The patient is given a sonogram — the only time a sonogram is used in an abortion clinic, said Everett — and the abortionists claim any "spot" in the image is a fetus.

Then the abortionist performs a mock abortion, scraping the woman's uterus in order to collect the payment. In the United States, the average cost of an abortion is $500, said Everett.

She helped the clinic double its business and income, and she was soon asked to help open and turn a profit at other locations. She was helping the clinics perform approximately 800 abortions a month. "I made $25 per abortion," she said. "I wanted to be a millionaire in a year's time."

She then met a business counselor who turned out to be a Christian preacher. Conversations with him planted doubts about the work she was doing.

"I literally fell to my knees in the abortion clinic. I said, 'Lord, if this is not where you want me, hit me over the head with a 2 x 4,'" said Everett.

That "2 x 4" struck, she said, when a local television news station's undercover report revealed her clinics were performing unnecessary abortions.

"I was the hammer. I made abortions happen, but something happened to me that day," said Everett.

Within the month, she left the abortion industry for good.

"I had incredible peace that I was not supposed to be in that abortion clinic," she said. "But I still struggled with a lot of things. Could I be forgiven for all that I had done?"

She felt — and still feels — remorse for taking the life of her own child. "I've struggled with my daughter's death. I named her Heidi, which means 'noble' but it also means 'hidden,'" she said.

The aborted babies are in heaven, Everett said, and they are all noble.

"When we get to heaven, they'll be waiting for us — not to accuse us, but to hold us," she said.

While the average cost of an abortion may be $500, said Everett, the true cost of an abortion can never be measured.

"The real cost is the life of the baby, and the lives of both the mother and father," she said.

'A Day of Life'

Catholic college students explore church teachings on life issues

CULLOWHEE — Catholic students from Western Carolina University in Cullowhee gathered recently to explore building a culture of life in America.

Thirteen students participated in "A Day of Life," a retreat focusing on the church's teachings on the dignity of human life, at a lake house in Cullowhee Sept. 27. The event, which featured several guest speakers, was organized and led by Matthew Newsome, Catholic campus minister at Western Carolina University.

Newsome focused on the sanctity of human life from conception to natural death, and explained the concept of natural law.

"The fact that our Catholic moral teachings are grounded in the natural law means that we can have an open and honest discourse about these moral issues with people who are of different faiths — or no faith at all," Newsome said. "Our morality is based on something that we all share in common — our human nature."

Father Walter Williams, pastor of St. Mary, Mother of God Church in Sylva and chaplain for the college's Catholic student center, spoke to the students about the "culture of death" and how today's college students can combat it.

"There really is no such thing as a culture of death," he told them. "Rather, it is a dead culture. A dead culture is no culture at all. We need to work then to build a new culture — one of life."

Father Williams encouraged the students to help build an authentic culture based on the dignity of the human person.

"The highest place in heaven, closest to God, is not occupied by an angel but by a human woman, the Blessed Virgin Mary," said Father Williams. "God himself has taken into his own being a human nature, through the Incarnation."

Dr. David Ramsey, a Catholic, shared his experiences as a pro-life physician. He spoke of the link between contraception and abortion, and of how these two issues stem from the same root — an anti-life mentality.

"Child abuse, out-of-wedlock children, STDs (sexually transmitted diseases), abortion, adultery, divorce, reports of spousal abuse — all have doubled or tripled since the contraceptive pill came on the market," said Ramsey.

Ramsey played a tape of fetal heart tones for the students and showed them a model of a fully-formed fetus at 9-and-a-half weeks old.

"This is what abortion proponents would call 'potential life,'" he said as students passed around the recognizably human model, complete with hands, fingers, toes and a face.

Students involved in the college's Catholic campus ministry are stepping up their pro-life efforts this year, with plans to offer a nonpartisan pro-life information table on campus prior to the upcoming election. Some students work with the Smoky Mountain Pregnancy Care Center's campus outreach office to be trained as student counselors to help those in crisis pregnancy situations.

Ramsey serves as medical director for the center.

"The Catholic students at WCU plan to live according to their dignity, so that they can be faithful witnesses to their fellow students to do the same," said Newsome.

Service, virtues highlight retreat

Diocese of Charlotte in May 1983. They received certificates of recognition from Bishop Jugis.

"I must say that being in the position of director, this has been the most blessed time in my life," said Deacon Louis Pais, director of the permanent diaconate for the Diocese of Charlotte, during the ceremony. Deacon Pais was recognized for 25 years of service as a deacon.

"The thing that has left the biggest impression on me is being able to see all the ministries of you men and your wives here in the Diocese of Charlotte, many of which are being done behind the scenes," he said.

As ordained ministers in the Catholic Church, permanent deacons may perform baptisms, witness marriages and assist in various liturgies. The permanent deacon is the only ordained man allowed to be married. However, if a deacon's wife passes away, he is not allowed to remarry. If a man is single, he is not allowed to marry after ordination.

The first permanent deacons were ordained to serve only in their parishes. In July 2003, the permanent diaconate expanded its duties considerably by taking over the diocesan prison ministry program full time.

Many deacons visit prisons regularly to offer communion services, Bible studies and counseling to the incarcerated within the diocese.

"I challenge each of you who ministers here in the Diocese of Charlotte, to take your inspiration from the Gospel account of the washing of the feet," said Deacon Pais to the deacons and wives.

In the Gospel of John, Jesus washed the feet of the Twelve Apostles, demonstrating an extreme form of humility and love.

During the retreat, Father Sheridan spoke about vices and their corresponding virtues.

"This weekend was very appropriate for what we need at this time," said Ladis Zimmerle, wife of Deacon John Zimmerle at St. Francis of Assisi Church in Mocksville.

"I've been filled with the Holy Spirit. It has been very rewarding," she said.

Women in Bible held wide range of roles

She talks about Shiphrah and Puah in Exodus, two women who put their lives at risk by defying the pharaoh's law of death in order to uphold God's law of life.

Then there's the prophet Huldah — one of few women or men called a prophet — who made history, as told in Chapter 22 of the Second Book of Kings, by verifying the authenticity of an ancient scroll discovered in the Temple.

And there's Phoebe, whom Paul refers to by the Greek word for deacon in his Letter to the Romans because of her service to the church of Cenchreae. (The New American Bible uses the word "minister" in place of the Greek "diakonis" because the concept of deacon had yet to evolve in the young church.)

Sister Fox, 72, said she tells these stories — and many others — because they are important for the faithful to hear, and especially because they are not included in the Lectionary used at Sunday Masses.

"I believe women have a very, very important role in Scripture and it's not recognized," Sister Fox said. "Women are often taken for granted but their role is so very important. I would hope it would be recognized by the church."

It's been about 20 years since Sister Fox wrote her widely circulated article, "Women in the Bible and the Lectionary." In it, she briefly recapped the stories of numerous women from the Old and New Testaments, sharing their inspiring examples of faith and leadership.

Her article was based on a lengthy study she conducted on the Lectionary, which found that the Mass readings in use since 1976 omitted or designated as optional numerous Scripture passages that refer to women's leadership roles. She also found that some of the passages about women that remained in the Lectionary reinforced what some consider to be more passive roles of women.

Today, Sister Fox is prioress of her community at Sacred Heart Monastery in Richardton, N.D., and still leads retreats about women in Scripture. "I come forth with the facts and not just opinions ... that can't be denied. And what people do with it is their responsibility," she said.

Sister Fox's work is one aspect in the burgeoning research field of women in Scripture. Interest in the topic has exploded since the 1970s, corresponding with the secular women's movement.

Dominican Sister Barbara Reid, professor of New Testament studies at Catholic Theological Union in Chicago, said the field has opened new ways to look at Scripture by "holding up the lost stories of women."

Such work has spanned both the Old and New Testaments as scholars try to decipher the role of women in history and in ministry. Some women have been depicted as influential, being counted on by early Jewish kings for their advice and viewpoints. Others have been acknowledged as disciples for their work in establishing the church in far-off places in the first and second centuries. Many more go unnamed and contribute in small ways to the modern understanding of Scripture.

Carol Meyers, professor of religion at Duke University in North Carolina and a scholar on women of the Old Testament, said biblical women can serve as role models for anyone today.

She is one of the principal authors of "Women in Scripture: A Dictionary of Named and Unnamed Women in the Hebrew Bible, the Apocryphal/Deuterocanonical Books, and the New Testament," which has become a widely used reference work. It contains more than 800 entries examining the women in Scripture, and includes prominent women such as Deborah, Esther and Mary Magdalene, as well as unnamed women and female imagery developed by Scripture authors.

"In terms of public roles and community roles ... there's 15 to 17 public roles depicted for women in the Old Testament," she explained. "It means that women were not all relegated to the household, that there are women with positions of authority in the community. We tend to forget about that and think about women who are subordinate and subservient and that's not necessarily the case."

Like Meyers, Sister Reid has studied the topic of women in Scripture — in her case the New Testament — for much of her career. She examines the role of women from the viewpoint of women's experiences.

"It's not about analyzing female characters but more about using lenses of feminist consciousness ... reading with the eyes, mind and hearts of women, with women's realities in the forefront," Sister Reid explained. "Women have always been interpreting the Bible. What's new is that women are starting to have each other's work to build on."

Sister Reid's work has focused on what the roles of women in Scripture say to women today. She said that while New Testament books do not tell the stories of women being called as the Twelve Apostles were, women were alongside Christ on his journey through Galilee and later to Jerusalem.

The Gospel of Luke tells of Mary Magdalene, Joanna and Susanna accompanying Christ as he went "from one town and village to another, preaching and proclaiming the good news of the kingdom of God."

After Christ's ascension, the first generations of the church were largely domestic in nature, meaning the faithful met and worshipped in someone's home, many times with a woman leading the gatherings, Sister Reid explained.

Paul's letters to emerging Christian communities and Luke's Acts of the Apostles mention several such women: Nympha (Col 4:15) and Prisca, or Priscilla, and her husband, Aquila (Acts 18:2-3 and Rom 16:3-5).

Such house churches were portrayed

Deborah, Mary Magdalene and Esther are depicted in stained-glass windows. Deborah was named a prophet and judge of Israel and is recognized as a mother of Israel. Mary Magdalene was a faithful disciple of Jesus and used her resources to support him and the apostles. Esther was a heroine who saved her people from annihilation.

to show the connection between faith and family life, which was the domain of women, said Sister Carolyn Osiek, Catholic professor of New Testament at Brite Divinity School at Texas Christian University in Fort Worth.

She said some women traveled, like Paul, as evangelists for Christ. But it was the house churches, she explained, where people formed bonds while learning the faith, providing hospitality for visiting Christians, baptizing new believers and networking first-century style.

The women mentioned by Paul were among the most prominent and likely the most prosperous in their communities, said Sister Osiek, a member of Society of the Sacred Heart.

Nonetheless, their example of living faith-filled lives can serve to inspire women and men alike in the 21st-century church, she said.

Cardinal: Bible Belt a 'frame of mind'

VATICAN CITY (CNS)—The Bible Belt refers geographically to parts of the southern United States, but it is also "a frame of mind" in which Bible passages and images are alive and relevant to life, said Texas Cardinal Daniel N. DiNardo of Galveston-Houston.

The cardinal addressed the world Synod of Bishops on the Bible Oct. 11, sharing stories of faith from his region and suggesting the Catholic Church draw up a "compendium for the reading and sharing of sacred Scripture."

He said the document should be addressed to the faithful, not experts, and should "highlight the rich and useful methods and approaches in the church, past and present, for reading, interpreting, praying and living the word of God."

The compendium would provide guidance to Catholics who read the Bible alone or in groups and would give them an understanding of the church's approach to the Scriptures, which is important especially for Catholics who "deal regularly with non-Catholic Bible study groups and individuals," he said.

Cardinal DiNardo told the synod he was speaking on "behalf of Catholics who live in the famous Bible Belt of the southern United States. But, though a location, the Bible Belt is a frame of mind also."

"There are surely issues and problems with this mindset," he said, "but it has kept alive a biblical imagination and vocabulary" as well as a sense of God still at work in the world.

Cardinal DiNardo told the synod about a Catholic woman whose home was destroyed by Hurricane Ike and a non-Catholic woman whose home was flooded.

He met the Catholic when he went to the cathedral to assess the damage. She noted that the statue of Mary was still on top of the cathedral and, quoting from the Gospel of Luke, she said, "Blessed is she among women. We will be okay."

An hour later he met the other woman who talked about the damage to her home, saying, "but 'the Lord drew me out of the miry clay,'" a line from Psalm 40.

"Both responses were deeply biblical and touching," the cardinal said. While some Americans would ridicule their faith and Bible quoting, he said, "they both displayed intelligence and humility. Their attitude reflected openness to the Holy Spirit and their quotations of the biblical texts were wise and prayerful."

Cardinal DiNardo said he hoped the synod would keep such people in mind in its deliberations, helping the faithful, correcting them when necessary, but especially supporting "their hope and their lived knowledge that God is active in the world."

Iraq War poses major challenges for next president

United States took pre-emptive action to head off what it considered a potential threat to its national security.

However, surveys show Americans are growing increasingly impatient with the war as the cost of remaining in Iraq soars to nearly $560 billion and casualties mount.

The Web site www.icasualties.org recorded 4,182 U.S. soldiers killed and another 30,634 injured as of Oct. 13. (The figures do not include Iraqi deaths or those of foreign military forces and private contractors.)

Even with the planned withdrawal of 8,000 troops within the next several weeks, more than 130,000 U.S. military personnel will remain in the country when either Republican Sen. John McCain or Democratic Sen. Barack Obama takes the oath of office as America's 44th president Jan. 20.

Varying views

How the two major candidates address the war is indicative of the personal histories of each man.

Obama, who publicly opposed the war even before his election to the U.S. Senate in 2004, has pledged to seek a "diplomatic surge" to bring peace to the region.

McCain, the military hero who was tortured as a prisoner of war during the Vietnam War, adheres to a stay-the-course strategy, promising to eradicate Iraqi-based terrorism before he will consider reducing U.S. forces in the country.

Specifically, Obama has said he plans a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops, beginning almost immediately after taking office. His plan calls for virtually all troops to be withdrawn by the summer of 2010, leaving a residual force to perform limited missions in support of the Iraqi government.

Obama has said gradual troop withdrawals would pressure the Iraqi leadership to move more rapidly to take responsibility for the country's security.

In contrast, McCain uses the language of his military background, promising to take whatever steps are necessary to fight terrorism and keep America safe. McCain's plan calls for reducing the U.S. military presence in Iraq only when Iraqi forces can safeguard the country.

Demonstrating his commitment to the war effort, the senator from Arizona said during a campaign stop in January that troops would stay in Iraq for 100 years if necessary.

Neither view matches exactly the stance of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, which initially opposed military intervention and since 2006 has called for bipartisan cooperation to bring about a "responsible transition" in the oil-rich nation.

The bishops seek the return of U.S. troops as soon as possible, provided the Iraqis can govern their country in the wake of the war, explained Stephen Colecchi, director of the USCCB's Office of International Justice and Peace.

"The bishops don't see the war in Iraq primarily as a partisan issue," Colecchi told Catholic News Service. "They see it primarily as a human and moral issue. They don't support the extreme response of an immediate withdrawal nor the extreme response of an indefinite deployment (of troops). They're saying we have serious moral questions we have to deal with. We have to get out as soon as we possibly can, but we have to do it in a responsible way that minimizes loss of life and helps to rebuild the country of Iraq."

Along with stabilizing the country, the bishops say the needs of more than 2 million Iraqi refugees — many of them Christians who fled to Syria and Jordan — and another 2 million internally displaced Iraqis must be addressed.

"The U.S., because of its role as the occupying power, has a legal responsibility under international law and a moral responsibility to assist the Iraqi people in doing that," Colecchi said. "And the Iraqis themselves need to make difficult political decisions that will lead to reconciliation within their communities."

Obama's platform concurs with the bishops' assessment. No mention of refugees and displaced people can be found in McCain's platform.

'Complicated mix'

Catholic analysts say the situation in the Middle East is much broader than Iraq, and that whoever becomes president will find the perilous relationship between Israel and the Palestinians undermining any attempt to achieve peace in the region.

Iran's role in the insurgency in Iraq, Iran's nuclear program and the dangers posed by Islamic extremists also pose challenges for the U.S. role in the region.

"It's a complicated mix there," said Gerard Powers, director of policy studies at the Joan B. Kroc Institute for International Peace Studies at the University of Notre Dame in Indiana.

"I think Obama would take a more regionwide approach, a more multilateral approach. McCain is more focused on the urgent need for security," she said.

Despite the candidates' current positions, Powers and Jesuit Father Drew Christiansen, editor of America magazine and an expert in Middle East affairs, said with the changing political situation in Iraq — a gradually strengthening central government and declining violence — the positions of McCain and Obama appear to be inching closer together.

"I think the U.S. needs to abide by what an independent government of Iraq wants to do," Father Christiansen said. "I don't think the Iraqis want the U.S. to pull out entirely, but they may want more (withdrawals) than some of the reluctant members of the military and the foreign policy establishment would like."

Father Christiansen said Obama's experience in community organizing, where negotiating is a valued skill, may help bring more partners to the table in the hope of achieving a regional peace more readily than the primarily military-based solution espoused by McCain.

The complexity of the issues will take patience and a commitment for a just solution for all parties, he said.

"But in addition to taking patience, it's going to take wise and just policy on the part of the U.S.," the Jesuit said. "I don't think we can presume we're the biggest and the best. What's happened, the situation in Georgia has indicated that just because we're the biggest, we can't think everyone is going to go along with what we want."

"You need a wise, just, generous policy that is very long-sighted," he added. "And for some time to come the U.S. military will be needed for world stability. The U.S. is going to need to do that but with a policy that uses both hands and that the hand holding the olive branch has to be out front."

Powers expressed concern, however, about McCain's "embrace of the Bush administration's pre-emptive war argument." If McCain holds fast to that view, it would dim the prospects for a regional peace accord, he said.

Whether Obama or McCain occupies 1600 Pennsylvania Ave., rebuilding the country's credibility in diplomatic circles will be one of the most difficult challenges the next president faces, said Dave Robinson, executive director of Pax Christi USA.

"Our concern is the way this war has been waged. U.S. credibility has been so damaged. It's hard to imagine the U.S. will be able to broker the international engagement that will be necessary (to bring peace to Iraq)," he said.

He suggested that the 44th president must seek international cooperation, joining with the United Nations, the Arab League and the European Union to ensure peace for Iraq and its neighbors.

"That's core to the Catholic view," he said.

Room At The Inn of the Carolinas

Room At The Inn of the Carolinas, Inc.

www.RoomInn.org

Dear Friends:

Room At The Inn of the Carolinas is a comprehensive program helping homeless, single, pregnant women and single mothers with children not only during their pregnancies but also after the birth of their children. By providing housing, food, clothing, in-house child care, transportation, case management, counseling and life skills education, we are able to help these young families thrive. Over the last decade, Room At The Inn of the Carolinas has spread to both Carolinas and operates in five counties and two dioceses. Our programs include:

- The Nussbaum Maternity Home located in Greensboro;
- The Amy Elizabeth Disney House located in Greensboro;
- The Backyard Ministry located in Kernersville;
- The Samaritan House located in Eden;
- And our newest collaboration with the Knights of Columbus, the Father Michael McGivney Maternity Home located in Bluffton.

Always faithful to Catholic teaching, Room At The Inn of the Carolinas is a response to the call of Christ to build a "Culture of Life" and seeks to make the mercy of Jesus real and present to some of those most in need of Him.

On any given night, twenty women and their children are provided residential services. Our maternity homes in both states admit homeless, pregnant women with or without previous children. Because we believe that education is the key to their success, we operate a unique program that provides housing and support services to our residents as they attend college on a full-time basis.

In November, we are pleased to invite you as our guest to our banquet to be held in Greensboro as we welcome Norma McCorvey and our own program graduates who will share their stories of how pro-life people reaching out in love have helped change their lives. Ms. McCorvey was the "Roe" in the Supreme Court decision, "Roe vs. Wade". There is no charge to attend but reservations are requested. If you want to help spread the Gospel of Life, you can also contribute by visiting our website at www.RoomInn.Org.

We appreciate your time as you read this report on our progress in building a "Culture of Life" here in the Carolinas. Together, we can continue to help some of the most vulnerable of our dioceses: homeless, pregnant women and their babies.

Leah's Story

When I was homeless and pregnant, Room At The Inn of the Carolinas gave me a real home and a new family. Because of complications with my pregnancy, I was put on complete bed-rest, but the staff took good care of me.

After the birth of my son, Gabriel, and because of the excellent day care provided by Room At The Inn of the Carolinas, I was able to return to college. In May of 2006, I graduated with honors from Bennett College with my Bachelor of Science Degree in Communications.

Now, as a student at Savannah State University working on my MSW, my future plans are to give back to society by helping women and children.

Building a Culture of Life ... through Love

The Annual Campaign to raise the funding necessary to operate the maternity homes, subsidized housing, the emergency shelter, child development programs and other support programs for homeless pregnant women and single mothers with children throughout the Carolinas will kick off with our Annual Benefit Banquets this November.

In addition to the testimonial from graduates of our various programs, we are proud to announce that Ms. Norma McCorvey will be the keynote speaker at both the North Carolina and South Carolina Banquets. Ms. McCorvey will talk about how her life was changed by the mercy and love of Jesus that was shown to her over the years by Christians witnessing to the sanctity of life.

Ms. McCorvey was the Jane "Roe" of "Roe vs. Wade," the decision of the US Supreme Court that legalized abortion throughout all fifty states.

Ms. McCorvey's non-political message emphasizes how love builds a culture that respects life and how we can make a difference by reaching out to homeless, pregnant women in need.

Authors provide valuable volumes on church, from different angles

REVIEWED BY RACHELLE LINNER
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Boston College professor James O'Toole's considerable gifts as a historian and writer make "The Faithful: A History of Catholics in America" both a pleasure to read and an important contribution to American Catholic history.

O'Toole, whose earlier works include a biography of Boston's magisterial Cardinal William O'Connell, takes a different approach in this study. "The Faithful" tells the story of American Catholicism not through its leaders or institutions, but through the lens of "the men and women in the pews."

The result is a richly layered narrative that communicates a complex history while retaining its focus on the lived experience of Catholicism.

"For Catholics, though they are members of an institutional church, the underlying loyalty is to a way of seeing the world (both this one and the one that is believed to come after it) no less than to an ecclesiastical structure," he writes. "This vision requires nurturing through religious practice: sacraments, liturgy and prayer, both individual and communal."

O'Toole identifies six broad periods of American Catholic history: the priestless church of the pre-Revolutionary period, the early years of the republic, the immigrant church, the church of Catholic Action, of Vatican II, and, projecting into the future, of the 21st century.

O'Toole clarifies what was distinctive about each era's demographics, devotional practices, relationships between laypeople and clergy, and attitudes toward the papacy and American political and cultural life.

The book's strength is its incarnational sensibility, the way O'Toole illustrates historical and theological ideas with specificity, narrating often poignant anecdotes with clarity, respect and a refreshing lack of polemics.

This is not to say that O'Toole is timid. He is impatient with people who long to return to a supposed golden age of Catholic life. He presents evidence that the "disaffection" of the laity and anger over clericalism in the aftermath of the sexual abuse crisis is radically different from earlier conflicts between laypeople and priests, a situation that is complicated by the "generational split ... in the ranks of the clergy."

"The American Catholic Church has become a church of the middle class, even the upper-middle class, and a church of the poor and the working class, all at the same time. In its earlier immigrant eras it was a church mostly of the 'bottom,' without much representation at the 'top' of society," writes O'Toole.

"During its present era, it is both. There is a danger in this. Catholicism in America may move toward becoming two churches, or perhaps three: one for the well-off and largely white; one for working-class 'white ethnics'; and a third for poorer people of color. Such an outcome, however, can be avoided. Catholicism has always been, in the often-cited words of James Joyce, a matter of 'here comes everybody.'"

O'Toole hopes that "understanding the successive ages of their church may open (Catholics) to accepting change that will continue whether they want it to or not." This wonderful book enhances confidence in the future because it demonstrates the resilience, fidelity and creativity of the faithful.

Father Richard McBrien, a professor of theology at the University of Notre Dame in Indiana, has written a comprehensive and useful one-volume study of ecclesiology, "the theological study of the church ... as a mystery, or sacrament."

"The Church: The Evolution of Catholicism," designed primarily for an academic setting, is also suitable for private study. Father McBrien is a skillful teacher, able to explain theological concepts, history and personalities in accessible language.

Father McBrien's most comprehensive treatment is of the ecclesiology of the Second Vatican Council, which "retrieved much of the ancient church's more dialogical stance toward the world and its emphasis on its communal, participatory life."

Father McBrien offers a cogent reading of "Lumen Gentium" (the document that focuses on internal church matters) and "Gaudium et Spes" (which addresses the relationship of the church to the world).

Most helpfully, Father McBrien explains the ongoing conflict about whether the council was a reform of, or a rupture with, previous teachings.

The contentious debates about how to interpret the council have a direct relationship to controversial topics in post-Vatican II ecclesiology, including the nature of the church as a communion, the sacraments, authority in the church, the reception of doctrine, ordained and nonordained ministry, and ecclesiologies proposed by women and minorities.

Father McBrien provides a balanced explanation of these disputes, but his reputation as a polarizing figure in the church may result in the book being unfairly characterized by those who assail his liberal reputation.

That would be unfortunate, because this is a balanced resource that can serve the church's pastoral and intellectual life.

Treatment of others related to view of ourselves

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

My sister-in-law is a professional genealogist — a family history researcher — and she helps people trace their roots and learn more about their heritage by gleaning information about their forebears.

About 20 years ago, I became fascinated enough by her work to begin our own family research. Examining birth and death records, strolling through cemeteries, interviewing elders and rummaging through dusty archives taught me a lot about my ancestors and the incredible hardships they endured as immigrants to this country.

The dates and names of history came alive as I connected them to the stories of real people and their relationships with one another. And although I am a product of a different time and place, I also see how my character traits aren't all that different from theirs. By understanding them, I better understand myself.

Today's selections from Scripture remind us that our treatment of others is closely related to the way we view ourselves. In the first reading, Yahweh makes a convincing case for Israel's merciful treatment of the alien, the widow and the orphan by appealing to Israel's own history in Egypt as mistreated and marginalized people.

In the Gospel, Jesus declares the next to love of God, love of neighbor the greatest commandment — and that one's love of self is the measure with which one loves others.

By reflecting upon the way I would want to be treated, and by remembering my own personal experiences of being isolated, alienated, misunderstood and in need, I can more easily dissolve the barriers that stand between "me" and "them."

By extending love and kindness to others, I open the door to experiencing God's merciful love toward me.

In an election year when so many issues of social justice are thrown into sharp relief, and when the nation's distribution of resources is often a topic of heated debate, perhaps it is helpful to remember who we are — and whose we are — by finding time to retreat from the clamor, remembering our own grace-filled moments, and regarding others with the same kindness with which God regards us.

Questions:

When did you ever feel isolated or "marginalized," and how were you treated? How can you as a voting citizen exercise your responsibility with justice and mercy?

Can't wait for the book? See the Bible at the movies

BY HARRY FORBES AND JOHN MULDERIG
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK — It's no secret that the Bible has long offered filmmakers a wealth of rich source material.

The stories contained within this cornerstone of Judeo-Christian faith and pillar of Western literature provide an apparently irresistible mix of saints and sinners to those rapacious Tinseltown moguls always on the lookout for crowd pleasers in the public domain.

In his 1997 "Jesus at the Movies," W. Barnes Tatum points out that within three years of the invention of cinema there were as many versions of the Passion narrative committed to film. The Crucifixion also figures in D.W. Griffith's 1916 epic, "Intolerance."

The life of Jesus has been recounted innumerable times, the earliest major version being "King of Kings." That 1927 silent was the work of master biblical epic-maker Cecil B. DeMille, though it was Nicholas Ray who helmed the 1961 remake with Jeffrey Hunter's blue-eyed matinee-idol Christ.

Both Old and New Testaments continued to provide rich fodder through the transition to sound, with DeMille again leading the charge with such simultaneously reverential and racy fare as "The Sign of the Cross" (1932).

The stately, picture-postcard "The Greatest Story Ever Told" in 1965 featured a host of unlikely Hollywood stars in cameo roles: John Wayne as a centurion, Jose Ferrer as Herod and Sidney Poitier as Simon of Cyrene, to name a few, and Ingmar Bergman-star Max Von Sydow as an imposing and reverential Savior.

After these epic excesses, director Pier Paolo Pasolini's no-frills rendering, "The Gospel According to St. Matthew," was widely acclaimed as the definitive telling of the story — though Mel Gibson's 2004 box-office champ, "The Passion of the Christ," was the most detailed account of Our Lord's final earthly day.

The year 1973 saw two musical incarnations of the Jesus story — both adapted from the stage. In Andrew Lloyd Webber's "Jesus Christ Superstar" and Stephen Schwartz's "Godspell," the narrative was filtered through a rock star and hippie sensibility, respectively.

Christ's birth received a picturesque retelling in 2006's "The Nativity Story," though there was some consternation when star Keisha Castle-Hughes, who portrayed Mary, became the more usual kind of unwed mother in real life.

In terms of Old Testament adaptations, the prize goes to "The Ten Commandments" — DeMille's 1956 remake of his 1923 silent — which never fails to garner whopping ratings in its annual TV outing. After Charlton Heston's recent death, it was his portrayal of Moses that dominated all the obituaries.

John Huston's somewhat ponderous "The Bible" (1966) — an anthology that covered creation through the story of Abraham — was a noble attempt to dramatize the earliest passages of Genesis. But Steve Carell's 2007 "Evan Almighty," with the star as a modern-day Noah, arguably trumped the earlier movie's flood story.

Pious, often lengthy epics like DeMille's 1949 "Samson and Delilah," 1959 "Solomon and Sheba" and 1960

"The Story of Ruth" continued to mine the Hebrew Scriptures with entertaining but less artful results.

Two popular scripturally themed 19th-century novels — Polish novelist Henryk Sienkiewicz's "Quo Vadis" and Lew Wallace's "Ben Hur: A Tale of the Christ" — have received multiple screen treatments dating back to the silent era. The former, which charts the activities of St. Peter in the early days of the church, was especially well-served in its 1951 MGM version.

The lavish 1925 silent version of "Ben-Hur" with Ramon Novarro still impresses with its evocative use of tinting and spectacular chariot race, but William Wyler's 1959 remake with Charlton Heston was heralded as superior, picking up a then-unprecedented 11 Oscars, including one for best picture.

Other stories that intertwined fictional, biblical and historical events were adaptations of Lloyd Douglas' "The Robe" (1953) and its even more kitschy 1954 sequel, "Demetrius and the Gladiators," as well as 1962's "Barabbas."

Television picked up the biblical mantle early on, with Gian Carlo Menotti's Nativity-themed opera "Amahl and the Night Visitors," a holiday staple, starting in 1951.

Made-for-TV biblical movies — "Peter and Paul" (1981), "A.D." (1985), "Joseph" (1995), "Moses" (1995), and "David" (1997), among them — are too plentiful for discussion here, but let it be said that Franco Zeffirelli's "Jesus of Nazareth" (1977) stands high in the pantheon of quality Gospel adaptations.

More than 100,000 expectant couples each year receive the devastating news of a poor prenatal diagnosis (PPD). It may be the detection of a fetal heart defect, kidneys that are too small for gestation, or evidence of spina bifida or Down Syndrome, but whatever the specifics, shocked and broken-hearted parents have lost the baby and the pregnancy they had anticipated. With little or no information or resources available that support the option of carrying to term, 80% of these pregnancies end in abortion.

God's Children, God's Blessing: A Community-Based Response to Poor Prenatal Diagnosis

Friday, October 24th – 9 AM - 3 PM

Elizabeth Ministry, in conjunction with the Diocesan Respect Life Office, is hosting a conference to increase awareness regarding this "new kind of crisis pregnancy" and to improve outreach to encourage parents to carry to term.

Morning program: information from speakers and a parent panel

Afternoon program: three concurrent roundtable sessions focusing on the development of perinatal hospice and medical resource support services, and improving the Catholic response to the diagnosis of Down Syndrome

A light lunch will be served.

First-graders from St. Michael School in Gastonia choose apples during a class trip to Windy Hill Orchard and Cider Mill in York, S.C., Sept. 23. The trip was to celebrate the Sept. 26 birthday of Johnny Appleseed, a pioneer who introduced apples to Illinois, Indiana and Ohio. The students learned about Appleseed and how apple cider is made, took a hayride and navigated a sunflower maze, and made a scarecrow, which they named Michael and brought back to the school to share with their fellow students.

Crisis in the economy

Competence, conscience and faith needed to fix problems

Few people think of it this way, but we live in a faith-based economy. Not religious faith, to be sure, but faith nonetheless.

Religious language without religious meaning has dominated the headlines in recent weeks. "Confidence in Financial Markets Plummets," we read. Notice that "con" is English for "cum," the Latin preposition meaning "with," and "fides" is Latin for "faith." So con-fidence means "with faith."

Whenever confidence in markets takes a hike, faith has slipped away before it.

The credit markets are frozen, business analysts warn. Well "credit" derives from the Latin "credo," "I believe," and there again, when credit stops flowing, faith has preceded lending into the deep freeze.

Banks stop lending to other banks — and to business or individual borrowers — because confidence in their ability to repay has vanished.

Interesting, isn't it, to recall that when a company was formed in Boston some years ago to manage other people's financial assets, the founders decided to call it "Fidelity."

You'll find "trust," "providence" and other terms from the vocabulary of religious faith sprinkled throughout business directories listing banks, insurance and mortgage companies.

Religious faith would have you entrust yourself to God; secular faith involves mutual trust between buyer and seller, lender and borrower in the marketplace.

There are many markets in the world of finance. Best known, perhaps, is the stock market, but that's not where the problem lies today.

To the extent that speculation displaces investment, and greed drives decisions to buy or sell, there will be speculative bubbles in the stock market and cause for genuine concern. Indeed, stock market fluctuations signal stress in the nation's economic nervous system.

But our current problems relate chiefly to the credit markets and have their underlying causes in overpriced real estate and the subprime mortgage loans foisted upon willing but unqualified borrowers by greedy and profit-seeking lenders.

As the whole world knows, all this led to a legislative crisis and executive leadership challenge in our national government.

Neither Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson nor President George Bush is familiar, I suspect, with a classic principle of Catholic social teaching known as the "principle of subsidiarity."

This principle is designed to keep government in its place. In essence, it says that no decision should be taken to a higher level of organization that can be taken as efficiently and effectively at a lower level.

Looking Around

This principle was articulated by Pope Pius XI in 1931 in "Quadragesimo Anno," marking the 40th anniversary of Pope Leo XIII's "Rerum Novarum."

Although they may never have heard of it, both Secretary Paulson and President Bush did, however, use the language of subsidiarity when they argued in September that the federal government had to come to the rescue because the problem was "too big" to be handled efficiently and effectively at any other level in our economic system.

Only government, what some critics scornfully call "big government," was up to the job. The president and treasury secretary were right. The Senate immediately agreed and the House of Representatives eventually came around to seeing the light.

This is not socialism any more than the New Deal was socialism. Much repair work remains to be done. The tradition of Catholic social thought can help.

Those responsible for fixing our problems must have competence (knowledge of economics and finance) and conscience (ethical principles).

Faith in themselves will help. Faith in God is not to be overlooked. Ideology at either extreme of the political spectrum will only get in the way.

Life is not a choice

Children should be given opportunities to live

Editor's note: This is the last in a series on prenatal diagnosis.

The British Broadcasting Corporation produces many comedy series that are shown on American TV. One of those comedies, "Keeping Up Appearances," is televised on PBS on Saturday evenings.

There is a character who is never seen nor heard, but exists by way of supposed telephone conversations between himself and his mother. The character's name is "Sheridan." Hopefully his character is not based upon a real life character by the same name.

There is, however, another "Sheridan" who is not fictional at all, and she in fact is a 3-year-old girl who nearly did not make it into this life.

A couple in one of my former parishes are the proud parents of Sheridan. Both mother and father converted to the Catholic Church in different years and were eventually married.

The woman was in her late 40s when she and her husband learned she was pregnant. It was a surprise, but a happy one indeed.

In preparing for the birth of their child, the couple visited their doctor to get advice for the months ahead. That office visit turned into a very different kind of surprise.

The advice involved having an abortion. Perhaps it was based upon the age of the mother to be, or because of some testing upon the child and mother. Whatever the specifics, their unborn child was given a poor prognosis.

The couple told the doctor that they could not follow his advice because of their faith and belief in the value of life. Months later, a beautiful little baby was delivered into the world and was named Sheridan.

I was flattered and proud in the choice of this name, but also and more importantly because the couple had chosen life for the child instead of death.

Now getting ready for her third birthday, Sheridan is a vivacious, healthy and beautiful little girl. She is alive today because of a faith and a trust in God's providence, and the adherence of her parents to the principle of life.

Recently I ran into a similar situation involving the same advice — a different doctor gave another expectant couple the advice to abort.

Life Issues Forum

This couple works in the health care profession and knew what questions to ask. Their decision from the very beginning was that no matter what might be predicted, their baby would be born and not aborted.

Again, the result was the delivery of a gorgeous, healthy and wonderful baby.

Both couples had planned not to abort but instead to give their babies the wonderful opportunity to live. No matter what, both couples were ready to face any difficulty or challenge that might be presented to them.

But how many other couples or individuals either do not have a belief in life or do not know the right questions to ask? How many others would take the advice of the professionals and snuff out the life of another human being?

Life would not be the choice, and the heartache of abortion would haunt them forever.

As we read in Scriptures: "Before I formed you in the womb I knew you; before you came to birth I consecrated you" (Jeremiah 1, 5). God knows us intimately and loves us beyond our wildest imaginations.

In light of that, whose advice should be followed — the professional's or the Lord's?

Ultimately, the answer is found in Scriptures: "I set before you life or death, blessing or curse. Choose life" (Deut. 30, 19).

Father Sheridan is a retired priest of the Diocese of Charlotte.

Fostering a missionary spirit in children

As parents, we teach our kids to go, love, serve

With World Mission Sunday around the corner, Oct. 19, let's look at how parents foster a missionary spirit in their children.

In fact, we parents can't be accused of not fostering a missionary spirit in our kids. ("Missionary," coming from the Latin "mitto," "mittere," "misi," "missus," meaning "to send.")

As our kids grow up, one of the most frequent commands they hear from us "Go!"

"Go get ready for bed."

"Go set the table."

"Go say you're sorry."

"Go do your homework."

"Go outside and play."

"Go to your room! Now! Go!"

"You want more money? Go get a job this summer."

Seeing the big picture, we moms and dads know that our little dears are here," but now it's time for them to move "there."

And while they're "there," they should brush their teeth and put on their pajamas. Or assist a sibling.

Or apologize for misbehavior. Or finish that school assignment that's due tomorrow.

Or get some fresh air and exercise. Or just settle down and be in a time out."

Or come to appreciate the fact that money doesn't grow on trees.

(Yes, you promised yourself you'd never tell your kids that money doesn't grow on trees, but there you are telling them just that. And if you want to do something nice for your own parents, let your mom and dad know that you told your children about money and trees. That'll make their day.)

Why are parents so fond of "Go!"?

It's part of our job. Our duty. Our responsibility. We know from experience that after our children have heard it for many years they're more likely to say it to themselves as they get older.

Maturity lets a person spot "here" and "there" and recognize there are some things he or she should be doing "there."

In high school it might mean going over and talking to the new kid who seems to be floundering or the classmate who has a hard time making friends.

In college it could be getting up and going to class even if that class begins at (yawn) 9 a.m.

On the job, in a marriage, as a parent, at the parish and, of course, at the end of Mass: "Go. Love. Serve."

As Catholics, each of us is a "multiple missionary." Called. Sent — as a son or daughter, a brother or sister, a friend, a classmate, a neighbor, a workmate, an employer, a spouse or single person, a priest or religious, a parent or grandparent, a retiree and on and on.

And in every setting that we find ourselves or move ourselves into over the years, it's our heavenly Father who sees the infinite picture and tells us to go. To love. And to serve.

And speaking of parents and missionaries, the mother and father of St. Therese of Lisieux (1873-1897) are scheduled to be beatified on World Mission Sunday, Oct. 19.

Therese (along with St. Francis Xavier, 1506-1552) is the patron of foreign missions, even though she was a cloistered Carmelite nun.

Pope says God, not people, created the church

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The church is not a club founded by people with a common interest; it is a living body convoked and created by God, Pope Benedict XVI said.

It is through the proclamation of the living Christ that "God comes to all peoples and reunites them as one people of God," the pope said Oct. 15 at his weekly general audience in St. Peter's Square. The pope focused on St. Paul's teachings on the church and its meaning.

The Greek word "ekklesia," which is translated as assembly and church in English, was used in the Old Testament to mean an assembly of the people of Israel summoned or called upon by God, the pope said.

In his writings, St. Paul used the term to mean "the new community of believers in Christ" and "the new convocation of all peoples by God and before God," the pope said. St. Paul realized "the God of Israel, through Christ, came to the people ... and became the God of all peoples."

Different languages and cultures could not separate the people of God; "everyone was called in their diversity to become part of the one people of God, in the church of God, in Christ," said the pope. This was the essence of St. Paul's evangelical mission — to "embed the community of believers in Christ," he said.

For St. Paul, the pope said, church meant both an assembly of God's people in a particular place, city or home, and it also meant "all the church in its entirety." Each local church is in itself a reflection or "realization of God's one church."

St. Paul also formulated the concept of the church as the body of Christ, said the pope. Each individual Christian, no matter how small and seemingly insignificant, is an integral part that is necessary for the life and functioning of the body as a whole. And the church is not just a gathering of individuals but "truly becomes the body of Christ in the sacrament of the Eucharist where everyone receives his body and we truly become his body," he said.

He said in this way St. Paul shows people that the church does not belong to a particular person or group but is precisely the body of Christ, "the church of God, God's field, God's building."

God is no longer confined to sacred places, the pope said. "God does not live in buildings made of stone; rather God's presence in the world is in the living community of believers," he said.

Pope Benedict called on Christians to remember "we are temples of God in the world, places where God truly lives, and we are at the same time a community, a family of God."

Yes or no? Is that your final answer?

Doing God's will means following through on good intentions

In the Gospel of St. Matthew (Ch. 21), Jesus tells us of a man who asked his two sons to go to his vineyard. One said yes, the other said no.

Were those their final answers? They were not.

So although "Who Wants to be a Millionaire" was an invention of British television in 1998, apparently the Jewish people were playing a similar game 2,000 years ago.

But our Christian journey has nothing to do with such a game. The parable of the Gospel has a story beyond the story: There was a struggle between "yes" and "no" and that struggle is still going on.

Jesus Christ invites us to mean what we say and to say what we mean. The struggle between "yes" and "no" has been recorded throughout the Bible; for instance, the prophet Ezekiel (Ezekiel 8:25-28) gives us an example of a "yes" changed into a "no" and a "no" changed into a "yes."

The two sons mentioned in Matthew's Gospel were both wrong and Jesus was not really praising anyone. Rather, Jesus' parable sets before us two types of people.

First, those who profess one thing and practice another — their promises do not match their actions.

Second, those who are better than they sound — they seem not to be interested in religion, but they really are and they live true Christian lives.

The challenge of the Gospel is to remind us that this world is full of these "yes people" and "no people."

And the question for us is: "What is our final answer to God's call to holiness?"

St. Peter, St. Paul, St. Thomas the Apostle, St. Francis of Assisi, St. Augustine were "no people," as we have learned from their early lives, but they had the courage to become "yes people" later on and have become heroes.

To make this drastic change from "no" to "yes," a process must take place: The process of repentance, which is not simply wishing to be good, but actually being good. I heard hell is full of good intentions, and nobody ever went to heaven with good intentions only.

Our country has recently witnessed some tragic events, such as devastating hurricanes and the financial meltdown. All this comes down to one simple issue: The world is full of uncertainties, so why don't we make God our rescue plan?

After the disaster of Hurricane Ike, some brave souls gathered together in the nearly deserted cathedral in Galveston, Texas, where Archbishop Joseph A. Fiorenza of Galveston-Houston said, "This calls us in times of great distress to have patience and kindness with one another."

In those moments of catastrophe and destruction, there was a tiny light of hope — an impromptu baptism in one of the shelters. Praise the Lord! And say "yes" to him.

Legatus members find faith helps them cope with Wall Street upheaval

CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK — Many Catholics who work on Wall Street and are trying to cope with the current upheaval in all sectors of the financial markets seem to be finding strength in their faith and the relationships they have made through Legatus, an organization of "ambassadors of Christ in the marketplace."

Catholics "involved in the financial sector" are as vulnerable to "fluctuations in the economy as anyone else," said Daniel Schreck, coordinator for the Manhattan chapter of Legatus. "From what I have seen, I do think the Catholic faith has given them a sense of peace even in these turbulent times"

"Due to the personal relationships, which are the foundation of any Legatus chapter, members have a support system at their disposal," he continued, adding, "Bottom line — Legatus gives these business executives the friendships and support necessary to confront life's ups and downs."

Legatus — Latin for ambassador — is an organization of Catholic business leaders. It was created by Tom Monahan, founder of Domino's Pizza, to give Catholic CEOs an opportunity to bring their faith into their business and professional lives.

Membership is open to men and women. There are more than 60 chapters in the United States, Canada, Ireland and Poland. Members are expected to spread the faith through good example, good deeds and high ethical standards.

Members of the Manhattan chapter talked about the financial crisis at their most recent meeting, said Schreck.

Monthly meetings and regional and national conventions offer members opportunities "to connect with people of common interests and concerns," he said, adding that he expected the country's economic crisis to continue to come up in discussions among members.

"The best support anyone can be given (to get through it) is the support of Christ through his church," he said.

"Through the rock-solid foundation of the sacraments — and primarily the Mass and confession — Legatus offers its members the most fundamental and practical means to become good Catholics and effective ambassadors in the marketplace," he said.

Legatus chapters around the country are independent of the local diocese but maintain a good relationship with the bishop, according to the organization. Non-Catholics are welcome at Legatus functions.

Rod McCaughey and his wife Betsy Irwin-McCaughey, belong to Legatus Manhattan and to St. David the King Church in West Windsor, N.J. McCaughey is the CEO of Residential Lending Services. Irwin-McCaughey is chief operation-risk officer of the Federal Reserve Bank.

"I find solace in my spirituality," McCaughey explained. "My faith helps me with the trials and tribulations of being in business. Frankly, I don't understand how someone can be in this business without faith, without a moral grounding. Faith is not just for bad times like this, but for every day, even the good times."

He said he leads his life and business "by the golden rule."

"Whenever people stray far from this key rule, it never bodes well for society. It becomes a free-for-all. Greed punishes itself," McCaughey said. "People become a means to an end rather than an end in and of itself as it should be."

When asked how her faith in Christ translates to Wall Street, Irwin-McCaughey said, "My faith in people is an extension of my faith in God. Legatus helps ensure fellowship among the members, which encourages a better more ethical marketplace."

She said at the organization's monthly meetings members pray the rosary, go to confession and attend Mass. They also have a dinner, "usually with a relevant Catholic speaker who comes in to talk about some aspect of the theology and its importance to business ethics," she said.

SPARING OVER THE SEPULCHER

Franciscan Brother Christophe watches from above as an Easter Mass is celebrated in the Church of the Holy Sepulcher in Jerusalem March 23. The church is built on the site believed to be the burial place of Jesus. A report published in the Israeli daily Haaretz Oct. 7 said a monastery on the church roof is in danger of collapse, but disputes between the Ethiopian Orthodox Church and the Coptic Orthodox Church have delayed repairs.

Franciscan calls monastery roof dispute in Holy Land nothing new

JERUSALEM (CNS) — A report saying that the Ethiopian Orthodox Church's Deir al-Sultan monastery on the roof of the Church of the Holy Sepulcher is in danger of collapse is just another manifestation of a long-standing dispute, said a Franciscan friar.

"This is an old, long-standing issue; a long-standing property dispute" between the Ethiopian Orthodox Church and the Coptic Orthodox Church, said Father Athanasius Macora, who monitors the Church of the Holy Sepulcher for the Franciscan Custody of the Holy Land.

"I don't think the danger is imminent but there is a problem which needs to be dealt with," said Father Macora.

He noted that the latest engineering report was initiated by the Ethiopian church, which is eager to have repairs made.

Parts of the report were published in the Israeli daily Haaretz Oct. 7. The article called the complex "a danger to human life."

The monastery, made up of two chapels, an open courtyard, four service and storage rooms, and a series of tiny mud-hut rooms inhabited by Ethiopian monks, is reminiscent of a small African village. All agree it is in poor shape.

However, while the Ethiopian Orthodox clergy inhabit the rooftop — often without access to water, electricity or heating in the winter — the Coptic church claims ownership of the area. The two churches have not managed to reach an agreement that would permit the renovations to move ahead.

Father Macora, who is also responsible for monitoring the Status Quo agreement at the Church of the Holy Sepulcher for the Franciscans, said the confrontation is a "classic dispute over property."

"If there were real danger I am sure the (Israeli) government would take an immediate position," he said.

The Status Quo is an agreement that regulates jurisdiction of and access to key Christian sites in Jerusalem for Catholic, Orthodox and other Christian communities. Among those sites is the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, where tradition holds that Jesus was buried.

In the meantime, Yaakov Salameh, head of the non-Jewish Department of the Israel Ministry of the Interior, said the Israeli government has offered to pay for and carry out the work but cannot move forward with any plan until the two churches reach an agreement.

"Each one of these churches has a country behind it and a wrong move could cause an international issue," said Salameh. "The situation has reached a difficult level."

Economy no excuse to delay solving health care crisis, CHA head says

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The nation's current economic crisis must not deter efforts to achieve health care coverage for the 47 million uninsured Americans, the president and CEO of the Catholic Health Association told a New York audience Oct. 20.

Sister Carol Keehan, a Daughter of Charity, delivered the third annual lecture in Catholic health care ethics at St. Catherine of Siena Church in New York.

The lecture and the annual Mass for the health care professions that preceded it are sponsored by the Dominican Friars Health Care Ministry of New York.

"We can continue to do bailouts, bridge loans, interest cuts and other prop-ups, but we will not have a renewed and vibrant economy without enacting health reform that covers everyone with a reasonable, basic package," she said.

"It doesn't matter whether your priority is the stock market or the poor or anywhere in between," Sister Carol Keehan. "We need effective and efficient health reform to help all of us."

The Catholic leader said it is "utterly incompatible with our pro-life agenda" that 9 million U.S. children are among the uninsured.

"What child doesn't deserve health care?" she asked. "What could possibly justify not giving a child health care?"

Sister Keehan cited a number of recent studies showing that only 7 percent of Americans "feel financially prepared for their future health needs" and that a quarter of cancer patients deplete all or most of their savings to pay for their care.

"When it comes to health care reform, the common good is at its best," she said. "We take care of not only the poor, the vulnerable, but ourselves best when we create a system that recognizes the dignity and worth of every single person."

FROM THE VATICAN

Science is risky when overtaken by desire to play God, pope says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Scientific research poses risks for humans when it is overtaken by profit-seeking or the desire to play God, Pope Benedict XVI said.

The pope said science alone cannot provide ethical principles and for that reason needs philosophy and theology to help guide it and guard it from risks.

He made the remarks Oct. 16 in an address to participants in a Rome conference on Pope John Paul II's 1998 encyclical, "Fides et Ratio" ("Faith and Reason").

Pope Benedict said his predecessor's encyclical rightly aimed at defending the strength of reason and its capacity to reach the truth.

In recent times, he said, scientific research has tended more toward discovering the secrets of nature than finding ultimate truths. In turn, this desire to know nature has been "transformed into the will to reproduce it," he said.

While the church does not fear the progress made by science and technology, it recognizes that such advances are not always directed toward the good of the human being.

"Easy profit or, worse yet, the arrogance of substituting the Creator, are sometimes a determining factor," he said. This is a form of pride that can be dangerous for the human race, he said.

"Philosophy and theology become, in this context, indispensable aids ... so that science does not proceed alone down an ambiguous path, full of the unexpected and not without risk," he said.

He said the church's position does not mean limiting scientific research or blocking its progress, but rather being vigilant so that faith and reason both maintain a sense of responsibility regarding science.

join in prayerful discernment of their upcoming vote. Perpetual adoration will be interrupted only by Mass. This is not a time for campaigning or discussion, just private adoration and prayer. For more information, contact the church office at (704) 334-2283.

GREENSBORO VICARIATE

GREENSBORO — All men of the Triad area are invited to participate in a short study of Pope Benedict XVI's second encyclical, "Spe Salvi" ("Saved by Hope"), Tuesdays at St. Joseph's House at Our Lady of Grace Church, 2205 W. Market St., from 6:30 to 7:30 a.m. On Oct. 28, the group will be discussing paragraphs 24-31. This event is sponsored by Regnum Christi. For more information, contact John Endredy at (336) 449-3656.

GREENSBORO — The Catholic Daughters of the Americas invite all Catholics in the Diocese of Charlotte to participate in White Ribbon Against Pornography Week, Oct. 26-Nov. 2. The Catholic Daughters request that participating parishioners wear a white ribbon to make people aware of the damage pornography — via the Internet, TV, movies, books and magazines — is causing in society.

GREENSBORO — A Men's Evening of Reflection will be held at Our Lady of Grace Church, 2205 W. Market St. Nov. 5, 6:30-8 p.m. This month's theme is "Never, Never, Ever Quit" and will feature a reflection on the virtue of perseverance in the lives of men who are husbands, fathers, workers and apostles. Pizza and refreshments will be served in the library at 6:30 p.m., followed by the talk in the church from 7 to 8 p.m. For more information, contact John Endredy at (336) 449-3656.

GREENSBORO — In keeping with the special Pauline year as declared by Pope Benedict XVI, a special dramatic presentation entitled "St. Paul: His Story" will be presented by Paulist Father James DiLuzio, a missionary, actor and singer, at St. Paul the Apostle Church, 2715 Horse Pen Creek Rd., Nov. 13, 7-9 p.m. Admittance is free. Father DiLuzio works out of New York City, traveling throughout the country with this powerful presentation on the life and work of St. Paul. For more information, contact Jeannine Martin at (336) 294-4696, extension 225.

HICKORY VICARIATE

HICKORY — The annual World Community Day ecumenical worship service will be held at Exodus Missionary Outreach Church, 1763 Highland Ave. NE, Nov. 7 at 7 p.m. This celebration will explore how we can reach out with God's love to those behind bars with the theme "God's Wisdom Set's Us Free." Guest speaker will be Deacon Scott Gilfillan from St. Joseph Catholic Church in Newton. He will speak about his experience in prison ministry. For more information, call Carole Marmorato at (828) 256-8956.

WINSTON-SALEM VICARIATE

CLEMMONS — Starting in January, Holy Family in Clemmons is hosting a new Homeschool Enrichment Program for Catholic homeschooling families. ## Vatican: Stop pressuring pope on Pope Pius XII's beatification

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican has asked those supporting and opposing the beatification of Pope Pius XII to stop pressuring Pope Benedict XVI on the issue.

The Vatican statement came after the latest public clash over whether Pope Pius did enough to help Jews during World War II.

Jesuit Father Peter Gumpel, one of the promoters of Pope Pius' sainthood cause, said in an interview Oct. 18 that Pope Benedict could not possibly travel to Israel until curators of the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in Jerusalem removed a photo caption stating that Pope Pius did nothing to condemn the Nazis and their slaughter of the Jews.

Father Gumpel said the caption was "an obvious historical falsification" and that as long as it remained, a papal visit to Israel "would be a scandal for Catholics."

But the Vatican spokesman, Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, reiterated the Vatican's objections to the Yad Vashem display, but said it was not a decisive obstacle to a papal trip.

Pope Benedict wants to travel to the Holy Land, but for now nothing has been planned, the spokesman said.

Father Lombardi emphasized that Pope Benedict has not signed the decree of heroic virtues of Pope Pius, the next step necessary for his sainthood cause to advance.

"That is the subject of study and reflection on (the pope's) part, and in this situation it is not appropriate to exercise pressure on him in one direction or the other," Father Lombardi said.

In recent months, many Catholic experts have expressed their strong hope that the sainthood cause for Pope Pius would be moved forward, after the Vatican Congregation for Saints' Causes completed its documentation work and unanimously recommended beatification.

At the same time, Jewish groups have reiterated their strong opposition to beatification of Pope Pius, saying it would set back Catholic-Jewish dialogue.

Vatican and other church officials, supported by some Jewish experts, have made recent highly publicized efforts to defend Pope Pius and his wartime record, saying that his behind-the-scenes efforts saved thousands of Jewish lives.

They have said Pope Pius was ultimately responsible for establishing a clandestine network of safe houses for people escaping Nazi persecution, utilizing the church's religious orders, communities, convents and seminaries — and even the pope's own summer residence outside Rome.

CORRECTIONS

In an Oct. 17 story, Deacon Louis Pais was reported as celebrating 25 years as a permanent deacon. It is actually 30 years.

In a Sept. 26 story, it was reported the Diocese of Charlotte purchased the land for St. Bernadette Mission in Linville. It was actually the congregation who purchased the land.

The Catholic News & Herald regrets the errors.

St. Pius X Church recognized for stewardship efforts

Archbishop Thomas J. Murphy Award, an award presented to the parish that best exemplifies an all-round approach to stewardship. The award was presented at the council's annual conference in Chicago Oct. 12-15.

The council was founded in 1962, through the patronage of Cardinal Joseph Ritter with the goal of promoting the concept of Christian stewardship.

This year, more than 1,200 people including bishops, pastors and parish leaders from at least 23 different countries attended the four-day conference; among them were parishioners from St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte and St. Paul the Apostle and St. Pius X churches in Greensboro.

"The application process for the Murphy award was a great way for us to review what has been working with our stewardship efforts and that which needed to be improved upon," said Msgr. Anthony Marcaccio, pastor of St. Pius X Church.

In terms of the criteria for the award, the parish has to have shown a long-term commitment to stewardship and excellence in every aspect of stewardship, according to Barbara Gaddy, associate director of development for the Diocese of Charlotte.

Gaddy credits the efforts of the pastoral staff and parish leadership team for supporting and encouraging stewardship as a way of life at St. Pius X Church. She also attributed much of the parish's stewardship success to the guidance of Msgr. Marcaccio, who "lives and preaches the message of stewardship in his parish," she said.

The parish, which consists of approximately 1,222 families, has assembled a stewardship strategic planning committee to look at the effectiveness of past stewardship efforts and set goals for the future, according to Pat Spivey, pastoral associate.

"The pastoral staff is really on fire and has a tremendous vision about where the parish can go in embracing stewardship as a way of life," said Gaddy.

Spivey said the conference offered practical ideas for increasing parish participation in stewardship by offering new approaches to publicity and new ways of exhibiting hospitality.

"I gained an appreciation for how St. Pius X parish is as a stewardship community and how it has developed over the years," said Anne Knapke, assistant principal of St. Pius X School and a member of the parish Youth Stewards in Action Committee. She said she plans to use what she learned at the conference to help her students grow in their appreciation for stewardship.

Knapke said the committee is working to increase communication among the youths of the parish, particularly by bridging the gap between those attending Catholic school and those attending public or private, non-Catholic schools.

"Each of us has a talent," said Knapke, "And without every person in our parish community, we would not be the community that we are."

Participants at this year's conference were asked to look at stewardship as a new way of parish life. The theme, "Evangelization and Stewardship in the Spirit of St. Paul," highlighted the concept of an evangelizing spirit that is present in every parishioner and in every dimension of the Catholic parish.

Throughout the conference, participants were reminded of the fervent way that St. Paul reached out to the early church by promoting evangelization and stewardship.

There was something for everyone at this year's conference, according to Gaddy.

"The speakers were inspiring and challenging, regardless of whether you were just getting into stewardship or you have been doing it for a long time," said Gaddy. "No matter where your parish is on its stewardship journey, you can learn something new."

Local Knights of Columbus council receives international recognition

MORGANTON — Knights of Columbus Father William T. McShea Council 9579 of Morganton has been named a Columbian Award winner for the 2007-08 fraternal year.

The announcement was made by the Knights' international headquarters in New Haven, Conn. John Gouldie, state deputy of the N.C. state council, presented the engraved plaque to Council 9579 at a special ceremony Oct. 13.

The award is presented for excellence in sponsorship of programs that serve families, church, youths and community as well as council members.

"Receiving this award is quite an honor. We are very pleased with this accomplishment," said Grand Knight John Lefebvre of Council 9579.

"The dedication of the principles and aims of the order shown by your officers and members is exemplified by the high standard of excellence you have achieved," said Supreme Knight Carl Anderson in a statement to Council 9579.

"At the same time, I encourage you to carry forward the enthusiasm to meet the challenges that will face the Knights of Columbus in the years ahead," said Anderson.

"May this award be a reminder and an inspiration to the members of your council to continue to promote the ideals of Columbianism for the good of the church, your community and the order," he said.

The Knights of Columbus is a Catholic fraternal organization with nearly 1.7 million members worldwide. In 2007, the Knights completed more than 68 million hours of volunteer service and donated $144.9 million to charitable and benevolent causes.

Annual retreat explores role of laity, discipleship

Featured speakers for this year's retreat were Susan Muto, author and co-founder of Epiphany Association, a resource center for postgraduate study in formative spirituality in Pennsylvania; and Capuchin Franciscan Father Roberto Martinez from Puerto Rico.

During her English-language talk, themed "Becoming Spiritually Mature," Muto said it was "the era of the laity," who, from the time of their first Communion, are called to transform the world into a "house of God."

"We are called to in-depth spiritual formation ... we are called to be examples of Catholic faith," she said.

Furthering the spiritual life of the laity requires study, and participation in retreats and classes, said Muto.

She encouraged also the study of those who have already walked in the ways of Christ.

"It is so important to read the classical spiritual masters of the church," said Muto.

During his Spanish-language talk, themed "Called to be Disciples," Father Martinez said he hoped to share his faith and encourage the Hispanic community to grow in theirs.

"Often the community is here without family," said Father Martinez. "They are alone, afraid of persecution. Church is a place to hold onto something."

Faith can bring rewards, but often requires sacrifice, he said.

"To be a Christian in the early church was a big commitment and it was counter-cultural," he said.

"Sacrifice can bring great joy," said Father Martinez. "The paradox includes joy you would never experience until you take up the cross. We need to remember that so we don't compromise."

Father Martinez noted the differences in how he is perceived when he wears his cassock as opposed to regular clothes. He admitted it is sometimes easier to appear in public without such a clear statement of his Catholic faith apparent to the world.

"It is sometimes in things like this, in the little ways where we compromise," he said. But "we can witness through physical things to open a door to begin dialogue."

"Walking through the Charlotte airport in my robe on this trip, I was stopped by several people — some Catholic, some not — and I saw others noticed and sometimes stared, especially children," he said.

Father Martinez encouraged his audience to witness their faith through such physical things as well as their actions.

"Don't compromise your values. Pray to be strong," he said.

Local couple attends Catholic medical conference, find community of support among peers

BY KATIE MOORE
STAFF WRITER

BALTIMORE — Maureen Kennedy retired from her career as an obstetrician/gynecologist in 2000 but she remembers all too well the challenges that Catholic medical professionals face on a daily basis.

When Kennedy and her husband Jim McGovern, a pediatric cardiologist, attended the Catholic Medical Association's 77th annual Educational Conference in Baltimore, Md., Oct. 9-11, they were relieved to meet other medical professionals who were dedicated to defending the culture of life in the medical field.

"You didn't have to worry about talking about natural family planning or being against abortion," said Kennedy, who attends St. Barnabas Church in Arden with her husband and their three children.

"There were no eggshells to walk on because everybody was on the same page," she said.

This year, the conference's theme was "Theology of the Body" and session topics focused on applying the teachings to various areas: understanding and healing interpersonal relationships, including the physician-patient relationship; raising and treating children; health and reproduction; and issues in aging.

"It was just really interesting how they could apply it ('Theology of the Body') to pediatrics, to geriatrics, to mid-life, to how we relate to our patients and certainly all the aspects of defending life in the medical world," said Kennedy.

"Theology of the Body" teaches us that we're not just a bunch of parts. We have a dignity because God gave us these bodies. And so really, it is about caring for the patient as a whole," she said.

The CMA is a national professional association, founded as the Catholic Physicians Guild by Cardinal William O'Connell in Boston in 1912.

Dr. John Brehany, executive director of the CMA, which draws members from the United States and Canada, said that approximately 320 people registered for the conference.

Dr. George Isajiw, of Upper Darby, Pa., the association's president in 1992-93, said the group's membership rolls plummeted after Pope Paul VI in 1968 issued "Humanae Vitae" ("Of Human Life"), his encyclical on artificial contraception and the role of procreation in marriage.

The 7,000-word encyclical upheld the church's long-standing prohibition on artificial contraception. Initially, it was thought that Pope Paul might support the use of birth control, and once the encyclical was released opposition rose throughout the church.

"When the (CMA) board voted to support 'Humanae Vitae,' we lost more than 50 percent of our members," Isajiw said. "The organization dropped down to just several hundred, but we've seen great growth in the last 10-15 years."

Membership is booming, thanks to younger health care professionals.

"We're getting an influx of younger members, men and women who are just starting their practices. Many are joining because of issues related to contraception, natural family planning," Isajiw said.

"It was very encouraging to see that there are people who are trying to be faithful and do the right thing not just medically, but for the patient as a whole," said Kennedy.

The original guild was established in order to educate Catholic physicians in church doctrine relating to the practice of medicine.

Today the CMA provides professional and spiritual support to Catholic physicians and medical students in order to maintain their Catholic values in their medical practices.

"My hope is that more physicians and medical people learn about this so that we can all sort of ban together," said Kennedy.

The conference concluded Oct. 11 with Baltimore Archbishop Edwin F. O'Brien celebrating an evening White Mass for health care professionals at the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

The White Mass draws its name from the traditional uniform color associated with the medical profession.

Next year's conference will be held in Springfield, Ill. Oct. 22-24, 2009. The theme will be the "Theology of Suffering: Bringing faith, hope, and love to the art of healing."

Diocese of Charlotte named in lawsuit

Diocese refutes priest's transfer was 'rushed'

CHARLOTTE — In a recently filed civil lawsuit, a Charlotte man claims he was sexually molested by a priest in Charlotte in 1999.

The suit names Capuchin Franciscan Father Robert Yurgel, who served in the Diocese of Charlotte at St. Matthew Church and Our Lady of Consolation Church in Charlotte during the late 1990s.

In April, Father Yurgel was arrested in New Jersey, where he was ministering in a hospital. At that time, he was returned to North Carolina to face charges of having sex with a minor.

He is currently free on bond and living outside North Carolina, and is being supervised by his religious order, the Capuchin Franciscans.

Except to refute one statement that was reported in the secular news about the lawsuit, the Diocese of Charlotte, through its spokesman David Hains, said the diocese would respond to the suit in due time. The refuted statement regards an allegation that Father Yurgel's transfer out of the diocese in 1999 was "rushed." Hains described the allegation as an "absolute falsehood."

Since the diocese adopted the U.S. bishops' "Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People" in 2002, more than 18,000 diocesan employees and church volunteers have attended the diocese's sex-abuse awareness training program, "Protecting God's Children."

The diocese conducts background checks on employees and volunteers to safeguard the young and the vulnerable. More than 3,800 background checks were conducted during the last fiscal year.

The training and background checks are ongoing.

In June 2002 at a meeting in Dallas, the U.S. bishops adopted the charter and its mandates for an annual audit and survey and also adopted the "Essential Norms" to assure that all dioceses adhere to the charter.

The charter also established the Office of Child and Youth Protection and the National Review Board to oversee compliance with the charter. The Diocese of Charlotte has been found in compliance with the charter.

The charter was updated in 2005, the norms in 2006. The charter and norms have Vatican approval.

NEED ASSISTANCE?

As a part of its commitment to support the U.S. bishops' "Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People," the Diocese of Charlotte has appointed a coordinator to assist survivors of sexual abuse.

The assistance coordinator can help survivors of abuse, whether the incident took place in the Diocese of Charlotte or in another diocese.

The current coordinator is David Harold. Contact him at (704) 370-3363 or dwharold@charlottediocese.org.

DIOCESAN REQUIREMENTS FOR REPORTING MINISTRY-RELATED SEXUAL ABUSE OF A MINOR

1. Any individual having actual knowledge of or reasonable cause to suspect an incident of ministry-related sexual abuse is to immediately report the incident to the Chancery.
2. The Chancery will then report the incident to the proper civil authorities. The individual reporting the incident to the Chancery will be notified of the particulars regarding the Chancery's filing of the incident with civil authorities.
3. This reporting requirement is not intended to supersede the right of an individual to make a report to civil authority, but is to ensure proper, complete and timely reporting. Should an individual choose to make a report to civil authority, a report is still to be made to the Chancery.

Variety of lay experts serve on U.S. bishops' National Review Board

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Two educators, a district court judge, a psychologist and a civic association leader are among those serving three-year terms on the National Review Board.

A judge and another psychologist also have been named to the board for terms beginning June 1, 2009.

Established by the bishops in 2002, the board reviews diocesan compliance with the "Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People," oversees diocesan audits on child protection policies and practices, and recommends ways to ensure child protection to dioceses and church-based agencies.

The recent additions to the board began their terms in June. They were:

— Ana Maria Catanazaro, an associate professor, director of public health programs and director of La Salle Neighborhood Nursing Center at La Salle University in Philadelphia. She also is a member of the Philadelphia Archdiocese's Review Board for the Protection of Children and Young People.

— Ruben Gallegos, who spent 33 years as an educator and currently is executive director of International Educational Services Inc., a Los Fresnos, Texas-based child care association for unaccompanied minors from Central America.

— Al Notzon III, recently retired as the director of the Alamo Area Council of Governments in Texas and chairman of the San Antonio Archdiocesan Review Board.

— Thomas Plante, professor of psychology at Santa Clara University and adjunct clinical associate professor of psychiatry and behavioral sciences at Stanford University School of Medicine.

— Judge Geraldine Rivera of the second judicial district of New Mexico's District Court.

Helping warm the body of Christ

Annual Blanket Banquet cares for record number of needy in Charlotte

CHARLOTTE — As the crowd at the Eucharistic Congress began to depart the Charlotte Convention Center, another crowd was gathering nearby.

More than 200 people were served by the fourth annual Blanket Banquet outside St. Peter Church in uptown Charlotte Oct. 4.

Volunteers from parishes around the Diocese of Charlotte collected and gave away blankets, clothing, sleeping bags and other items, including meals, to homeless individuals and people in need.

The Blanket Banquet began as a social action component to the Eucharistic Congress, according to Linda Flynn, this year's Blanket Banquet coordinator and a parishioner of St. Luke Church in Mint Hill.

"This event changes all of us," said Flynn. "We see our differences simply melt away as we celebrate being one family, one body in Christ."

Flynn said the Blanket Banquet was especially crucial this year with expected colder temperatures as well as the worsening economy.

Volunteers served more than 225 people, an increase of 50 percent from last year's Blanket Banquet.

Among them was an increase in women, three of whom were pregnant, said Flynn.

Many of those served expressed joy and gratitude, said Flynn, not only for the items and food but "for the respect shown to them, a simple recognition of their human dignity not common in their daily experience."

The volunteers also provided spiritual encouragement and practical advice on where to find assistance.

In 2007, there were approximately 5,000 homeless persons in the Charlotte area, according to a story in Charlotte Weekly.

As of June, Charlotte Mecklenburg Schools reported 2,493 homeless students, a 35 percent increase from two years ago.

"This event changes all of us. We see our differences melt away as we celebrate being one family, one body in Christ."

Dramatic stories in Bible inspire artists for centuries

situations," and the Bible is bursting with them.

Sitting in his top-floor office in the Vatican, Paolucci narrated visually inspiring biblical scenes: "Mary Magdalene, this attractive blonde — artists have painted her as a blonde; you have to let artists use their imaginations — who begins to cry and wipes Jesus' feet with her hair.

"The Bible is full of these situations that are by definition artistic," he said.

The collections housed in the Vatican Museums are by no means limited to religious art, but obviously the place is a treasure-trove of sacred images.

Paolucci does not buy the idea that some works of religious art were motivated by a challenge to visually educate Christians in the faith and others were motivated simply by a search for beauty.

"For Catholic artists, aesthetics coincides precisely with faith — they are the same thing," he said. "Ancient artists, especially, were convinced that in order to recount the things of God, religious truths, one must use beauty."

The more beautiful a work, he said, the closer it comes to showing people something about God.

Sistine Chapel

The most famous part of the Vatican Museums — the Sistine Chapel — is a perfect example of beauty placed at the service of education in the faith.

"Because it was a papal chapel, it had to show how the church of Rome accepted the ancient Scriptures, the Hebrew Scriptures, and joined them to the New Testament," Paolucci said.

The frescoes on the chapel's south wall depict scenes from the life of Moses, the giver of the law who led his people out of slavery in Egypt to new life in the Promised Land; the north wall frescoes illustrate parallel scenes from the life of Jesus, who revealed the new commandment and frees people from their slavery to sin, giving them new life.

The side walls were painted in 1481-83.

"Then, in 1508 — 500 years ago — Michelangelo arrives and does the ceiling," Paolucci said.

"With that, the chapel presents a synthesis of the entirety of Christian theology: the law of Moses and the Old Testament on one wall; the new command of Christ on the opposite wall; the creation of the world overhead; and, in front of us, that which awaits us after death — the Last Judgment," he said.

"The chapel is the synthesis of the catechism," Paolucci said.

The perfect symbol

When pressed, Paolucci said his favorite Old Testament-themed art in the Vatican Museums is Sandro Botticelli's

This is a detail from Sandro Botticelli's "The Trials of Moses," painted on the south wall of the Sistine Chapel at the Vatican.

"The Trials of Moses," which is one of the panels on the south wall of the Sistine Chapel.

The fresco shows several scenes from the second and third chapters of Exodus.

"Botticelli's work is very elegant, refined," he said.

As for a work inspired by a New Testament story, Paolucci responded even before the question was finished: "I have no doubts. It's 'The Deposition of Christ' by Caravaggio."

The massive oil painting, executed at the beginning of the 1600s, shows the lifeless body of Jesus taken down from the cross by Nicodemus and the apostle John in the presence of the Blessed Virgin Mary, Mary Magdalene and Mary the wife of Clopas.

The face of the crucified Jesus is ashen, but his body — soon to be resurrected — is bathed in light.

In Christian art, Paolucci said, the two most popular themes are those surrounding the birth of Jesus and those surrounding his death and resurrection.

"The Nativity scene and the crucified Jesus are everywhere in art throughout the world," he said. "They are so popular because they are the synthesis of our religion: Jesus was born and died on the cross, offering his blood as a sacrifice for the salvation of all men and women."

Christian artists are not the only ones who have found in the crucifixion the perfect symbol of the "terrible, dramatic" death of an innocent, Paolucci said.

The Vatican Museums' Collection of Contemporary Religious Art includes "Christ and the Painter," just one of the crucifixion scenes painted by the Jewish artist Marc Chagall.

The contemporary collection is growing despite the fact that "there are not many world-famous artists today interested in religious themes," he said.

The most prolific period for biblical-themed art was the Middle Ages, he said, because "it was a very religious time. People were really afraid of hell because of the Black Death."

Pope emphasizes that theology, Scripture go hand in hand

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — In his first address to the world Synod of Bishops on the Bible, Pope Benedict XVI underlined that theology and Scriptures must go hand in hand with exegetical studies.

When exegesis — critical analysis or interpretation — does not appeal to theology or when Scripture is not the soul of theology or theology is not rooted in the Scriptures, then there is a problem with the way sacred writings are being interpreted, the pope said during the synod Oct. 14.

Canadian Basilian Father Thomas Rosica, the synod's English-language briefing officer, told reporters Oct. 14 that in the pope's seven-minute speech on the exegesis of the Bible "he spoke about the three methodological elements of interpretation, the unity of all Scriptures and the living tradition of the church that's present as we read the Scriptures."

The Vatican newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano, said the pope's talk echoed the 1993 document, "The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church," issued by the Pontifical Biblical Commission, which was headed by then-Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, now the pope. That document commented on the strengths and potential weaknesses of a variety of approaches currently found in biblical scholarship.

In his synod talk, the pope said the historical-critical method of interpretation of Scriptures has helped people understand that sacred texts are not myths, but true history, and the method helps scholars understand the "deep unity of all of Scripture," the newspaper said in its Oct. 15 edition.

However, an exegesis that exclusively uses a historical-critical method carries with it great risks, he said.

L'Osservatore Romano reported the pope said such an interpretation could lead people to believe the Bible is only a book about the past.

He said if the hermeneutics of faith disappears and is replaced by a positivistic or secular hermeneutics, then the divine does not appear in history and, as is happening in the work of some biblical scholars in Germany, the resurrection of Christ is refuted.

Pope Benedict sees no reason for theology and exegesis to be separated, L'Osservatore Romano said.

Presidential candidates and education issues

plenty of differences.

And while they tend to speak primarily of public schools, Catholic school officials are paying attention to their promises, looking for what a future administration may emphasize.

Republican Sen. John McCain and Democratic Sen. Barack Obama agree on the importance of having qualified teachers in the classroom and the need to make college tuition more affordable. They disagree on school choice, how to improve teacher quality and how to fund public education.

In tackling educational reform, they plan to keep in place, although in a changed form, the No Child Left Behind Act, which was enacted in 2002 and is currently up for reauthorization.

The candidates see weaknesses in the legislation requiring states to hold schools and districts accountable for improving student achievement, but they propose different ways to fix it.

Marie Powell, executive director of the U.S. bishops' Office of Catholic Education, told Catholic News Service she will be closely following the reauthorization, which was originally slated for this year.

She said she realizes the reauthorization won't be the top priority of a new administration, but she hopes that when it resurfaces before Congress, it will be "restored to its original purpose of equitability," meaning it should benefit students and teachers from public and private schools and not bar those in private schools from getting the services they need.

Though both candidates say they would make changes to the No Child Left Behind legislation, they have not released specific plans.

Although McCain voted for the law he has been critical of its effectiveness. One change he proposes would make it easier for students in failing schools to receive tutoring after school through private companies.

Obama, who also has been critical of the legislation, has described it as ineffective and inadequately funded.

He faults it for using what he says are poorly designed tests to measure failing schools and said the schools that need improvement should get support, not the punishment currently set up by the law, which includes firing teachers and principals, closing schools or turning them over to a private firm, a charter operator or the state.

Choice and charters

While educators across the country will be looking to see a new direction, if any, for No Child Left Behind, Catholic school officials also are keeping a keen eye on school-choice initiatives — an issue on which the candidates disagree.

McCain has stated his support for school choice, but critics say he has failed to outline specifics of what he would do other than expand federally funded opportunity scholarships in Washington for low-income students.

The Washington scholarship program, which provides vouchers to almost 2,000 students, many of whom attend Catholic schools, is in its final year and has an uncertain future unless it is reauthorized by Congress.

Obama favors limited school choice that gives students the option of attending a charter school. During a Sept. 9 speech at a public school in Ohio, he said he would double the funding for charter schools to $400 million a year.

Charter schools, publicly funded but privately operated, have been unpopular with teachers unions who say these schools take funds and students from public schools. Although national teachers unions have endorsed Obama, he has split with them on this issue and on his proposal of incentive payment for successful teachers, something McCain similarly endorses.

In their 2007 document, "Forming Consciences for Faithful Citizenship: A Call to Political Responsibility," the U.S. bishops emphasize that parents should be able to choose the best education for their children and that the government, through tax credits and scholarships, "should help provide resources for parents, especially those of modest means."

and educational research for the National Catholic Educational Association, said her office is "not hoping for the (next) president to wave a magic wand" when it comes to school-choice initiatives.

In previous years, she said, candidates "promised school choice and it never came to be."

She is slightly more optimistic about educational tax credits where individuals and corporations can donate funds to be used for school tuition or other educational expenses.

But with the current state of the economy, she told CNS she also fears tax credits are "not shining brightly on the horizon."

Catholic schools, too

In their higher education proposals, the candidates want to help students better afford college tuition, but they offer different ways to that end.

Obama has proposed issuing a tax credit to offset $4,000 in college tuition in exchange for 100 hours of community service. He has proposed overhauling the federal student loan program and expanding the Peace Corps, AmeriCorps and other national service programs.

McCain supports an increase in Pell grants — federal scholarships based on family need — and he also backs expanding low-interest college loans for middle-class families.

Sister McDonald noted that although "education is a small part of both parties' platforms" Catholic school officials want to be "on the radar screen" during the election year.

That's why the NCEA submitted statements to the national platform committees of both parties stating their support for school choice and educational reform that helps all students and teachers.

"We are an important part of American education and we want fair treatment for our students and acknowledgement of what we do," said Sister McDonald, stressing the work Catholic schools do with lower-income and non-Catholic students.

Powell also said Catholic school officials will continue to promote themselves to political leaders as a reminder of everything that Catholic schools do.

"We're not just a fringe group," she added.

Bishop Wenski seeks balanced, humane immigration policy in 2008

WASHINGTON(CNS)—Lamenting that illegal immigration has been largely unaddressed during the presidential campaign, Bishop Thomas G. Wenski of Orlando, Fla., said the new White House administration and Congress must confront the issue and develop a consistent, effective and humane policy that bridges political divisions.

Writing in The Washington Post Oct. 20, Bishop Wenski, chairman of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops' Committee on International Justice and Peace and a consultant to the conference's Committee on Migration, said the current enforcement-only approach to illegal immigration is ineffective and contrary to national interests.

"In truth, intermittent work-site raids, increased local law enforcement involvement and the creation of a wall along parts of our southern border, among other efforts, have done little to address the challenges presented by illegal immigration," Bishop Wenski wrote in an opinion piece.

While high-profile work-site raids across the country "meet the political need to show government's law enforcement's capabilities," they have had a minimal impact on the number of undocumented workers in the country, he said.

Such efforts have done little more than cause what Bishop Wenski termed "dislocation and disruption in immigrant communities" while victimizing permanent U.S. residents and citizens, including children.

It is doubtful that stringent enforcement actions will lead to a mass exodus of illegal and legal immigrants, as some organizations that oppose immigration hope, Bishop Wenski said.

"What (those opposing immigration) do not acknowledge is that 70 percent of the undocumented have lived in this country for five years or longer and have no home to return to," he said.

"These people identify themselves more as Americans than anything else and would rather live here in the shadows than take their U.S.-citizen children back to a place they do not know," the bishop said.

Not addressing the immigration issue will elevate tensions in states and local communities and "tacitly affirm the acceptance of a hidden and permanent underclass in our country," Bishop Wenski added.

Hollywood screenwriter returns to Cleveland, turns life over to God

BY NANCY ERIKSON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

CLEVELAND — The Gospel of Luke's prodigal son has nothing on Joe Eszterhas.

A self-described "Hollywood animal," Eszterhas is best known for writing such adult-themed thrillers as "Basic Instinct" and "Jagged Edge." He is a guy who seemed to live his earlier life as if the seven deadly sins were a personal to-do list.

But then Eszterhas found God. Or as Eszterhas writes in his latest memoir, "Crossbearer," God found him.

Today, the man who once was the center of attention at exclusive Hollywood restaurants, enjoys the easygoing community spirit of sharing a meal with his wife, Naomi, and the couple's four sons at a Lenten fish fry at Holy Angels Church, where he often carries the cross at Mass.

A screenwriter who describes his younger self as arrogant and full of hubris now reads the works of Trappist Father Thomas Merton and Dutch-born Father Henri Nouwen for spiritual guidance.

On the coffee table in his home is the latest book about Jesus' life from former vampire novelist Anne Rice, another notorious writer who reclaimed her Catholic faith.

Days that once started and ended with cigarettes and gin, now are filled with prayer and quiet walks in nature.

"I have to tell you overwhelmingly, in the seven years since God has entered my heart, or since I opened my heart enough for God to enter it, I wake up in a totally different way," Eszterhas said.

"I have a great sense day to day of inspiration," he said.

Born in 1944 in Hungary, Eszterhas grew up in a post-World War II refugee camp before moving with his Catholic parents when he was 7 to Cleveland's near west side, where he often served as an altar boy at St. Emeric Church.

His father was editor of a Hungarian Catholic newspaper and his mother grew beautiful roses and had a strong devotion to Mary. Still, life for his family in what he calls the "strudel ghetto" was difficult.

He attended Catholic high school, but acknowledges his near misses with juvenile delinquency.

Early in his writing career he worked as a reporter in Cleveland covering the crime beat, witnessing some of the grisliest, most violent stories in the city. Those tales, coupled with what he witnessed in the refugee camp, were the fodder for his lucrative screenwriting career.

Meanwhile, Eszterhas had become what he called a functional alcoholic. He began smoking at 12, drinking at 14. He used tequila and gin and four packs of cigarettes a day to "fuel" his writing.

He also experienced deep pain in his life. His mother suffered from mental illness and later died from cancer, an event that further distanced him from God. Eszterhas was close to his father, but their relationship was never the same again after his father was exposed as having been a writer of Nazi propaganda during World War II.

He never was deported, Eszterhas said, but he couldn't help wondering if his father's hateful words inspired someone to commit violent acts against others.

"I really couldn't forgive him, even as he died," Eszterhas said. "I think I finally forgave him when God came into my heart."

Seven years ago he and Naomi, also a Catholic with a special devotion to Mary, decided to move to Geauga County, east of Cleveland, to raise their sons with more traditional values. They also wanted to get away from what he felt were Hollywood's negative influences.

It was home, so to speak, and it became the setting for his new relationship with God.

Shortly afterward Eszterhas was diagnosed with throat cancer. Surgery left him with a tracheotomy and unable to speak, and his doctor warned him he could never smoke or drink again.

To fight his cravings, he started walking every day, which took some of the edge off. One summer day in 2001 on his walk, the cravings were terrible. He became filled with frustration and despair, sat down and started to sob.

"I heard a voice inside me that said, 'Please, God, help me.' And even as I heard it, I thought to myself, 'What is this?'" he said. "But then I heard the voice again and I realized it was something inside my own heart that was praying for the first time since I'd been a boy."

Describing himself as a "baby Catholic," Eszterhas said after that day battling addiction didn't become easier but he felt renewed strength.

At first, he was cautious about rekindling his relationship with God.

"I didn't even ask God for a while to save my life and to let me be around my family," he said. "I asked God to help me with my addictions. And he did."

"But then I thought to myself finally after weeks and maybe some months that God did truly love me and that I felt that I could ask God to save my life," he said.

Since then, he has fought against glamorizing smoking in movies. He also has campaigned to bring more family-oriented and faith-oriented entertainment into the movies.

At home, he has devoted his life to being the best father and husband he can. He also strives daily to deepen his relationship with Christ.

"I am generally moved when I carry the cross and I carry it at Holy Angels a lot because I feel it's a real honor to carry it," he said. "I do feel like I'm carrying Christ on the cross."

Hate the sin, love the sinner

BY JEFF HEDGLEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

In 22 years of professional ministry, I've learned there is one truth that people consistently find hard to believe: God loves them in the midst of their sin. This is true even for me.

Events in my life sent me seeking counseling in the early 1990s. One evening, partly as a result of the counseling, I had what I'd describe as a fight with myself.

It was a battle of two thoughts. In one corner was my long-held belief that my sin made me a bad person. In the other corner was the up-and-coming challenger that said it is my actions that are bad, not me.

This radical new idea rocked my world. Every time I took a swing at this new thought, it would land a punch in my midsection in the form of Scripture verses that popped into my head.

One verse was Genesis 1:31: "I looked at everything he had made, and found it very good."

This told me that everything God made is not just OK, but very good. Since I am a creation of God, I too must be very good.

To that I countered that sin characterizes things. Sin takes away the good that brings in the bad. If I am bad and God is good, how can God love me?

After much more sparring came the knockout punch, which is found in this Sunday's second reading: "But God proves his love for us in that while we were still sinners Christ died for us."

Through this verse I began to understand that my sinful actions were bad, but God always sees me as good and worthy of his love. This revelation changed everything for me.

After many ensuing years of reflection on this truth, it has finally sunk in that even in the midst of the worst of my sins, God loves me the same as when I walk down the aisle to receive Communion.

When I share this revelation with others it usually draws skepticism, but this is why the message of Jesus is good news!

God doesn't wait for us to stop sinning before he loves us. God's love is always there. All we have to do is open our hearts and let his love in.

poignant moments, some surprises in new film about late pope

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Pope John Paul II was lightly wounded by a knife-wielding priest in Portugal in 1982, one year after a gunman tried to kill him in St. Peter's Square, according to one of the pope's closest aides.

The disclosure came in a biographical film screened for the first time at the Vatican on Oct. 16, the 30th anniversary of Pope John Paul II's election. Pope Benedict XVI and many of the world's bishops were in attendance.

Titled "Testimony," the film is based on a book of memoirs by Cardinal Stanislaw Dziwisz of Krakow, Poland, who was the late pope's personal secretary for 39 years, until the pope's death in 2005.

In the film, Cardinal Dziwisz recalled that the pope went to the Marian sanctuary of Fatima, Portugal, in 1982 to thank Mary for saving his life in the 1981 shooting. During an evening ceremony, a priest carrying a large knife lunged toward the pontiff.

At the time, Vatican officials said the pope was unharmed and was only informed about the incident the next day.

In the film, Cardinal Dziwisz said the pope was in fact able to carry on with the prayer service and the rest of his schedule in Fatima.

"It was only when we returned to his room that I saw blood on his vestments," the cardinal added.

He did not elaborate, but other Vatican sources said the pope may have been superficially wounded in the attack.

The 90-minute film, narrated in English by the actor Michael York but dubbed in Italian for the Vatican screening, used actors to depict scenes from the pope's life along with historical video footage and still photographs.

Cardinal Dziwisz recounted how he and aides would spirit the pope out of the Vatican on secret outings to the mountains near Rome, sometimes hiding the pontiff behind an opened newspaper in the back of a car.

Pope Benedict XVI embraces Cardinal Stanislaw Dziwisz of Krakow, Poland after the debut of a new film on the life of the late Pope John Paul II during a special screening at the Vatican Oct. 16.

Dziwisz said the woman was possessed, and only when the pope told her he would celebrate a Mass for her did she suddenly become calm.

Some of the film's most poignant moments came when Cardinal Dziwisz revealed simple facts about the pope's day-to-day life in the Vatican: how each morning he read the prayer intentions that had been sent to him and placed on his kneeler, then spent a long time praying for them; how he was upset by the fact that homeless people were sleeping on the Vatican's doorstep, and so asked Blessed Mother Teresa to open a charity shelter inside the Vatican; and how he brought Polish traditions to the Vatican, especially at Christmas.

The pope would sing aloud at least one Christmas song a day for several weeks, beginning Christmas Eve, he said.

The film drew the biggest round of applause when it showed then-Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger — now Pope Benedict XVI — embracing the pope many years ago.

At the end of the screening, Pope Benedict addressed the several thousand people in the Vatican's audience hall and told them the film had allowed them all to relive the moving story of Pope John Paul, who "from heaven is certainly with us."

"The film reveals Pope John Paul's human simplicity, his resolute courage and finally his suffering, faced right up to the end with the strength of a mountaineer and the patience of a humble servant of the Gospel," he said.

Catanoso, a second-generation Italian-American journalist in the Triad area, wrote the book after learning he is related to St. Gaetano Catanoso, a southern Italian priest who died in 1963 and was canonized Oct. 23, 2005.

Catanoso and relatives attended the canonization ceremony, during which Padre Catanoso and four others became the first group of saints proclaimed by Pope Benedict XVI.

Priest's meditations on CDs aim to help people listen for God's voice

INDIANAPOLIS (CNS) — A popular saying reminds people that "good things come in threes."

That saying could apply to "Pathways to Prayer," a three-volume set of CDs featuring guided imagery meditations by Father James Farrell, the new director of Our Lady of Fatima Retreat House in Indianapolis. The recordings of his soothing voice are set to background music elements with nature sounds to enhance the listener's meditation experience.

They were created to help people grow closer to Jesus by spending quiet time listening for God's voice, Father Farrell explained in an interview.

Since October 1975, the priest has been a frequent retreat presenter and has conducted parish missions. Through the years, his guided imagery meditations have become popular with retreatants.

A note on the CD jacket suggests that people "try to create a space for solitude" while listening to the CDs, whether at home or during walks in nature.

Each guided meditation concludes with calming instrumental music to give listeners time to slowly return to the present moment after their virtual spiritual journey.

In volume I, "you meet with Jesus on the porch and have a little conversation with him," Father Farrell said. "He wants to know how things are going in your life right now. It's an opportunity to talk to Jesus directly about issues and concerns — things that may be weighing on you — and an opportunity to listen for Jesus' response to your needs and petitions."

The second CD features Father Farrell's narrative of Jesus visiting a person at home.

"Jesus comes to your home and you give him a tour of your house," Father Farrell explained. "Then you take Jesus to your favorite place in the house and have a conversation with him there about your life and your family. It's an opportunity to grow in love for Jesus and realize that he really is a part of your life."

The third CD, released earlier this year, focuses on getting to know Jesus in this life and spending eternal life with God. It "is built around the theme of a covered bridge," Father Farrell said. "You meet Jesus on the covered bridge then do a little life review."

"In the course of the conversation, Jesus tells you that he came from the other side of the bridge, that there is a time for life on both sides of the bridge, and that when it is your time to come to the other side of the bridge he will invite you and you will go with him," he said.

The theme applies to "any kind of a rite of passage in our life," he said. "Whether we are moving through an illness or moving through some other life change, we are letting go of some things and embracing something new. It's an opportunity to walk through that covered bridge and discover that Jesus is on the other side of that passageway just as he has been on the side that you are on now."

'A gifted and talented missionary'

Glenmary Father Bob Bond, pastor and former editor, dies at 75

CINCINNATI — Glenmary Father Bob Bond, a priest who had served in the Diocese of Charlotte, died Sept. 1, 2008, at Blue Ash Hospice in Cincinnati, Ohio, after a brief illness.

He was buried at Gate of Heaven Cemetery in Cincinnati Sept. 10.

A native of Cincinnati, Father Bond had been a Glenmary Home Missioner for more than 50 years.

Ordained as a priest in 1960, Father Bond taught theology and liturgy in Glenmary's formation program during the 1960s after receiving a doctorate in sacred theology from the Pontifical University of St. Thomas in Rome, Italy, in 1962.

His hands-on mission work began and ended in the Appalachian Mountains. His assignments took him to Kentucky, Oklahoma, Virginia and North Carolina — in Murphy (1963-64), Boone (1969) and Andrews (1998-2002).

Upon retiring in 2002, Father Bond took up residence in Burnsville, where he lived until moving to Glenmary Headquarters in Cincinnati in summer 2008.

Father Bond also led Glenmary's mission office from 1980 until 1986, and served as editor of the quarterly magazine, Glenmary Challenge, from 1980 until 1993.

He was an accomplished photographer and writer, and his skills were recognized with awards from national and local professional organizations such as the Catholic Press Association and the Cincinnati Editor's Association.

"Father Bob was a gifted and talented missionary who served Glenmary, and most importantly the people of the home missions, in a variety of ministries — as pastor, as director of the mission office and as editor of Glenmary Challenge," said Glenmary Father Dan Dorsey, president of Glenmary.

"His creativity in his mission work allowed him to touch the lives of all those — Catholics and non-Catholics — living in the mission counties he served," said Father Dorsey.

That creativity showed itself in the ways he used to introduce himself and make contacts within a county.

He was a motorcycle-riding priest who wrote both news articles and columns on Catholicism for local newspapers, or produced local television programs or filled a slot on local radio programs answering questions about Catholicism.

His parishioners and the people of the county he was serving could find him playing softball and tennis on local teams or bowling with the local league.

His goal was to call together and serve the Catholic mission community and connect those communities to the larger county.

Wherever his ministry assignments led him, he carried with him a desire to educate, whether by offering classes on computers to youth or organizing and leading annual shopping trips for elementary-aged children each Christmas.

While in Andrews, Father Bond repaired old computers donated by friends and gave them to local families and charities.

He also tutored children and adults to help them become computer literate because, as he said in 1999, "I don't like to treat the symptoms but the causes. People today are not going to get a job without computer skills."

On Sept. 25, 2007, in honor of his 75th birthday, Father Bond's work in the home missions and his contributions to the larger church were recognized on the floor of the U.S. House of Representatives by Rep. Virginia Foxx of North Carolina.

Foxx spoke of Father Bond's work, saying he "typified the church's call to reach out to those in need and share the love of Christ. He was truly ahead of his time in his faithful efforts to bring the power of God's love to those who might never darken the door of a church."

Father Bond is survived by three brothers, nieces, nephews, his fellow missionaries and friends.

Memorials may be made to Glenmary Home Missioners, P.O. Box 465618, Cincinnati, OH 45246.

An invitation to pray

Upcoming novena a time to reflect, discern, decide

For more than two years we have been hearing from Independents, Republicans and Democrats as to what they claim to be their positions, beliefs and policies. Many people do not feel entirely comfortable with any one party's plan.

However, whether we like it or not, one party will be in power and pursuing its agenda in the White House come Jan. 20, 2009.

Over the last several months, there has been an escalation in rhetoric between the candidates, the parties and their supporters regarding the issue of abortion and other life issues, and which candidate and party has the "right" approach to these problems.

Sadly, the rhetoric has become so overpowering that the din is deafening.

When I was in the seminary, a priest during a homily made the following observation: "The devil does not care whether we are pro-life or pro-abortion. He only cares that we hate."

The point is that if we allow our approach to abortion to be guided by anger and hatred for those who disagree with us, then Satan wins.

If God is love, as we Catholics certainly believe he is, then to act in a manner that is opposed to love is to act as opposed to God.

So the question becomes this: How does one who wants to be a faithful Catholic and do what God has called us to do make the right choice?

We all need to be sure that we have studied the teachings of the Catholic Church and have prayed devoutly.

Each of us must make well-informed decisions when we enter the voting booth to cast our votes for the candidates and issues.

I would suggest that the time has come for us to set aside the candidates' stump speeches, the "spin doctors" and advertising gimmicks.

Once we have read and understood what God has revealed through sacred Scripture and the constant teaching of the church, which can be found in the catechism, it is time to turn off the din and listen again.

Listen to whom? Listen to God.

If we are true believers and we want to follow what God has truly asked us to do with this very important matter, it's time that we ask him again about what we have studied.

Thus, I make a concrete proposal and invitation. St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte will begin a novena of prayerful eucharistic adoration on Sunday, Oct. 26 following the 12:30 p.m. Mass.

The novena will end Monday, Nov. 3, with Benediction at 7 p.m.

This time of adoration will continue around the clock, interrupted only by holy Mass.

During this time, everyone is invited to join in prayerful discernment of their upcoming vote.

This is not a time for campaigning or discussions. No placards or literature that pushes one side or another will be displayed.

Rather, it will be a time of private adoration and prayer.

For too long we have been inundated with the noise of partisan politics and bickering. Now is the time to quiet the noise.

So, because we believe the Eucharist is truly the Body, Blood, Soul and Divinity of Jesus Christ, present among us, come and pray. Let us set aside anything that may have divided us and ask love himself to guide us to do his will.

So, bring your Bible and your catechism, and pray.

May the Sacred Heart of Jesus, in the Most Blessed Sacrament, be praised, adored and loved, with grateful affection at every moment in all the tabernacles of the world, even until the end of time. Amen.

The people of life and for life

Catholics are called on to oppose the culture of death

During the month of October, we have been praying and working to promote a culture of life throughout our country.

Respect Life Sunday and the entire Respect Life Month remind us to thank God for the gift of life we receive from a loving Creator.

In his 1995 encyclical, "Evangelium Vitae" ("The Gospel of Life"), Pope John Paul II encouraged us to use all means at our disposal to promote the culture of life, including personal witness, various forms of volunteer work, social activity and political commitment.

Our activity on behalf of life is a particularly pressing need at the present time, the late pope wrote, because "the 'culture of death' so forcefully opposes the 'culture of life' and often seems to have the upper hand" (n. 87).

Personal witness, volunteer work and social activity

The personal witnesses, volunteer works and social activities to promote the culture of life, of which Pope John Paul wrote, are carried out in many different ways on behalf of the unborn by the faithful of our diocese.

During the course of the year, Catholics in our diocese give personal witness in support of the unborn through participation in Life Chains on the first Sunday of October (Respect Life Sunday), in the annual "40 Days for Life" campaign and in other peaceful prayer vigils at abortion clinics.

Parishes hold baby showers for pregnancy centers, where some parishioners volunteer to work.

Rachel's Vineyard retreats for post-abortion healing are held in our diocese.

Newborn children are provided loving homes through the adoption services of Catholic Social Services of the Diocese of Charlotte.

Many Catholics participate in the great Right to Life marches that take place in January in Charlotte, Raleigh and Washington, D.C.

Political commitment

The Holy Father also wrote about the need for us to promote a culture of life through our political commitment. We are expected to act in the political arena to support the right to life of the unborn.

The Catholic bishops of the United States have written about our political responsibility in this area in the document, "Forming Consciences for Faithful Citizenship."

Quotes from that document show that ending the grave injustice committed against the innocent unborn by abortion is the preeminent issue of our time.

Not all the issues we may consider in an election year have equal weight. "Some involve matters of intrinsic evil that can never be supported" (n. 90).

"A prime example is the intentional taking of innocent human life, as in abortion and euthanasia. In our nation 'abortion and euthanasia have become preeminent threats to human dignity because they directly attack life itself, the most fundamental human good and the condition for all others'" (n. 22).

"The direct and intentional destruction of innocent human life from the moment of conception until natural death is always wrong and is not just one issue among many. It must always be opposed" (n. 28).

"As Catholics we are not single issue voters. A candidate's position on single issue is not sufficient to guarantee a voter's support.

"Yet a candidate's position on single issue that involves an intrinsic evil such as support for legal abortion or the promotion of racism, may legitimately lead a voter to disqualify a candidate from receiving support" (n. 42).

Catholics can legitimately expect candidates to "address the preeminent requirement to protect the weakest in our midst — innocent unborn children — by restricting and bringing to an end the destruction of unborn children through abortion" (n. 90).

People of life and for life

Through prayer and personal witness, volunteer work, social activity and political commitment, we continue to promote a culture of life.

Pope John Paul reminded us in his encyclical that "we are the people of life and for life" (n. 78).

Let us always stand on the side of the unborn, the weakest and most defenseless members of our human family, and through all the means available to us defend their right to life.

Ignorance is not bliss when it comes to voting

Why Catholics have a moral responsibility to stay politically informed

A staffer from a satellite-based radio program recently interviewed people on the streets of Harlem, N.Y., to see how they are going to vote in the upcoming presidential election.

When he intentionally linked the identity of one candidate with the policies of the opposing candidate, the interviewees didn't bat an eye.

When one man was asked what he cared most about Sen. Barack Obama — whether it was that he was pro-life or that he wanted to keep the troops in Iraq — he responded that he was in favor of Obama's support of keeping the troops in Iraq. He then went on to say that he also agreed with his stance against embryonic stem-cell research.

Not surprisingly, that same interviewee also thought that Obama had chosen Gov. Sarah Palin as his vice presidential running mate.

You don't have to be a political analyst or an evening news junkie to recognize these jarring inaccuracies.

It's baffling to me that anyone could claim to be adamantly in favor of a particular candidate while at the same time be completely unaware of where he or she stands on key political issues.

Knowing the issues and staying informed is our responsibility and duty as American citizens. Voting in accordance with Catholic social teaching is our moral responsibility as faithful Catholics.

"In the Catholic tradition, responsible citizenship is a virtue, and participation in political life is a moral obligation," according to the document "Forming Consciences for Faithful Citizenship," a call to responsibility from the U.S. bishops.

As American citizens, we have the right to vote, but with that right also comes responsibility.

In a letter concerning Catholics in political life, Msgr. William P. Fay, general secretary of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, stated, "The separation of church and state does not require division between belief and public action, between moral principles and political choices, but protects the right of believers and religious groups to practice their faith and act on their values in public life."

Part of our moral obligation as Catholics is to know where the church stands on important political issues. Furthermore, we are obligated to know where the candidates stand in regard to church teachings.

Now more than ever, there are resources available that make it easy for Catholics and all voters to find out where the candidates stand in regard to these teachings.

On a local level, the Catholic bishops in North Carolina conducted a survey of N.C. political candidates relating to Catholic social teaching. To view the survey results, visit www.charlottediocese.org. To read the U.S. bishops' document on faithful citizenship, visit www.faithfulcitizenship.org.

When it comes time to vote on Nov. 4, our decisions as faithful Catholic citizens should stem from thoughtful and careful consideration of where the candidates stand in relation to Catholic teaching. When asked why we are voting for a particular candidate, we should be able to back our choice with solid answers about what that candidate believes — and what we believe.

Christ's humility shows love is powerful, pope says at audience

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Christ's extreme humility and his willingness to die for the sins of all humanity demonstrate that love is far more powerful than pushiness and pretension, Pope Benedict XVI said.

During his Oct. 22 general audience in St. Peter's Square, Pope Benedict spoke about St. Paul's faith in and teaching about Jesus Christ as fully divine. The pope looked particularly at the hymn to Christ in the second chapter of St. Paul's Letter to the Philippians.

Pope Benedict said St. Paul's letters speak of Christ as "the firstborn of all creation." Calling Christ the firstborn "implies that he is the first of many children, the first of many brothers and sisters, that he came down to attract us to him and make us his brothers and sisters," the pope said.

Jesus "invites us to participate in his humility and in his love for others and, in that way, to participate also in his glorification as sons and daughters in the son," Pope Benedict said.

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks in English.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

In our continuing catechesis on St. Paul, we now consider the centrality of Jesus Christ in his teaching.

Paul preaches Christ as the crucified and glorified Lord, alive and present within the church. He proclaims Christ's incarnation and exaltation, but also his pre-existence with the Father before all time.

His affirmation of Christ's pre-existence evokes those Old Testament texts, which portray God's wisdom as being with him before creation and coming down to dwell among men (e.g., Pr 8:22-23). Paul thus presents Christ as "the wisdom of God" (1 Cor 1:24), the center and fulfillment of the Father's eternal plan of salvation.

The hymn found in his Letter to the Philippians (Phil 2:6-11) contrasts Christ's pre-existence "in the form of God" and his subsequent "kenosis" or self-emptying, "even to death, death on a Cross." Paul also appeals to Christ's pre-existence and incarnation in proclaiming Jesus as "the one mediator between God and man" (1 Tim 3:16), the firstborn of all creation and the head of the church (cf. Col 1:15-20).

Paul's "sapiential" christology invites us to welcome the salvation offered by the crucified and risen Lord, the Eternal Son, who is the very wisdom and power of God.

Peace of mind in turbulent times

Making yours a Christian estate plan

As you try to make some sense of these turbulent financial times and look to the years ahead, it can be prudent to review your overall estate plan.

First, you will surely want to remember your family and others who depend on you for financial support. When you are assured that these people are cared for as fully as possible, your thoughts go to others — friends, associates, other relatives. You also may wish to remember the church with a gift to your parish, Catholic school, Catholic agency, the Diocese of Charlotte or the diocesan foundation.

But how can you accomplish all of this? All of us feel that there is a limit to our resources and recent times have increased this feeling.

It's important to review your estate plan as a whole. Remembering your loved ones and other interests call for various methods of distribution: life insurance, retirement plans, trusts and a will, to name a few. You can use all of these and more to remember those who are important to you.

Once loved ones are cared for, consider including the church. Your parish, a favorite agency, Catholic school, the diocese or the diocesan foundation can be included in your will and other estate plans while not detracting at all from the plans you make for your family.

Here are some ideas:

— A "last-in-line" bequest: When you make or revise your will, you and your attorney can make sure that your spouse, children, grandchildren, parents or others are provided for as you wish.

After that, you can include a charitable bequest of the "residue" (what remains after other bequests are satisfied).

— A gift of "what's left" in a trust: If you have a living trust to distribute your property, you can include a gift of what remains after loved ones have been cared for.

Similar to a residual bequest, such a gift allows you to make a large gift while fully providing for others.

— A gift from life insurance or retirement plan proceeds: Just as you can name your parish, favorite Catholic agency, Catholic school, the Diocese of Charlotte or the diocesan foundation in your will or trust, you can add that name to receive part or all of your life insurance or retirement plan proceeds after individuals you name have received their portions, or if they do not survive you.

Anyone with any amount of property can include a gift as outlined above, creating a lasting testimonial to one's faith and further living out the life of stewardship. These ideas also help you take care of obligations to your family and loved ones and create peace of mind even during difficult financial times.

In addition, all those age 70 and 1/2 or older should know that Congress has just extended the IRA (Individual Retirement Account) Charitable Rollover, an excellent charitable estate planning opportunity for both 2008 and 2009.

This act allows an IRA owner age 70 and 1/2 or older to make a direct transfer of distributions to charitable organizations and avoid the tax on these distributions. The transfer may be up to $100,000 in one year and this IRA rollover will exist for years 2008 and 2009.

By knowing your priorities and drafting your estate plan responsibly, you can take care of your loved ones and leave a legacy gift to the church without slighting either.

A trader works on the floor of the New York Stock Exchange Oct. 6. With the dramatic downturn of the U.S. economy, scholars and clergy are revisiting the U.S. bishops' 1986 pastoral letter promoting an economic policy that reins in unbridled consumerism and a lust for material riches, and advocates the theology of sharing the wealth.

'Economic Justice for All'

1986 economic pastoral letter revisited as world faces financial meltdown

BY CHAZ MUTH
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — As U.S. residents struggle to make sense of the dramatic downturn in the economy, scholars and clergy are revisiting a 22-year-old pastoral letter written by the U.S. Catholic bishops promoting an economic policy that reins in unbridled consumerism and a lust for material riches, and advocates the theology of sharing the wealth.

When the U.S. bishops released their 1986 pastoral letter, "Economic Justice for All," the authors were addressing out-of-control spending by governments, national debt for Third World countries and rampant investing with little regard for social values, said Msgr. Stuart Swetland, 49, vice president for Catholic identity and mission at Mount St. Mary's University in Emmittsburg, Md.

"The basic principles of that letter are very valid, and if they had been listened to more, we wouldn't be in the economic crisis we are in today," Msgr. Swetland said. "Is it fair to be consuming so much when there is so much poverty around the world?"

"Everyone should look at the resources entrusted to our care and see how we can all be the best stewards of our resources and how they can be best used and serve the community as a whole," the priest said.

The pastoral letter suggests three questions that should be asked when forming an economic policy: What does it do for people? What does it do to people? What does it do to the least well-off?

A Catholic theologian, an economist and two Catholic bishops told Catholic News Service they believe the basic principles of "Economic Justice for All" call for government to ensure that economic policy safeguards the markets from excessive greed and great disparity of wealth among the people, and treats individuals in the labor pool with dignity, not just as profit-making tools.

All those interviewed agreed that unchecked self-indulgence was a key ingredient in the current economic crisis.

The late Pope John Paul II said Catholic tradition calls for a "society of work, enterprise and participation" that "is not directed against the market, but demands that the market be appropriately controlled by the forces of society, and by the state, to assure that the basic needs of the whole society are satisfied."

He also said all economic life should recognize that we are all God's children and members of one family, called to exercise a clear priority for "the least among us."

"We have too many bad stewards of God's gifts," said Bishop John J. McRaith of Owensboro, Ky.

"Too many people are starving. One thing that was not emphasized in the document that is really essential for any economic system is being a good steward and that no one really owns anything, but God," he said.

"It's not that God hasn't given enough to go around, but that too many people are greedy and keeping more than their fair share," Bishop McRaith said.

Though the basic principles "Economic Justice for All" are sound, the document itself is antiquated and should be updated, or scrapped and replaced with a modernized pastoral, said Andre Abela, associate professor of marketing at The Catholic University of America in Washington.

"I think it needs to be retired and replaced with something else," Abela told CNS.

"We didn't even have NAFTA (the North American Free Trade Agreement) then and think about the issues with immigration today. Think of the Internet and all that entails and how it's become structured into our economy, and social justice for that matter," he said.

"We should have a document that takes all of that into account," he added.

Since the core values in the document are still relevant, Bishop John C. Wester of Salt Lake City said that updating the pastoral may be an appropriate course of action.

"I do think that the economic pastoral has guidelines that allow us to look at what happened in this financial crisis and learn from it," Bishop Wester said.

"There are so many people who are suffering from this crisis, especially people whose 401(k) has been wiped out and those who are now at risk of losing their homes," he said. "If we update the pastoral, we need to examine how to prevent this from happening again."

Any new document should emphasize that the economy exists for the people and should provide each human with dignity, he said. "We forgot about that. The economy started to exist for profit only."

The disparity of compensation has spun out of control in the 22 years since "Economic Justice for All" was drafted and a new document would have to address that issue in the context of the global economy, Bishop McRaith said.

"In the early '80s the average American CEO was making about 100 times more than the average worker," Msgr. Swetland said. "That at the time seemed to be reasonable, given the level of responsibility."

"That number rose to 80 times in a decade, and by 2003 the average American CEO was earning up to 500 times the average worker," he said. "When you see the top economic earners breaking away so far, something is gone askew."

Since the credit markets froze and Wall Street became unstable in September, the focus has been on struggling homeowners and the middle class, yet little thought has been given to the desperately poor, Bishop McRaith said.

"I think we all have to look at ourselves and see all of the stuff that we have and ask do we need all of that stuff? The answer is no, I don't," he said.

"If everyone does that then we move off to a new world. I don't mind saying I have a long way to go to achieve that goal, but that is what the Lord is calling on us to do," he said.
